The pious Jews in Babylon, having afflicted themselves with the thoughts of the ruins of Jerusalem, have particularly connected the present prosperity of her impotent, implacable enemies; but this, not from a spirit of revenge, but from a holy zeal for the glory of God and the honour of his kingdom. 1. The Edomites will certainly be reckoned with, and all others that were accessories to the destruction of Jerusalem, that were aiding and abetting, that helped forward the affliction, (Zech. i. 13.) and triumphed in it; that said, in the presence of the nations, this is our portion. "Rase it, rase it to the foundations; down with it, down with it, do not leave one stone upon another." Thus they made the Chaldean army more furious, who were already so enraged that they needed no spur. Thus they made them put shame upon Israel, who would be looked upon as a people worthy to be cut off, when their next neighbours had such an ill-will to them. And all this was a fruit of the old enmity of Esau against Jacob, because he get the birth-right and the blessing, and a branch of that more ancient enmity between the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent: Lord, remember them, says the psalmist; which is an appeal to his justice against them. For be it from us to avenge ourselves, if ever it should be in our power, but we will leave it to him who has said, Vengeance is mine. Note, They that are glad at calamities, especially the calamities of Jerusalem, shall not go unpunished. They that are content to have the persecutors of good people, and stir them up, and set them on, and are pleased with what they do, shall certainly be called to an account for it another day, and God will remember it against them.

2. Babylon is the principal, and it will come to her turn too to drink of the cup of trembling, the very dregs of it; (v. 8, 9.) O daughter of Babylon, who art proud and secure, and art in the midst of all, by the word of truth, thou art to be destroyed; or, as Dr. Hammond reads it, who art the destroyer. The destroyers shall be destroyed; (Rev. xiii. 10.) and perhaps it is with reference to this, that the man of sin, the head of the New Testament Babylon, is called a son of perdition, 2 Thess. ii. 3. The destruction of Babylon being foreseen as a sure destruction, thou art to be destroyed. It is spoken of, (1.) As a just destruction; she shall be paid in her own coin; “Thou shalt be served as thou hast served us; as barbarously used by the executors of us as we have been by thee.” See Rev. xvi. 8. Let not those expect to find mercy, who, when they had power, did not show mercy. (2.) As an utter destruction; the very little ones of Babylon, when it is taken by storm, and all in it put to the sword, shall be dashed to pieces, by the enraged and merciless conqueror. None escape, if these little ones perish. Those are the seed of another generation; so that, if they be cut off, the ruin will be not only total, as Jerusalem’s was, but final. It is sunk like a millstone into the sea, never to rise. (3.) As a destruction which should reflect honour upon the instruments of it. Happy shall they be that do it; for they are fulfilling God’s counsels; and therefore he calls Cyrus, who did it, his servant, his shepherd, his anointed, (Isa. xlv. 28.—xlv. 1.) and the soldiers, that were employed in it, his sanctified ones, Isa. xiii. 3. They are making way for the enlargement of God’s Israel, and happy they who are any way serviceable to that. The fall of the New Testament Babylon will be the triumph of all the saints, Rev. xix. 1.

PSALM CXXXVIII.

It does not appear, nor is it material to inquire, upon what occasion David penned this psalm; but in it, 1. He looks back with thankfulness upon the experiences he had had of God’s goodness to him, v. 1.—9. 2. He looks forward with comfort, in hopes, I. That others would go on to praise God like him, v. 4, 5. 2. That God would go on to do good to him, v. 6, 8. In singing this psalm, we must in like manner learn to praise God, to sing his praise, and repose ourselves in his power and goodness.

A psalm of David.

1. I WILL praise thee with my whole heart; before the gods will I sing praise unto thee. 2. I will worship towards thy holy temple, and praise thy name for thy loving-kindness, and for thy truth: for thou hast magnified thy word above all thy name. 3. In the day which I cried thou answeredst me, and strengthenest me with strength in my soul. 4. All the kings of the earth shall praise thee, O Lord, when they hear the words of thy mouth. 5. Yea, they shall sing in the ways of the Lord: for great is the glory of the Lord:

1. How he would praise God; compare cxli. 1. 1. He will praise him with sincerity and zeal; with my heart, with my whole heart; with that which is within me, and with all that is within me; with uprightness of intention, and fervent affection; inward impressions agreeing with outward expressions.

2. With freedom and boldness; Before the gods will I sing praise unto thee; before the princes, and judges, and great men; either these of other nations, that visited him, or those of his own nation, that attended on him. Even in their presence, he will not only praise God with his heart, which we may do by pleas calculated in any company, but will sing praise, if there be occasion. Note, Praising God is work which the greatest of men need not be ashamed of; it is the work of angels, the work of heaven. Before the angels, so some understand it, in religious assemblies, where there as a special presence of angels, 1 Cor. xii. 10. 3. In the way that God had appointed; I will worship toward thy holy temple. The priests only went into the temple, the people, at the nearest, did but worship towards it, and that they might do at a distance. Christ is our Temple, and toward him we must look with an eye of faith, as Mediator between us and God, in all our praises of him. Heaven is God's holy temple, and thitherward we must lift up all our addresses to God; Our Father in heaven.

II. What he would praise God for.

1. For the fountain of his comforts; for thy loving-kindness, and for thy truth; for thy goodness, and for thy promise; mercy hid in thee, and mercy revealed by thee that God is a gracious God in himself, and has engaged to be so to all those that trust in him. For thou hast magnified thy word, thy promise, which is truth, above all thy name. God has made himself known to us many ways, in creation and providence, but most clearly by his word. The judgments of his mouth are magnified even above those of his hand, and greater things are done by them. The wonders of grace exceed the wonders of nature; and what is discovered of God by revelation, is much greater than what is discovered by reason. In what the Lord has done, both his faithfulness to his word appeared more illustrious, and redounded more to his glory, than any other of his attributes. Some good interpreters understand it of Christ, the essential Word, and of his gospel, which are magnified above all the discoveries God had before made of himself to the fathers. He that magnified the law and made that honourable, magnifies the gospel much more.

For the strength of grace from that fountain, in which he himself had tasted that the Lord is gracious, v. 3. He had been in affliction, and he remembers, with thankfulness, (1.) The sweet communion he then had with God. He cried, he prayed, and prayed earnestly, and God answered him, gave him to understand that his prayer was accepted, and should have a gracious return in due time. The intercourse between God and his saints is carried on by his prayers and their prayers. (2.) The sweet communications Jesus has with his people; Thou strengthenedst me with strength in my soul. This was the answer to his prayer, for God gives more than good words, xx. 6. Observe, [1.] It was a speedy answer; in the day when I cried. Note, Those that trade with heaven by prayer, grow rich by quick returns; while we are yet speaking, God hears, Isa. lxxv. 19. [2.] It was a spiritual answer; God gave him strength in his soul, and power and grace and valour in his soul, for to fight against his enemies. This was a real and valuable answer to the prayer of faith in the day of affliction. If God gives us strength in our souls, to bear the burthens, resist the temptations, and do the duties, of an afflicted state; if he strengthen us to keep hold of himself by faith, to maintain the peace of our own minds, and to wait with patience for the issue, we must own that he has answered us, and we are bound to be thankful.

III. What influence he hoped that his praising God would have upon others, v. 4. 5. David was himself a king, and therefore he hoped that kings would be wrought upon by his experiences, and his examples, to embrace religion; and if kings became religious, their kingdoms would be every way better. Now, 1. This may have reference to the kings that were neighbours to David, as Hiram and others; They shall all praise thee; when they visited David. For the same reason, when they sought the presence of Solomon, (as all the kings of the earth are expressly said to have done, 2 Chron. ix. 23.) they readily joined in the worship of the God of Israel. 2. It may look further to the calling of the Gentiles, and the disciplining of all nations, by the gospel of Christ, of whom it is said, that all kings shall fall down before him, Ps. lxxxi. 11. Now it is here foretold, (1.) That the kings of the earth shall hear the words of God. All that came near David should hear them from him, cix. 46. In the latter days, the preachers of the gospel should be sent into all the world. (2.) That then they shall praise God, as all those have reason to do that hear his word, and receive it, and the light and love of it, Acts xiii. 48. (3.) That they shall sing in the ways of the Lord, in the ways of his providence and grace toward them; they shall rejoice in God, and give glory to him, however he is pleased to deal with them in the ways of their duty and obedience to him. Note, They that walk in the ways of the Lord have reason to sing in those ways, to go on in them with a great deal of cheerfulness, for they are ways of pleasantness, and it becomes us to be pleasant in them; if we can and do, great is the glory of the Lord. It is very much for the honour of God that kings should walk in his ways, and that all those who walk in them should sing in them, and so proclaim to all the world that he is a good Master, and his work its own wages.

6. Though the Lord be high, yet hath he respect to the lowly; out of the pumpkin he knoweth afar off. 7. Though I walk in the midst of trouble, thou wilt revive me; thou shalt stretch forth thy hand against the wrath of mine enemies, and thy right hand shall save me. 8. The Lord will perfect that which concerneth me: thy mercy, O Lord, endureth for ever: forsake not the works of thine own hands.

David here comforts himself with three things.

1. The favour God bears to his humble people; (v. 6.) Though the Lord be high, and neither needs any of his creatures, nor can be benefited by them, yet hath he respect unto the lowly; smiles upon them as well pleased with them, overlooks heaven and earth to cast a gracious look upon them, (Isa. lvii. 1. Rev. iv. 10.)—As if he had said, He is so near upon them, while he knows the proud afar off, he knows them, but disowns them and rejects them, how proudly soever they pretend to his favour. Dr. Hammond makes this to be the sum of that gospel which the kings of the earth shall hear and welcome—that penitent sinners shall be accepted of God, but the impenitent cast out; witness the instance of the Pharisee and the Publican, Luke xviii.

2. The care God takes of his afflicted, oppressed, people, v. 7. David, though a great and good man, expects to walk in the midst of trouble, but encourages himself with hope, (1.) That God would comfort him; "When my spirit is ready to sink and fall, thou shalt revive me, and make me easy and cheerful under my troubles." Divine consolations have enough in them to revive us even when we walk in the midst of troubles, and are ready to die away for fear. (2.) That he would protect him, and plead his cause; Thou shalt stretch forth thine hand, though not against mine enemies, to destroy them, yet against the wrath of mine enemies, to restrain that, and set bounds to it. (3.) That he would in due time work deliverance for him; Thy right hand shall save me. As he has one hand to stretch out against his enemies, so he has another to save his own people. Christ is the Right Hand of the Lord, that shall save all those who serve him.

3. The assurance we have, that, whatever good work God has begun in and for his people, he will perform it; (v. 8.) The Lord will perfect that which concerns me, (1.) That which is most needful for me; and he knows what is so. We are careful and cumbered about many things that do not concern us, but he knows what are the things that really are of consequence to us, (Matt. vi. 32.) and will order them for the best. (2.) That which we are most concerned about. Every good man is most concerned about his duty to God, and his happiness in God; that the former may be faithfully done, and the latter effectually secured; and if indeed these are the things that our hearts are most upon, and concerning which we are most solicitous, there is a good work begun in us, and he that has begun it will perfect it, we may be confident he will, Phil. i. 6. Observe, [1.] What ground the psalmist builds this confidence upon. Thy love, O Lord, endures for ever. This he had made very much the matter of his praise, (xiii. 6.) and therefore he could here with the more assurance make it the matter of his hope. For, if we give God the glory of his mercy, we may take to ourselves the comfort of it. Our hopes that we shall persevere, must be founded, not upon our own strength, for that will fail us, but upon the mercy of God, for that will not fail. It is well pleaded, Lord, thy mercy endures for ever; let me be for ever a monument of it. [2.] What use he makes of this confidence; it does not supersede, but quicken, prayer; he turns his expectation into a petition; Forsake not, do not let go, the work of thine own hands. Lord, I am the work of thine own hands, my soul is so, do not forsake me; my concerns are so, do not lay thy care of them. Whatever good there is in us, it is the work of God's own hands; he works in us both to will and to do; it will fail if he forsake it; but if he worketh in us, as hebrew, a perfecting God, is so much concerned in the progress of it to the end, that we may in faith pray, Lord, do not forsake it. Whom he loves he loves to the end; and as for God, his work is perfect.

PSALM CXXXIX.

Some of the Jewish doctors are of opinion that this is the most excellent of all the psalms of David; and a very pidous devout meditation it is, upon the doctrine of God's own love toward us, which should therefore be the subject of our hearts fixed upon, and filled with, in singing this psalm. 1. This doctrine is here asserted, and fully laid down, v. 1-6. II. It is confirmed by two arguments. 1. God is everywhere present, therefore he knows all, v. 7-12. He makes us, therefore he knows us, v. 13-18. Three inferences are drawn, from this doctrine. 1. It may fill us with pleasing admiration of God, v. 17, 18, 2. With a holy dread and detestation of sin and sinners, v. 19-22. 3. With a holy satisfaction in our own integrity, concerning which we may appeal to God, v. 23, 24. This great and self-evident truth, That God knows our hearts, and the hearts of all the children of men, if we did but mix faith with it, and seriously consider it, and apply it, would have a great influence upon our holiness, and upon our comfort.

To the chief musician. A psalm of David.

1 LORD, thou hast searched me, and known me. 2. Thou knowest my downsitting and mine up-rising; thou understandest my thought afar off. 3. Thou compassest my path and my lying down, and art acquainted with all my ways:

4. For there is not a word in my tongue, but, lo, O Lord, thou knowest it altogether. 5. Thou hast beset me behind and before, and laid thy hand upon me. 6. Such knowledge is too wonderful for me; it is high, I cannot attain unto it.

David here lays down this great doctrine, That the God with whom we have to do has a perfect knowledge of us, and that all the motions and actions, both of our inward and of our outward man, are naked and open before him. 1. He laid down this doctrine in the way of an address to God, 2. prais- ing him, acknowledging it to him, and giving him the glory of it. Divine truths look full as well when they are prayed over, as when they are preached over; and much better than when they are disputed over. When we speak of God to him himself, we shall find ourselves concerned to speak with the utmost degree both of sincerity and reverence, which will be likely to make the impressions the deeper.

3. He leaves it here in a manner of application to himself; not, "Thou hast known me," but, "Thou hast known me; that is it which I am most concerned to believe, and which it will be most profitable for me to consider." Then we know these things for our good, when we knew them for ourselves, Job v. 27. When we acknowledge, Lord, all souls are thine," we must add, "My soul is thine; thou hast the whole, all sin hast thou sin on me; thou art good to all, good to Israel, art good to me; The heart knoweth his own lust; and known me; known me, thoroughly as we know that which we have most diligently and exactly searched into." David was a king, and the hearts of kings are unsearchable to their subjects, (Prov. xxv. 3.) but they are not so to their Sovereign.

3. He descends to particulars; Thou knowest me wherever I am, and whatever I am doing; me, and all that belongs to me." (1.) Thou knowest me and all my motions, my down-sitting to rest, my up-rising to work; with what temper of mind I compose myself when I sit down, and stir up myself when I rise up; what my soul reposes itself in, as its stay and support, what it aims at, and reaches toward, as its felicity and end. Thou knowest me when I come home, how I walk before my house, and when I go abroad, on what errands I go." (2.) Thou knowest all my imaginations; nothing is more close and quick than thought, it is always unknown to others, it is often unobserved by ourselves, and yet thou understandest my thoughts afar off. Though my thoughts be ever so foreign and distant from one another, thou understandest the chain of them, and canst make out their connexion, when so many of them slip my notice, that I myself cannot." Or, "Thou understandest them afar off, even before I think them, and long after I have thought them, and have myself forgotten them." Or, "Thou understandest them from afar, from the height of heaven thou seest into the depths of the heart," xxxiii. 14. (3.) "Thou knowest me and all my designs and undertakings; thou composest every particular path; thou estified or winnowest my path," (so some) "so as thoroughly to distinguish between the good and evil of what I do," as by sifting we separate between the corn and the chaff. All our actions are observed by the judgment of God, xxxix. 3. God takes notice of every step we take, every right step, and every back-step. He is acquainted with all our ways, intimately acquainted with them, he knows what rule we walk by, what end we walk toward, what company we walk with. (4.) "Thou knowest me in all my retirements; thou knowest my lying down; when I am withdrawn from all company, and am reflecting upon what has passed all day, and composing my self to rest, my best self to be in my best heart, and with what thoughts I go to bed." (5.) "Thou knowest me, and all I say; (v. 4.) There is not a word in my tongue, not a vain word, not a good word, but thou knowest it altogether; knowest what it meant, from what thought it came, and with what design it was uttered. There is not a word at my tongue's end, ready to be spoken, yet checked and kept in, but thou knowest it." When there is not a word in my tongue, O Lord, thou knowest all; so some read it; for thoughts are words to God. (6.) "Thou knowest me in every part of me; Thou hast bested me behind and before, that so, which way I will, I am under thine eye, and cannot escape it. Thou hast laid thine hand upon me, and I cannot run away from thee." Wherever we are, we are under the eye and hand of God. Perhaps, it is an allusion to the physician's laying his hand upon his patient, to feel how his pulse beats, or what temper he is in. God knows us, as we know not only what we see, but what we feel, and have our hands upon. All his saints are in his hand.

4. He speaks of it with admiration; (v. 6.) It is too wonderful for me; it is high; (1.) "Thou hast such a knowledge of me, as I have not of myself, nor can have. I cannot take notice of all my own thoughts, nor make such a judgment of myself as thou makest of me." (2.) "It is such a knowledge as I cannot comprehend, much less describe. That thou knowest all things I am sure, but how I cannot tell." We cannot by searching find out how God searches and finds out us; nor do we know how we are known.

7. Whither shall I go from thy Spirit? or whither shall I flee from thy presence? 8. If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there; If I make my bed in hell, behold, thou art there. 9. If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea; 10. Even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me. 11. If I say, Surely the darkness shall cover me; even the night shall be light about me. 12. Yea, the darkness hideth not from thee; but the night shineth as the day: the darkness and the light are both alike to thee. 13. For thou hast possessed my reins: thou hast covered me in my mother's womb. 14. I will praise thee; for I am fearfully and wonderfully made: marvellous are thy works; and that my soul knoweth right well. 15. My substance was not hid from thee, when I was made in secret, and curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth. 16. Thine eyes did see my substance, yet being imperfect; and in thy book all my members were written, which in continuance were fashioned, when as yet there reis none of them.

It is of great use to us to know the certainty of the things wherein we have been instructed, that we may not only believe them, but be able to tell why we believe them, and to give a reason of the hope that is in us. David is therefore sure that God perfectly knows him and all his ways.

1. Because he is always under his eye. If God is omnipresent, he must needs be omniscient; but he is omnipresent; this supposes the infinity and immensity of his being, from which follows the ubiquity of his presence; heaven and earth include the whole creation, and the Creator fills both; (Jer. xxvi. 24.) he not only knows both, and governs both, but he fills both. Every part of the creation is under God's intuition and influence. David here acknowledg-
II. Because he is the work of his hands: he that framed the engine knows all the motions of it; God made us, and therefore, no doubt, he knows us: he saw us when we were in the forming, and can we be hid from him now that we are made? This is the argument he insists upon; (v. 13-16.) "Thou hast possessed my reins; thou art Master of my most secret thoughts and intentions, and the innermost recesses of my soul; thou not only knowest, but governest, them, as we do that which we have possession of; and the possession thou hast of my reins is a rightful possession, for thou coverestst me in my mother's womb, thou madest me; (Job x. 11.) thou madest me a secret; the soul is concealed from all about us, thou knowest the things of a man, says the spirit of a man?" 1 Cor. ii. 11. Hence we read of the hidden man of the heart. But it was God himself that thus covered us, and therefore he can, when he pleases, discover us; when he hid us from all the world, he did not intend to hide us from himself.

Concerning the formation of man, of each of us;
1. The glory of it is here given to God, entirely to him; for it is he that has made us, and not we ourself. Our place was only to be void, when he spake, my parents were only the instruments of it. It was done, (1.) Under the divine inspection; My substance, when hid in the womb, nay, when it was yet but in fieri—in the forming, an unshapen embryo, was not hid from thee, thine eyes did see my substance. (2.) By the divine operation. As the eye of God saw us then, so his hand wrought us; we were his work. (3.) According to the divine model; In thy book all my members were written. Eternal wisdom formed the plan, and by that almighty power raised the noble structure.

2. Glorious things are here said concerning it. The generation of man is to be considered with the same pious veneration as his creation at first. Consider it, (1.) As a great marvel, a great miracle we might call it, but that it is done in the ordinary course of nature. We are fearfully and wonderfully made; we may justly be astonished at the admirable contrivance of these living temples, the composition of every part, and the harmony of all together. (2.) As a great mystery; a mystery of nature; My soul knows right well that it is marvellous, but how to describe it for any one else I know not; for I was made in secret, and curiously wrought in the womb, as in the lowest parts of the earth; so privately, and so far out of sight. (3.) As a great mercy; that all our members in continuance were fashioned, according as they were written in the book of God's wise counsel, when as we were there none of them; or, as some read it, and none of them was left out. If any of our members had been wanting in God's book, they had been wanting in our bodies, but, through his goodness, we have all our limbs and senses, the want of any of which might have made us burthens to ourselves. See what reason we have then to praise God for our creation, and to conclude that he who saw our substance when it was unfinished, sees it now that it is fashioned.

17. How precious also are thy thoughts unto me, O God! how great is the sum of them! 18. If I should count them, they are more in number than the sand: when I awake, I am still with thee. 19. Surely thou wilt slay the wicked, O God: depart from me, therefore, ye bloody men. 20. For they speak against thee wickedly, and thine enemies take thy name in vain. 21. Do not I hate them, O Lord, that hate thee? and am not I grieved with those that ris up against thee? 22. I hate them with perfect hatred; I count them mine enemies. 23. Search me, O God, and know my heart; try me, and know my thoughts; 24. And see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting.

Here the psalmist makes application of the doctrine of God's omniscience, divers ways.
1. He acknowledges, with wonder and thankfulness, the care God had taken of all his days, (v. 17, 18.) God, who knew him, thought of him, and his thoughts toward him were thoughts of love: thoughts of good, and not of evil, Jer. xxiv. 11. God's omniscience, which might justly have watched over us to our hurt, has been employed for us, and has watched over us to do us good, Jer. xvii. 10.

2. He concludes from this doctrine, that ruin will certainly be the end of sinners. God knows all the wickedness of the wicked, and therefore he will reckon for it; "Surely thou wilt slay the wicked, O God; for all their wickedness is open before thee, however it may be artfully disguised and coloured over, to hide it from the eye of the world. However thou suffer them to prosper for a while, surely thou wilt slay them at last." Now observe, (1.) The reason why God will punish them; because they daringly affront him, and set him at defiance; (v. 20.) They speak against thee wickedly; they set their mouth against the heavens, (lxviii. 9.) and shall be called to account for the hard speeches they have spoken against him, Jude 15. They are his enemies, and declare their enmity by taking his name in vain; as we show ourselves enemies of a man, if we make a by-word of his name, and never mention him but in a way of jest and banter. These that profane the sacred forms of swearing or praying, by using them in an impertinent, irreverent, manner, take God's name in vain, and thereby show themselves enemies to him. Some make it to be a description of hypocrites; "They speak of thee for mischief; they talk of God, pretending to piety, but it is some ill design, for a cloak of maliciousness; and, being enemies to God, while they pretend friendship, they take his name in vain, they swear falsely.” (2.) The use David makes of this project which has of the ruin of the wicked. [1.] He detests them; “Depart from me, ye bloody men; ye shall not debar me, for I will not admit your friendship, nor have fellowship with you; and you cannot destroy me, for, being under God's protection, he shall force you to depart from me.” [2.] He detests them; (v. 21, 22.) “Lord, thou knowest the heart, and canst witness for me; do not I hate them that hate thee, and for that reason, because they hate thee. Therefore I hate them, for I love thee, and hate to see such affronts and indignities put upon thy blessed name. Am not I grieved with those that rise up against thee, grieved to see their rebellion, and to foresee their ruin which it will certainly end in?” Note, Sin is hated, and sinners lamented, by all that fear God. “I hate them, I hate the work of them that turn aside,” (as he explains himself, c. 3.) “with a sincere and perfect hatred; I count them that are enemies to God as enemies to me, and will not have any intimacy with them,” 11. 8. 3. He appeals to God concerning his sincerity, v. 23, 24. (1.) He desires that as far as he was in the wrong, God would discover it to him. They that are upright, can take comfort in God's omniscience as a witness of their uprightness, and can with a humble confidence beg of him to search and try them, to discover to them the things they have done, (for he knows the heart knows how to do effectually;) Lead me in the way everlasting. Note, [1.] The way of godliness is an everlasting way, it is eternally true and good; pleasing to God, and profitable to us; and will end in everlasting life. It is the way of antiquity, so some; the good old way. [2.] All the saints desire to be kept and led in this way, that they may not miss it, turn out of it, or tire in it.

This and the four following psalms are much of a piece, and the scope of them the same with many that we met with in the beginning and middle of the book of Psalms, though with but few of late. They were penned by David (as it should seem) when he was persecuted by Saul; one of them is said to be his prayer when he was in the cave, and it is probable that all the rest were penned about the same time. In this psalm, I. David complains of the malice of his enemies, and prays to God to preserve him from them, v. 1., 5. II. He encourages himself in God, as his God, v. 6. 7. III. He prays for, and prophesies, the destruction of his persecutors, v. 8., 9. IV. He returns a certain sign of poison in their mouths to his heart. V. 10. They are confederate; they are many of them; but they are all gathered together against me for war, v. 2. They who can agree in nothing else, can agree to persecute a good man. Herod and Pilate will unite in this, and in this they resemble Satan, who is not divided against himself, all the devils agreeing in Beelzebub. (4.) They are proud, (v. 5.) conceited of themselves, and confident of the destruction of their enemies; and they resemble Satan, whose reigning, ruining, sin, was pride. The pride of persecutors, though at present it be the terror, yet may be the encouragement, of the persecuted, for the more haughtily they are, the faster are they ripening for ruin. Pride goes before destruction. 2. He prays to God to keep him from them, and from being swallowed up by them; “Lord, deliver me, preserve me, keep me; (v. 1, 4.) let them not prevail to take away my life, my reputation, my interest, my comfort, and to prevent my coming to the throne. Keep me from doing as they do, or as they would have me do, or as they promise themselves I shall do.” Note, The more malice appears in our enemies against us, the more earnest we should be in prayer to God to take us under his protection. In him believers may count upon a security, and may enjoy it and themselves with a holy serene, and expect God to preserve. If he be for us, who can be against us?

3. He triumphs in God, and thereby, in effect, he triumphs over his persecutors, v. 6, 7. When his enemies sharpened their tongues against him, did he sharpen his against them? No; adders’ poison was under their lips, but grace was poured into his lips, witness what he here said unto the Lord, for to him he looked, to him he directed himself, when he saw himself in so much danger through the malice of his enemies: and it is well for us that we have a God to go to. He comforted himself, (1.) In his interest in God; “I said, Thou art my God, and if my God, then my Shield and mighty Protector.” In treble dangerous times, it is good to claim relation to God, and by faith to keep hold of him. (2.) In his access to God. This comforted him, that he was not only taken into covenant with God, but into communion with him, that he had access to him, and might lay open his case, and make an offer of peace from him, and could say, with a humble confidence, Hear the voice of my supplications, O Lord. (3.) In the assurance he had of help from God, and happiness in him; “O God the Lord, Jehovah, Adonai; as Jehovah, thus art thou self-existent and self-sufficient, an infinitely perfect Being; as Adonai, thou art my Stay and Support, my Ruler and Governor; and therefore the Strength of my salvation, my strong Saviour; as, not only my Saviour, but my Salvation itself, from whom, in whom, my salvation is; not only a strong Saviour, but the very Strength of my salvation, on whom the stress of my hope is laid; all in all to make me happy, and to preserve me to my happiness.” (4.) In the experience he had had formerly of God’s care of him; Thou hast covered my head in the day of battle. As he pleaded with Saul, that, for the service of his country, he many a time jeopardized his life in the high place of his head, so his life was saved, and his head kept, in those services. He had wonderfully protected him, and provided him a better helmet for the securing of his head, than Goliath’s was; “Lord, thou hast kept me in the day of battle with the Philistines, suffer me not to fall by the treacherous intrigues of false-hearted Israelites.” God is as able to preserve his people from secret fraud as from open force; and the experience we have had of his power and care, in dangers of one kind, may encourage us anew in him, and may expect of him, in dangers of another nature; for nothing can shorten the Lord’s right hand.

8. Grant not, O Lord, the desires of the wicked; further not his wicked devise, lest they exalt themselves. Selah. 9. As for the head of those that compass me about, let the mischief of their own lips cover them. 10. Let burning coals fall upon them: let them be cast into the fire; into deep pits, that they rise not up again. 11. Let not an evil speaker be established in the earth: evil shall hunt the violent man to overtake him. 12. I know that the Lord will maintain the cause of the afflicted, and the right of the poor. 13. Surely the righteous shall give thanks unto thy name; the upright shall dwell in thy presence.

Here is the believing foresight David had, 1. Of the shame and confusion of persecutors. Their disappointment; this he prays for, (v. 8.) that their lusts might not be gratified, their lust of ambition, envy, and revenge; “Grant not, O Lord, the desires of the wicked, but frustrate them; let them not establish themselves in the mind’s image, or in the midst of his ways, that they so earnestly wish to see; but hear the voice of my supplications.” He prays that their projects might not take effect, but be blasted; “O further not his wicked device; let not Providence favour any of his designs, but cross them; suffer not his wicked device to proceed, but chain his wheels, and stop him in the career of his pursuits.” Thus we are to pray against the enemies of God’s people, that they may not succeed in any of their enterprises. The Lord David’s prayer against Abiathel, that God would turn his counsels into foolishness. The plea is, lest they exalt themselves; value themselves upon their success, as if it were an evidence that God favoured them. Plead men, when they prosper, are made prudent, grow more impudent against God, and insolent against his people, and therefore, Lord, do not prosper them.

2. Their destruction. This he prays for, (as we read it,) that they might be brought to choose to read it rather as a prophecy; and the original will bear it. If we take it as a prayer that proceeds from a spirit of prophecy, which comes all to one, he foretells the ruin,

(1.) Of his own enemies; “As for those that compass me about, and seek my ruin,” [1.] “The mischief of their own lips shall cover their heads; (v. 9.) the evil they have wished to me shall come upon themselves; their curses shall be blown back into their own faces; and the very designs which they would lay against me shall turn to their own灭亡.” vii. 15, 16. Let those that make mischief, by slandering, tale-bearing, misrepresenting their neighbours, and spreading ill-natured characters and stories, dread the consequence of it, and think how sad their condition will be, when all the mischief they have been accessory to shall be made to return upon themselves. [2.] The judgments of God shall fall upon them, compared here to burning coals, in Job xx. 19, to burning heat, in Job xix. 25; as in the deluge, the waters from above, and those from beneath, met for the drowning of the world, both the windows of heaven were opened, and the fountains of the great deep were broken up; so here, to complete the ruin of the enemies of Christ and his kingdom, they shall not only have burning coals cast upon them from above, (Job xx. 23.—xxvii. 22.) but they themselves shall be cast into the fire beneath; both heaven and hell, the wrath of God, the Judge, and the rage of Satan the tormentor, shall concur to make them miserable. And the fire they shall be cast into is not a furnace of fire, out of which perhaps they might escape, but a deep pit, out of which they cannot rise. Tophet is said to be deep and large, Isa. xxx. 33.

(2.) Of all others that are like them, v. 11. [1.] Evil speakers must expect to be shaken, for they shall not be established, those who make ruinous designs by fraud and falsehood, by calumny and unjust accusation, will not prosper, will not last. Wealth gotten by vanity will be diminished. Let not such men as Doeg think to reign long, for his doom will be theirs, ii. 5. A lying tongue is but for a moment, but the lips of truth shall be established for ever. [2.] Evil Doeg must expect to be destroyed. Evil shall hunt the violent man, as the blood-hound hunts the murderer; he discovers him, as the huntsman hunts his prey to tear it to pieces; miscible men will be brought to light, and brought to ruin, the situation appointed shall run them down and overthrow them. Evil pursues sinners.

II. Here is his foresight of the deliverance and comfort of the persecuted, v. 12, 13. 1. God will do them justice, in delivering them, who, being wronged, commit themselves to him: I know that the Lord will maintain the just and injured cause of afflicted people, so they shall not always be prevented, and danger threatened, though it be but the right of the poor, who have but little that they can pretend a right to." God is, and will be, the patron of oppressed innocence, much more of per-cuted piety; they that know him cannot but know this. 2. They will do him justice, (if I may so speak,) in ascribing the glory of their deliverance to him; *Surely the righteous (who make conscience of rendering to God his due, as well as to men, their) shall give thanks unto thy name, when they find their cause pleaded with jealousy, and prosec-cuted with effect." The closing words, The upright shall dwell in thy presence, denote God's favour to them; Thou shalt admit them to dwell in thy presence, in grace here, in glory hereafter, and it shall be their safety and happiness, their duty to God; They shall attend upon thee as servants that keep in mind of the practice of their masters. It is true thanksgiving, even thanksgiving; and this use we should make of all our deliveries, we should serve God the more closely and cheerfully.

PSALM CXLI.

David was in distress when he penned this psalm; pursued, it is most likely, by Saul, that violent man. Is any distressed? Let him pray; David did so, and had the comfort of it. I. He prays for God's favourable acceptance,
v. 1, 2. II. For his powerful assistance, v. 3, 4, 5. III.
That others might be instrumental of good to his soul, as he hoped to be to the souls of others, v. 5, 6, 7. IV.
That he and his friends being now brought to the last exact, God would graciously appear for their relief and rescue, v. 7, 8. The mercy and grace of God are as necessary to us as they were to him, and therefore we should be humbly earnest for them in singing this psalm.

A psalm of David.

LORD, I cry unto thee: make haste unto me; give ear unto my voice, when I cry unto thee. 2. Let my prayer be set forth before thee as incense, and the lifting up of my hands as the evening sacrifice. 3. Set a watch, O Lord, before my mouth; keep the door of my lips. 4. Incline not my heart to any evil thing, to practice wicked works with men that work iniquity: and let me not eat of their dainties.

Mercy to accept what we do well, and grace to keep us from doing ill, are the two things which we are here taught by David's example to pray to God for:

1. David loved prayer, and he begs of God that his prayers might be heard and answered, v. 1, 2. David cried unto God; his crying denotes fervency in prayer, he prayed as one in earnest; his crying to God denotes faith and fixness in prayer. And what did he desire as the success of his prayer? (1.)
That God would take cognizance of it; Give ear to my voice, let me have a gracious audience. (2.) That cry in prayer may be heard to be heard in prayer, not for their loudness, but their liveliness. (3.) That he would visit him up and not; Make haste unto me. Those that know how to value God's gracious presence will be impatient for it, and humbly impatient of delays. He that believes does not make haste, but he that prays may be ears to God to make haste. (3.) That he would be well-pleased with him in it; well-pleased with his praying and the lifting up of his hands in prayer; which denotes both the elevation and enlargement of his desire, and the out-goings of his hope and expectation; the lifting up of the hand signifying the lifting up of the heart, and being used instead of lifting up the hands in adoration and invocations, as was done and waved before the Lord. Prayer is a spiritual sacrifice, it is the offering up of the soul and its best affections to God; now he prays that this may be set forth and directed before God, as the incense which was daily burnt upon the golden altar, and as the evening sacrifice, which he mentions, rather than the morning sacrifice, perhaps because this was an evening prayer, or with an eye to Christ, who, in the evening of the world, and in the evening of the day, was to offer himself a Sacrifice of atonement, and establish the spiritual sacrifices of acknowledgment, having abolished all the carnal ordinances of the law. They that pray in faith may expect it will please God better than an ox or bullock.

2. David was in fear of sin; and he begs of God that he might be kept from sin, knowing that his prayers would not be accepted, unless he took care to watch against sin; we must be as earnest for God's grace in us, as for his favour towards us.

(1.) He prays that he might not be surprised into any sinful words; (v. 3.) Set a watch, O Lord, before my mouth, and nature having made my lips to be a door to my words, let grace keep that door, that no word may be suffered to go out, which may any way tend to the dishonour of God, or the hurt of others." Good men know the evil of tongue-sins, and how prone they are to them; when enemies are provoking, we are in danger of carrying our resentments too far, and speaking injuriously of those near us, as David did, though the meekest of men; and therefore they are earnest with God to prevent their speaking amiss, as knowing that no watchfulness or resolution of their own is sufficient for the governing of their tongues, much less of their hearts, without the special grace of God. We must keep our mouth as with a bridle; but that will not serve, we must pray to God to keep them. Nehemiah prayed to the Lord then when he set a watch, and so much for without him the watchman waketh but in vain, (2.) That he might not be inclined to any sinful practices; (v. 4.) Incline not mine heart to any evil ing thing; whatever inclination there is in me to sin, let it be not only restrained, but mortified, by divine grace. The example of those about us, and the provocations of these against us, are apt to stir up, and draw out, corrupt inclinations; we are ready to do as others do, and to think that if we received injuries, we may return them; and therefore we have need to pray that we may never be left to ourselves to practise any wicked work, either in confidence with, or in opposition to, the men that work iniquity. While we live in such an evil world, and carry about with us such evil hearts, we have need to pray that we may never be drawn in by any allurement, nor driven on by any provocation, to do any sinful thing.

(3.) That he might not be insnared by any sinful pleasures; *Let me not eat of their dainties. Let me not join with them in their feasts and sports, lest thereby I be inveigled into their sins." Better is a dinner of herbs out of the way of temptation, than a staid and in it. Sinners pretend to find dainties in sin; stolen waters are sweet, forbidden fruit is pleasant to the eye: but they that consider how soon the dainties of sin will turn into wormwood and gall, how certainly it will, at last, bite like a serpent, and sting like an adder, will dread those dainties, and pray to God by his providence to take them out of their sight, and by his grace to turn them against them. Good men will pray against even the sweets of sin.

5. Let the righteous smite me; it shall be a kindness; and let him reprove me; it shall be an excellent oil, which shall not break my head, if it may but help to break my heart." (4.) We must require the kindness of those that deal thus faithfully, thus friendly, with us, at least by our prayers for them in their calamities, and hereby we must show that we take it kindly. Dr. Hammond gives quite another reading of this verse; "Refraorch will bruise me that I am righteous, and will break me; but he shall not break my head, shall not destroy me, shall not do me the mischief intended, for yet my prayer shall be in their mischief, that God would preserve me from them, and my prayer shall not be in vain." 2. David hopes his persecutors will, some time or other, bear to be told of their faults, as he was willing to be told of his; (v. 6.) "When their judges" (Saul, and his officers, who judged and condemned David, and which the reprovers) "are overthrown in stony places, among the rocks in the wilderness, then they shall hear my words, for they are sweet." Some think this refers to the rebellions that were in Saul's breast, when he said with tears, "Is this thy voice, my son David? 1 Sam. xxiv. 16.—xxvi. 21. Or, we may take it more generally; even judges, great as they are, may come to be overthrown; those that make the greatest show of justice in their world, may walk over the level smooth ways through it. And those that slighted the word of God before, will relish it, and be glad of it, when they are in affliction, for that opens the ear to instruction. When the world is bitter, the word is sweet. Oppressed innocency cannot gain a hearing with those that live in pomp and pleasure, but when they come to be overthrown themselves, they will have more compassionate thoughts for them.

3. David complains of the great extremity to which he and his friends were reduced; (v. 7.) "Our bones are scattered at the grave's mouth, cut ct which they are thrown up, so long have we been dead, or into which they are ready to be thrown, so near are we to the pit; and they are as little regarded as chips among the hewers of wood, which are thrown in neglected heaps. As one that cuts and clears the earth; so some read it, alluding to the ploughman who tears the earth with his ploughshare, cxix. 3. Can these dry bones live? 4. David casts himself upon God, and depends upon him for deliverance; "But mine eyes are unto thee; (v. 8.) for, when the case is ever so deplorable, thou canst redress all the grievances, from thee I expect relief, bad as things are, and in thee is my trust. Those that have their eye toward God, may have their hopes in him.

5. He prays that God would succour and relieve him as his necessity required. (1.) That he would comfort him; "Leave not my soul desolate and destitute; still let me see where my help is." (2.) That he would prevent the designs of his enemies against him; (v. 9.) "Keep me from being taken in the snare they have laid for me; give me to discover it, and to evade it." Be the gin placed with ever so much art under God, and God will secure him from being taken in it. (3.) That God would, in justice, turn the designs of his enemies upon themselves, and, in mercy, deliver him from being ruined by them; (v. 10.) "Let the wicked fall into their own net, the net which, intentionally, they procured for me; but which, meritoriously, they prepared for themselves. Nie lex est justior ut laeum nee patriae suae—No law can be more just than that, to the extent of destruction should happen by their own contrivance. All that are bound over to God's justice are held on the cords of their own iniquity. But let me at the same time obtain a discharge. The entangling and ensnaring of the wick ed sometimes prove the escape and enlargement of the righteous.
PSALMS, CXLII.

PSALM CXLII.

This psalm is a prayer, the substance of which David offered up to God, when he was forced by Saul to take shelter in a cave, and which he afterward committed in this form, v. 1. The complaints he makes to God, (v. 1, 2.) of the subtlety, strength, and malice of his enemies, (v. 3, 6.) and the coldness and indifference of his friends, v. 4. II. The comfort he takes in God, that he knew his case, (v. 3.) and was his Refuge, v. 5. III. His expectation from God, that he would hear and deliver him, v. 6, 7. IV. His expectation from the righteous, that they would join with him in prayers, v. 7. Then, if any one, whether body, or estate, may, in singing this psalm, (if they sing it in some measure with David's spirit,) both warrant his complaints, and fetch in his comforts.

Maschil of David. A prayer when he was in the cave.

1. I CRIED unto the Lord with my voice: with my voice unto the Lord did I make my supplication. 2. I poured out my complaint before him: I showed before him my trouble. 3. When my spirit was overwhelmed within me, then thou knowest my path: in the way wherein I walked have they privily laid a snare for me.

Whether it was in the cave of Adullam, or that of En-gedi, or in a desert cave, to be put to such shifts for his own safety; and a great terror to be so lightly pursued, and every moment in expectation of death; yet then he had such a presence of mind, as to pray this prayer, and, wherever he was, still he had his religion about him. Prayers and tears were his weapons, and when he durst not stretch forth his hands against his prince, he lifted them up to his God. There is no cave so deep, so dark, but we may out of it send up our prayers, and our souls in prayer, to God. He calls this prayer Maschil, a psalm of instruction, because of the good lessons he had himself learnt in the cave, learnt on his knees, which he desired to teach others.

In these verses, observe, 1. How David complained to God, v. 1, 2. When the danger was over, he was not ashamed to own (as great shifts sometimes are) the fright he had been in, and the application he had made to God. Let not men of the first rank think it any diminution or disparagement to them, when they are in affliction, to cry to God, and to cry like children to their parents, when any thing frightens them. David poured out his complaint, which denotes a free and full complaint; he was large and particular in it. His heart was as full of his grievances as it could hold, but he made himself as free by pouring them out before the Lord; and this he did with great fervency. He cried unto the Lord with his voice, with the voice of his mind, (so some think,) for, being hid in the cave, he durst not speak with an audible voice, lest that should have discovered him: but mental prayer is vocal to God, and he hears the groanings which cannot, or dare not, be uttered, Rom. viii. 26. Two things David laid open to God. I. His complaint; (L.) His distress; he exhibited a remonstrance or memorial of his case: I showed before him my trouble, and all the circumstances of it. He did not prescribe to God, nor show him his trouble, as if God did not know it without his showing, but, as one that put a confidence in God, desired to keep up communion with him, and was willing to refer himself entirely to him, he unbosommed himself to him, humbly laid the matter before him, and then cheerfully left it with him. We are apt to show our trouble too much to ourselves, aggravating it, and perverting it, which does us no service; whereas, by showing it to God, we might cast the care upon him who careth for us, and thereby effect ourselves. Nor should we allow of any complaint to ourselves, or others, which we cannot with the due decency and sincerity of devotion make to God, and stand to before him.

(2.) His desire. When he made his complaint, he made his supplication; (v. 1.) not claiming relief as a debt, but humbly begging it as a favour. Complaints must be supplications, for God will be sought unto.

2. What he complained of; ("In the way wherein I walked, suspecting no danger, have they privily laid a snare for me, to entrap me." Saul gave Michal his daughter to David, on purpose that she might be a snare to him, 1 Sam. xviii. 21. This he complains of to God, that every thing was done with a design against him. If he had gone out of his way, and met with snares, he might have thanked himself; but, when he met with them in the way of his duty, he might with humble boldness tell God of them.

3. What comforts him in the midst of these complaints; (v. 3.) "When my spirit was overwhelmed within me, and ready to sink under the burthen of grief and fear, when I was quite at a loss, and ready to despair, thou knowest my path, then it was a pleasure to me to think that thou knowest it. Thou knowest my sincerity, the right path which I have walked in, and that I am not such a one as my persecutors represent me; thou knowest also my condition in all the particulars of it; when my spirit was so overwhelmed that I could not distinctly show it, this comforted me, that thou knowest it, Job xxxii. 10. Thou knowest it, thou didst protect, preserve, and secure it," Ps. xxxi. 7. Deut. ii. 7.

4. I looked on my right hand, and beheld, but there was no man that would know me: refuge failed me; no man cared for my soul. 5. I cried unto thee, O Lord: I said, Thou art my refuge, and my portion in the land of the living. 6. Attend unto my cry; for I am brought very low: deliver me from my persecutors: for they are stronger than I. 7. Bring my soul out of prison, that I may praise thy name: the righteous shall compass me about; for thou shalt deal bountifully with me.

The psalmist here tells us, for our instruction, 1. How he was disowned and deserted by his friends, v. 4. When he was in favour at court, he seemed to have a great interest, but when the way of his duty, he was made an outcast, and it was dangerous for any body to harbour him, (witness Ahimelech's fate,) then no man would know him, but every body was shy of him. He looked on his right hand for an advocate, (cix. 51.) some friend or other to speak a good word for him. But, since Jonathan's appearing for him had like to have cost him his life, nobody was willing to venture in defence of his innocency, but all were ready to side with the persecutors of the man. He looked round to see if any would open their doors to him, but, refuge failed him, none of all his old friends would give him a night's lodging, or direct him to any place of secrecy and safety. How many good men have been deceived by such swallow-friends, who are gone when winter comes! David's life was exceeding precious, and yet, when he was unjustly proscribed, no man cared for it, nor would move a hand for the protection of it. Herein he was a type PSALMS, CXLIII.

This psalm, as those before, is a prayer, and full of complaints of the great distress and danger he was in, probably when Saul persecuted him. He did not only pray in that affliction, but he prayed very much, and very often, not the same over again, but new thoughts. In this psalm, 1. He complains of his troubles, through the oppression of his enemies, (v. 3.) and the weakness of his spirit under it, which was ready to sink, notwithstanding the likely course he took to support himself, v. 4, 5, 6. He prays, and prays earnestly, v. 6. He would hear him, v. 7, 8. That he would not deal with him according to his sins, v. 2. That he would not hide his face from him, (v. 7.) but manifest his favour to him, v. 10. He might be granted a guide and direct him in the way of his duty, (v. 8, 10.) and quicken him in it, v. 11. That he would deliver him out of his troubles, v. 9, 11. 6. That he would in due time reckon with his persecutors, v. 12. We may more easily accommodate this psalm to ourselves, in the singing of it, because most of the petitions in it are for spiritual blessings, (which we all need at all times,) mercy and grace.

A psalm of David.

1. Heard my prayer, O Lord; give ear to my supplications: in thy faithfulness answer me, and in thy righteousness.

2. And enter not into judgment with thy servant: for in thy sight shall no man living be justified. 3. For the enemy hath persecuted my soul; he hath smitten my life down to the ground: he hath made me to dwell in darkness, as those that have been long dead. 4. Therefore is my spirit overweened within me: my heart within me is desolate. 5. I remember the days of old; I meditate on all thy works: I muse on the work of thy hands. 6. I stretch forth my hands unto thee: my soul thirsteth after thee, as a thirsty land. Selah.

Here, 1. David humbly begs to be heard; (v. 1.) not as if he questioned it, but he earnestly desired it, and was in care about it, for, having directed his prayer, he looked up to see how it sped, Hab. ii. 1. He is a supplicant to his God, and he begs that his prayers and supplications may be heard; Hear my prayer, give ear to my supplications: he is an appellant against his persecutors, and he begs that his case might be brought to hearing, and that God would give judgment upon it, in his faithfulness and righteousness, as the Judge of right and wrong. Or, Answer my petitions in thy faithfulness, according to the promises thou hast made, which thou wilt be just to. We have no righteousness of our own to plead, and therefore must plead God's righteousness, the word of promise, which he has freely given us, and caused us to hope in.

2. He humbly begs not to be proceeded against in strict justice, v. 2. He seems here, if not to correct, yet to explain, his plea, (v. 1.) Deliver me in thy righteousness: "I mean," says he, "the righteous promises of the gospel, not the righteous threatenings of the law; if I be accused, Lord, and dealing with me after the manner of the world, let me be delivered by thee, and not as the world, which shall broken covenant of innocence, I am quite undeserving," and therefore, (1.) His petition is, "Enter not into judgment with thy servant;" do not deal with me in strict justice, as I deserve to be dealt with. "In this prayer, we must own ourselves... to be God's servants, bound to obey him, accountable to him, and responsible to obtain his favour, and we must approve ourselves to him; we must acknowledge that in many instances we have offended him, and have come short of our duty to him; that he might justly inquire into our offenses, and proceed against us for them according to law; and that, if he should do so, judgment would certainly go against us, we have nothing in store or mitigation of it, but execution would be taken out and awarded, and it would be with great displeasure, he would not encourage ourselves with a hope that there is mercy and forgiveness with God, and be carnest with him for the benefit of that mercy. Enter not into judgment with thy servant, for thou hast already entered into judgment with thy Son, and laid upon him the iniquity of us all. Enter not into judgment with thy servant, for thy servant enters into judgment with himself; and if we will judge ourselves, we shall not be judged. (2.) His plea is, In that sight shall no man living be justified upon those terms, for no man can plead innocence nor any righteousness of his own, either that he has not sinned, or that he does not deserve to die for his sins, or that he has any satisfaction of his own to offer; nay, if God contend with us, we are not able to answer him for one of a thousand, Job ix. 3.—xx. 20. David, before he prays for the removal of his trouble, prays for the pardon of his sin, and depends upon more mercy.

3. He complains of the prevalency of his enemies against him; (v. 3.) "Sui, that great enemy, has persecuted my soul, sought my life, with a restless malice, and has carried the persecution so far, that he has already smitten it down to the ground; though I am not yet under ground, I am struck to the ground, and that is next door to it; he has forced me to dwell in darkness, not only in dark caves, but in dark thoughts and apprehensions, and has plunged me into melancholy, as helpless and hopeless as those that have been long dead. Lord, let me find mercy with thee, for I find no mercy with men. They condemn me; but, Lord, do not thou condemn me. Am not I an object of thy compassion, fit to be appeased for; and is not mine enemy an object of thy displeasure, fit to be appeased against?"

4. He bemoans the oppression of his mind, occasioned by the perseverance of his enemies. Therefore is my spirit overpowered and overwhelmed within me, and I am almost plunged in despair; when without are fightings, within are fears, and those fears greater tyrants and oppressors than Saul himself, and not so easily outright. It is sometimes the lot of the best men to have their spirits for a time almost overwhelmed, and their hearts desolate, and doubtless it is their infirmity. David was not only a great saint, but a great soldier, and yet even he was sometimes ready to faint in a day of adversity. Howl, fir-trees, if the cedars be shaken.

5. He applies himself to the use of proper means for the relief of his troubled spirit. He had no force to muster up against the oppression of the enemy, but if he can keep possession of nothing else, he will do what he can to keep possession of his own soul, and to preserve his inward peace. In order to that, he makes up his mind to die daily. Fleeing to God of old. (v. 5.) God's former appearances for his afflicted people, and for him in particular. This has been often a relief to the people of God in their straits, to think of the wonders which their fathers told them of, Ixxxvii. 5, 11. (2.) He looks round, and takes notice of the works of God in the visible creation, and the providential government of the world; I meditate on all thy works. Many see them, but do not see the footsteps of God's wisdom, power, and goodness, in them, and therefore do not receive the benefit they might by them, because they do not meditate upon them; they do not dwell on that copious, curious, subject, but soon quit it, as if they had exhausted it, when they have scarcely touched upon it. I muse on, or, as some read it, I discourse of, the operation of thy hands; how great, how good, it is! The more we consider the power of God, the less we shall fear the face or force of man, Isa. li. 12, 13. (3.) He looks up with earnest desires toward God and his favour; (v. 6.) I stretch forth my hands unto thee, as one begging alms, and I expect no thing great, standing ready to lay hold on it, and bid it welcome; "My soul thirsteth after thee, it is to thee, (so the word is,) entire for thee, intent on thee, it is as a thirsty land, which, being parched with excessive heat, gaps for rain; so do I need, so do I crave, the support and refreshment of divine consolations under mine afflictions, and nothing else will relieve me." This is the best course we can take when our spirits are overwhelmed; and justly do they sink under their load, who will not take such a ready way as this to ease themselves.

7. Hear me speedily, O Lord; my spirit faileth; hide not thy face from me, lest I be like unto them that go down into the pit. 8. Cause me to hear thy loving-kindness in the morning; for in thee do I trust; cause me to know the way wherein I should walk; for I lift up my soul unto thee. 9. Deliver me, O Lord, from mine enemies: I fly unto thee to hide me. 10. Teach me to do thy will; for thou art my God: thy Spirit is good; lead me into the land of uprightness.

11. Quicken me, O Lord, for thy name's sake: for thy righteousness' sake bring my soul out of trouble. 12. And of thy mercy cut off mine enemies, and destroy all them that afflict my soul: for I am thy servant.

David here tells us what he said when he stretched forth his hands unto God; he begins not only as one in earnest, but as one in haste; in fine, as one that is over-persuaded with no less in earnest, or in no less spirit faileth. I am just ready to faint; reach the cordial, quickly, quickly, or I am gone. It was not a haste of unbelief, but of vehement desire and holy love; Make haste, O God, to help me.

Three things David here prays for; 1. The manifestations of God's favour toward him; that God would be well pleased with him, and let him know that he was so; this he prefers before any good. 6. 1. He dreads God's frowns; "Lord, hide not thy face from me; Lord, be not angry with me; do not turn from me, as we do from one we are dissatisfied with; Lord, let me not be left under the apprehensions of thine anger, or in doubt concerning thy favour; if I have thy favour, let it not be hid from me." Those that have the truth of grace, cannot but desire the evidence of it. He pleads the wretchedness of his case, if God withdrew from him; "Lord, let me not lie under thy wrath; for then I am like them that go down to the pit, down to the grave; I am a dead man, weak, and pale, and ghastly; thy frowns are worse than death; or down to hell, the bottomless pit. Even those who through grace are delivered from going down to the pit, may sometimes, when the terrors of the Almighty set themselves in array against them, look like those who are going to the pit. Disconsolate some have sometimes cried out of the wrath of God, as if they had been damned sinners, Job vi. 4. Ps. lxxxvii. 6. 2. He entreats God's favour; cause me to hear thy loving-kindness in the morning. He cannot but think that God has a kindness for him, that he has some kind things to say to him, some good words and comfortable words; but the present hurry of his affairs, and tumult of his spirits, drowned those pleasing whispers; and therefore he begs, "Lord, do not only speak kindly to me, but cause me to hear it, to hear joy and gladness of heart in the morning; and by this and by thy providence, and in both we should desire and shun to hear his loving-kindness," (c. iv.) that we may set that always before us; "Cause me to hear it in the morning, every morning; let my waking thoughts be of God's loving-kindness, that the sweet relish of that may abide upon my spirits all the day long." His plea is, "For thee do I trust, and in thee only; I look not for comfort in any other." It is a usual thing for God's goodness to be wrought for those who trust in him, (xxxii. 8.) who by faith draw it out.

II. The operations of God's grace in him. Those he is as earnest for, as for the tokens of God's favour to him, and so should we be. He prays; 1. That he might be enlightened with the knowledge of God's will; and this is the first work of the Spirit, in order to his other works; for God deals with men as men, as rulers over the nations are the rulers of their posterity, and this is the effect. (1.) Cause me to know the way wherein I should walk. Sometimes, those that are much in care to walk right are in doubt and in the dark which is the right way. Let them come boldly to the throne of grace, and beg of God, by his word, and Spirit, and providence, to show them the way, and prevent their missing it. A good man does not ask what is the way in which he must walk, or in which is the most pleasant walking, but what is the right way, the way in which he should walk. He pleads, "I lift up my soul unto thee, to be moulded and fashioned according to thy will." He did not only importunately, but impartially, desire to know his duty; and those that do so shall be taught. (2.) "Teach me to do thy will; not only show me what thy will is, but teach me how to do it, how to turn my hand dexterously to my duty." It is the desire and endearment of all God's faithful servants, and it is their duty, to do his will that he may be pleased with and approved of. His plea is, "Thou art my God, and therefore my Oracle, by whom I may expect to be advised; my God, and therefore my Ruler, whose will I desire to do." If we do in sincerity take God for our God, we may depend upon him to teach us to do his will, as a master does his servant. (3.) Lead me into the land of uprightness, into the communion of saints, that pleasant land of the upright; or, into a settled course of holy living, which will lead to heaven, that land of uprightness, where holiness will be in perfection, and he that is holy shall be holy still. We should desire to be led, and kept safe, to heaven, not only because it is a land of blessedness, but because it is a land of uprightness; it is the perfection of grace. We cannot find the way that will bring us to that land, unless God show us; nor go in that way, unless he take us by the hand and lead us, as we lead those that are weak, or lame, or preconcerted, or dim-sighted; so necessary is the grace of God, not only to put us into the good way, but to keep us up, and carry us on, in it. The plea is, "Thy Spirit is good, and able to make me good," good and willing to help those that are at a loss. Let thy good Spirit lead me, so some read it. They that have the Lord for their God have his Spirit for their Guide; and it is both their character and their privilege that they are led by the Spirit of God.

2. He prays that he might be enabled to do his will; (v. 11.) "Quicken me, O Lord; quicken my graces, that they may be active, quicken my devotions, that they may be lively, quicken me to my duty, and quicken me in it, and this for thy name's sake." The best saints often find themselves dull, and dead, and slow, and therefore pray to God to quicken them.

III. The appearance of God's providence for him; that God would, in his own way and time, 1. Give him rest from his troubles; (v. 5.) "Deliver me, O Lord, from mine enemies, that they may not have their will against me; for I fly unto thee to hide me; I trust to thee to defend me in my trouble, and therefore to rescue me out of it." Preservations are pledges of salvation, and those shall find God their Hiding-Place, who by faith make him such. He explains himself, (v. 11.) "For thy righteousness-sake, bring my soul out of trouble; for thy promise, sake, nay, for thy mercy-sake," (for some by righteousness understand kindness and goodness.) "Do not only deliver me from my outward, but from the trouble of my soul, the trouble that threatens to overwhelm my spirit. Whatever trouble I am in, Lord, let not my heart be troubled," John iv. 1. 2. That he would reckon with those that were the instruments of his trouble; (v. 12.) "Of thy mercy to me, cut off mine enemies, that I may be no longer in fear of them; and destroy all them, whoever they be, how numerous, how powerful, how determined, how active in their wickedness, and with execution to that; for I am thy servant, and am resolved to continue such, and therefore may expect to be owned and protected in thy service." This prayer is a prophecy of the utter destruction of all the impenitent enemies of Jesus Christ and his kingdom, who will not have him to reign over them, who grieve his Spirit and afflict his soul, by afflicting his people, in whose afflictions he is afflicted.

PSALM CXLIV.

The four preceding psalms seem to have been penned by David before his accession of kingdom, when he was persecuted by Saul; this seems to have been penned after, when he was still in trouble, (for there is no condition in this world privileged with an exemption from trouble,) the neighbouring nations molesting him and giving him disturbance, especially the Philistines, 2 Sam. v. 17. In this psalm, 1. He acknowledges, with triumph and thankfulness, the great goodness of God to him in advancing him to the government, v. 1-4. He prays for the prosperity of his own kingdom, and pleasure himself with the hopes of it, v. 5-12. In singing this psalm, we may give God the glory of our spiritual privileges and advancements, and fetch in help from him against our spiritual enemies; we may pray for the prosperity of our souls, of our families, and of our land; and, in the opinion of some of the Jewish writers, we may refer the psalm to the Messiah and his kingdom.

A psalm of David.

1. BLESSED be the Lord my strength, which teacheth my hands to war, and my fingers to fight: 2. My goodness, and my fortress; my high tower, and my deliverer; my shield, and he in whom I trust, who subdueth my people under me. 3. LORD, what is man, that thou takest knowledge of him? or the son of man, that thou makest account of him? 4. Man is like to vanity: his days are as a shadow that passeth away. 5. Bow thy heavens, O Lord, and come down: touch the mountains, and they shall smoke. 6. Cast forth lightning and scatter them: shoot out thine arrows and destroy them. 7. Send thy hand from above; rid me, and deliver me out of great waters, from the hand of strange children; 8. Whose mouth speaketh vanity; and their right hand is a right hand of falsehood.

Here, 1. David acknowledges his dependence upon God, and his obligations to him, v. 1, 2. A prayer for further mercy is fitly begun with a thanksgiving for former mercy; and when we are waiting upon God to bless us, we should stir ourselves to bless him. He gives to God the glory of two things: 2. What he was to him, so may he be the Lord my Rock, (v. 1.) my Goodness, my Fortress, v. 2. He has in the covenant engaged himself to be so, and encouraged us, accordingly, to depend upon him; all the saints, who by faith have made him theirs, have found him not only to answer, but to outdo, their expectations. David speaks it here as the matter of his trust, and that which made him easy; as the matter of his triumph, and that which made him glad, and in which he gloried. See how he multiplies words to express the satisfaction he had in God, and his interest in him. (1.) "He is my Strength, on whom I stay, and from whom I have power both for my work and for my warfare; my Rock to build on, to take shelter in." Even when we are weak, we may be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might. (2.) "My Goodness; not only good to me, but my chief Good, in whose favour I place my felicity, and who is the Author of all the goodness that is in me, and from whom comes every good and perfect gift." (3.) "My Fortress, and my high Tower, in whom I think myself as safe as ever any prince thought himself in a castle or strong-hold." David had formerly sheltered himself in strong-holds at En-gedi, (1 Sam. xxvii. 29.) which perhaps were natural fastnesses. He had lately made himself master of the strong-hold, the fortification, which was fortified by art, and he esteemed it the more when he could say, "So dwelt I in the fort;" (2 Sam. v. 7, 9.) but he depends not on these. 2. "Lord," says he, "thou art my Fortress, and my high Tower." The divine attributes and promises are fortifications to a believer, far exceeding those either of nature or art. (4.) My Deliverer, and, as it is in the original, very emphatically, my Deliverer to me; "not only a Deliverer I have interest in, but who is always nigh unto me, and ever liveth, and is a Prince of life." (5.) My Shield, to guard me against all the malignant darts that mine enemies let fly at me; not only my Fortress at home, but my Shield abroad in the field of battle. Wherever a believer goes, he carries his protection along with him. Fear not, Abram, I am thy Shield. 2. What he had done for him. He was bred a shepherd, and seemeth to have been designed by his parents for that calling, but. (1.) God had made him a soldier; his hands had been used to the crook, and his fingers to the harp, but God taught his hands to war, and his fingers to fight, because he designed him for Israel's champion; and what God calls men to, he either finds them, or makes them, fit for. Let the men of war give God the glory of all their military skill; the same that teaches the art of war has taught the greatest general his. It is pity that any, whose fingers God has taught to fight, should fight against him or his kingdom among men. Those have special reason to acknowledge God with thankfulness, who prove to be qualified for services which they themselves never thought of. (2.) God had made him a sovereign prince, had taught him to wield the sceptre as well as the sword, to rule as well as fight, the harder and nobler art of the two; He subdued my people under me. The providence of God is to be acknowledged in making people subject to their prince, and so preserving the order and benefit of societies. There was a special hand of God inchaing the people of Israel to be subject to David, putting a public yoke of bondage upon them, and it was typical of that great state of captivity, the bringing of souls into subjection to the Lord Jesus, and making them willing in the day of his power.

II. He admires God's condescension to man, and to himself in particular; (v. 3, 4.) "Lord, what is man, what a poor little thing is he, that thou tookst knowledge of him! that thou makest account of him! that he falls so much under thy cognizance, and care, and that thou hast such a tender regard to any of that mean and worthless race, as thou hast had to me!" Considering the many disgrace which the human nature lies under, we have reason to admire the honours God has put upon mankind in general, (the saints especially, some in a particular manner, as David,) and upon the Messiah, (to whom those words are applied, Heb. ii. 6.) who was therefore highly exalted, because he humbled himself to be found in fashion as a man, and therefore has authority to execute judgment, because he is the Son of man. A question to this purport David asked, (Ps. viii. 4.) and there he illustrated the wonder by the consideration of the great dignity God has placed man in; (v. 5.) Thou hast crowned him with glory and honour. Here he illustrates it by the consideration of the meaness and mortality of man, notwithstanding the dignity put upon him; (v. 4.) Man is like to vanity, so frail is he, so weak, so helpless, compassed about with so many infirmities, and his continuance here so very short and uncertain, that he is as like as may be to vanity itself. Nay, he is vanity, he is so at his best estate. His days have little substance in them, considering how many of the thoughts and cares of an immortal soul are employed about a poor dying body: they are as a shadow, that passeth away, and the shadow of that which passeth away, and when that sets, resolving itself into all shadow. They are as a shadow that passeth away, and there is no loss of it. David puts himself into the number of those that are thus mean and despicable. 3. He begs of God to strengthen him, and give him success against the enemies that invaded him, v. 5.-8. He does not specify who they were that he had to contend with, any more than the form of the besieging army, (v. 1.) but it is evident that David knew whom he meant, though he did not name them. But afterward he describes them; (v. 7, 8.) "They are strange children, Philistines, aliens, bad neighbours to Israel, heathens whom we are bound to be strange to, and not to make any leagues with; and who therefore carry it strangely towards us." Notwithstanding the advantages with which God had blessed David's arms against them, there were vexations, inconveniences, that he could put no confidence in; one cannot take their word, for their mouth speaketh vanity; may, if they give their hand upon it, or offer their hand to help you, there is no trusting them; for their right hand is a right hand of falsehood; against such as these we cannot defend ourselves, but may depend on the God of truth and justice, who hates falsehood, to defend us from them.

1. David prays that God would appear, that he would do something extraordinary, for the conviction of those who preferred their dunghill-deities before the God of Israel; (v. 5.) "Bow thy heavens, O Lord, and make it evident that they are indeed thine, and that thou art the Lord of them, Isa. lxiv. 1. Let thy providence threaten mine enemies, and look black upon them, as the clouds do on the earth, when they are thick, and shine very low, big with a storm. Fight against them that fight against us, so that it may visibly appear thou art for us. Touch the mountains, our strong and stately enemies, and let them smoke. Show thyself by the ministry of thy angels, as thou didst upon mount Sinai. 2. Thou wast wroth against his enemies; that he would fight from heaven against them, as sometimes he had done, by lightnings, which are his arrows, his fiery darts, against which the hardest steel is no armour of proof; so penetrating is the force of lightning: that he himself would shoot these arrows, who, we are sure, never misses his mark, but hits where he aims.

3. That he would appear for him, v. 7. He begs for their destruction, in order to his deliverance and theirs. Ps. cxxv. 7. 'Send thy hand, thy power, from above, for that way we look for help; rid me, and deliver me out of these: great waters that are ready to overwhelm me.' God's time to help his people is when they are sinking, and all other helps fail.

9. I will sing a new song unto thee, O God: upon a psaltery, and an instrument of ten strings, will I sing praises unto thee. 10. It is he that giveth salvation unto kings; who delivereth David his servant from the hurtful sword. 11. Rid me, and deliver me from the hand of strange children, whose mouth speaketh vanity, and their right hand is a right hand of falsehood: 12. That our sons may be as plants grown up in their youth; that our daughters may be as corner-stones, polished after the similitude of a palace:

13. That our garners may be full, affording all manner of store; that our sheep may bring forth thousands and ten thousands in our streets: 14. That our oxen may be strong to labour; that there be no breaking in, nor going out; that there be no complaining in our streets. 15. Happy is that people that is in such a case: yea, happy is that people whose God is the Lord.

The method is the same in this latter part of the psalm, as in the former; he first gives glory to God, and then begs mercy from him.

1. He praiseth God for the experiences he had had of his goodness to him, and the encouragements he had to expect further mercy from him, v. 9, 10. In the midst of his complaints concerning the power and treachery of his enemies, here is a holy exaltation in his God: I will sing a new song to thee, O God; a song of praise for new mercies, for those compassions that are new every morning. Fresh favours call for fresh returns of thanks; nay, we must praise God for the mercies we hope for by his promise, as well as those we have received by his providence, 2 Chron. xx. 20, 21. He will join music with his songs of praise, to express and excite his holy joy in God; he will praise God upon a psaltery of ten strings, in the best manner, thinking all little enough, to set forth the praises of God. He tells us what this new song shall be; (v. 10.) It is he that giveth salvation unto kings. This intimates, 1. That great kings cannot save themselves without him. Kings have their life-guards, and have armies at command, and all the means of safety that can be devised; but, after all, it is God that gives them their salvation, and secures them by those means, which he could do, if there were occasion, without them. xxxiii. 16. Kings are the protectors of their people, but it is God that is their Protector. How much service do they owe him, then, with their power, who gives them all their salvation! 2. That good kings, who are his ministers for the good of their subjects, shall be protected and saved by him. He has engaged to give the salvation of his people to the king; and so the king is his peculiar and rule for him; witness the great things he had done for David his servant, whom he had many a time delivered from the hurtful sword, to which Saul's malice, and his own zeal for the service of his country, had often exposed him. This may refer to Christ the Son of David, and then it is a new song indeed, a New Testament song; God delivered him from the hurtful sword, upheld him as his servant, and brought him off a Conqueror over all the powers of darkness. Ps. cxlv. 8. To him he gave salvation, not for himself only, but for us, raising him up to be a Horn of salvation.

II. He prays for the continuance of God's favour.

1. That he might be delivered from the public enemies, v. 11. Here he repeats his prayer and plea, v. 7, 8. His persecutors were still of the same character, false and perfidious, and who would certainly over-reach an honest man, and be too hard for him; 'Therefore, Lord, do thou deliver me from them, for I am a stranger among them.' 2. That he might see the public peace and prosperity: 'Lord, let us have victory, that we may have quietness; which we shall never have while our enemies have it in their power to do us mischief.'

David, as a king, here speaks the earnest desire he had of the welfare of his people; wherein he was a type of Christ, who provides effectually for the good of his chosen. We have here,

[1.] A hopeful prophecy; (v. 12.) 'That our sons and our daughters may be in all respects such as we could wish.' He means not those only of his own family, but those of his subjects, that are the seed of the next generation. It adds much to the comfort and happiness of parents in this world, to see their children promising, and likely to do well. First, It is pleasant to see our sons as plants grown up in their youth, as olive plants, (cxxviii. 5.) the father's knife that, as he looks on them, doth rejoice in them as plants, not as weeds, not as thorns; to see them as plants growing great, not withered and blasted; to see them of a healthful constitution, a quick capacity, a strongly disposition, and especially of a pious inclination, likely to bring forth fruit unto God in their day; to see them in their youth, their growing time, increasing in every thing that is good, growing wiser and better, till they grow strong in spirit. Secondly, It is no less desirable to see our daughters as corner-stones, or corner-pillars, polished after the similitude of a palace or temple. By daughters families are united and connected, to their mutual strength, as the parts of a building are by the corner-stones; and when they are graceful and beautiful both in body and mind, they are then polished after the similitude of a noble and curious structure. When we see our daughters well established and stayed with wisdom and discretion, as corner-stones are fastened in the building, when we see them by faith united to Christ, as the chief Corner-stone, adorned with the graces of God's Spirit, which are the polishing of that which is naturally rough, and become women professing godliness, when we see them purified and consecrated to God as living temples, we think ourselves happy in them

[2.] Great plenty. Numerous families increase the care, perhaps more than the comfort, where there is not sufficient for their maintenance; and therefore he prays for a growing estate with a growing family. First, That their store-houses might be replenished with the fruits and products of the earth; That our garners may be full, like those of the good householder, who brings out of them things new and old; those things that are best new, he has in that state; those that are best when they are kept, he has in that state; that we may have in them all manner of stores, for ourselves and our friends; that, living plentifully, we may live not luxuriously, for then we abuse our plenty, but cheerfully and usefully; that, having abundance, we may be thankful to God, generous to our friends, and charitable to the poor; otherwise, what profit is it to have our garners full? Sam. v. 3. Secondly, That their flocks might greatly increase. That the sheep might bring forth their lambs, and ten thousands, in our folds. Much of the wealth of their country consisted in their flocks; (Prov. xxvii. 26.) and of ours too, else wool would not be, as it is, a staple commodity. The increase of our cattle is a blessing in which God is to be acknowledged. Thirdly, That their beasts designed for service might be fit for it; That our oxen may be strong to labour in the plough; that they may be fatted, and furnished in good working case. We were none of us made to idle, and therefore we should pray for bodily health, not that we may be easy and take our pleasures, but that we may be strong to labour, that we may do the work of our place and day, else we are worse than the beasts; for when they are strong, it is for labour.

[3.] An uninterrupted peace. First, That there be no war; no breaking in of invaders, no going out of deserters. In another sense, the peace in us, let us not have occasion to march out against them. War brings with it abundance of mischiefs, whether it be offensive or defensive. Secondly, That there be no oppression or faction, no complaining in our streets; that the people may have no cause to complain, either of their government or of one another; nor may be so peevish as to complain without cause. It is desirable thus to dwell in quiet habitations.

(2.) His reflection upon this description of the prosperity of the nation which he so much desired; (v. 15.) Happy are the people that are in such a case; but it is seldom so, and never long; yea, happy are the people whose God is the Lord. The relation of a people to God as theirs, is here spoken of, either, (1.) As that which is the fountain whence all those blessings flow. Happy are the Israelites, if they faithfully adhere to the Lord as their God, for it is implied that they expect to be in such a case. No piety commonly brings national prosperity; for nations, as such, in their national capacity, are capable of rewards and punishments only in this life. Or, (2.) As that which is abundantly preferable to all these enjoyments. The psalmist began to say, as most do, Happy are the people that are in such a case; they are blessed that prosper in the world; but he immediately corrects himself, Yea, rather, happy are the people whose God is the Lord, who have his favour and love and grace, according to the tenor of the covenant, though they have not abundance of this world's goods. As all this, and much more, cannot make us happy unless the Lord be our God, so, if he be, the want of this, the less of this, nay, the reverse of this, cannot make us miserable.

The five foregoing psalms were all of a piece, all full of prayers; this, and the five that follow to the end of the book, are all of a piece too, all full of praises; and though this is another psalm, as it is not so much for prayer, as there is not so much room to think but that they were all his, as well as all the foregoing prayers. And it is observable, 1. That after five psalms of prayer, follow six psalms of praise; for those that are not to be desired of for prayer, and those that have sped in prayer, must abound in praise. Our thanksgiving for mercy, when we have received it, should even exceed our supplications for it, when we were in pursuit of it. David in the last of his begging psalms, had promised to praise God, (cxlvi. 9.) and here he performs his promise. 2. That the book of Psalms concludes with psalms of praise, all praise, for praise is the conclusion of the whole matter, it is that in which all the psalms centre. And it intimates, that God's people, toward the close of this life, should abound much in praise, and the rather, because, at the end of all things, they hope to remove to the world of everlasting praise; and the nearer they come to heaven, the more they should accentuate themselves to the work of heaven. This is one of the things which comprehends all the rest, (as Ps. xxv. and xxxiv, &c.) that it might be the more easily committed to memory, and kept in mind. The Jewish writers justly extol this psalm as a star of the first magnitude; and this may be a reason why some of them have an extravagant saying concerning it, not much unlike some of the popish superstitions, That whoever will sing this psalm constantly three times a day, shall certainly be happy in the world to come. In this psalm, 1. David engages himself and others to praise God, v. 1, 2, 4, 7, 10, 12. 11. He fastens upon those things that are proper matter for praise; God's greatness, (v. 3.) his goodness, (v. 8.) the proofs of both in the administration of his kingdom, (v. 13.) the kingdom of providence, (v. 14., 16.) the kingdom of grace; (v. 17., 20.) and then he concludes with a resolution to continue praising God, (v. 21.) with which resolution our hearts must be filled, and in which they must be fixed, in singing this psalm.

David's psalm of praise.

1. I will extol thee, my God, O King; and I will bless thy name for ever and ever. 2. Every day will I bless thee, and I will praise thy name for ever and ever. 3. Great is the Lord, and greatly to be praised; and his greatness is unsearchable. 4. One generation shall praise thy works to another, and shall declare thy mighty acts. 5. I will speak of the glorious honour of thy majesty, and of thy wondrous works. 6. And men shall speak of the might of thy terrible acts: and I will declare thy greatness. 7. They shall abundantly utter the memory of thy great goodness, and shall sing of thy righteousness. 8. The Lord is gracious, and full of compassion; slow to anger, and of great mercy. 9. The Lord is good to all; and his tender mercies are over all his works.

The entitling of this, David's psalm of praise, may intimate not only that he was the psalmist of it, but that he took a particular pleasure in it, and sung it often; it was his companion wherever he went. In the former part of the psalm, God's glorious attributes are praised, as in the latter part of the psalm, his kingdom and the administration of it. Observe, I. Who shall be employed in giving glory to God. 1. Whatever others do, the psalmist will himself be much in praising God. To this good work he here excites himself, engages himself, and has his heart much enlarged in it. What he does, that he will do, having more and more satisfaction in it; it was his delight. Observe, 2. How he expresses the work itself; I will extol thee, and bless thy name; (v. 1.) "I will speak well of thee, as thou hast made thyself known, and will therein express my own high thoughts of thee, and endeavour to raise the like in others." When we speak honourably of God, this is graciously interpreted and accepted as an extolling of him. Again, (v. 2.) "I will bless thee, I will praise thy name." The poet intimates the frequency of his affection in this work, the fixedness of his purpose to adorn it in, and the frequency of his performances therein.
Again, (v. 5.) I will speak of thine honour; and, (v. 6.) I will declare thy greatness. He would give glory to God, not only in his solemn devotions, but in his common conversation. If the heart be full of God, out of the abundance of that which mouth we speak, with reverence, to his praise, upon all occasions. What subject of discourse can we find more noble, more copious, more pleasant, useful, and unexceptionable, than the glory of God? (2.) How he expresses his resolution to persevere in it. [1.] He will be constant to this work; Every day will I bless thee. Praising God must be our daily work. No day must pass through ever so long a day, though ever so sorrowful a day, without praising God; we ought to reckon it the most needful of our daily employments, and the most delightful of our daily concerns. God is every day blessing us, doing well for us; there is therefore reason that we should be every day blessing him, speaking well of him. [2.] He will continue in it; I will bless thee for ever and ever, (v. 1.) and again, v. 2. This intimates, First, That he resolved to continue in this to the end of his life, throughout his ever in this world. Secondly, That the psalms he penned should be made use of in praising God by the church to the end of time, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 30. Thirdly, That he hoped to be praising God to all eternity in the other world. They that make it their constant work on earth, shall have it their everlasting bliss in heaven.

2. He doubts not but others also would be forward to this work. (1.) "They shall concur in it now; they shall join with me in it; when I declare thy greatness, men shall speak of it, (v. 6.) they shall abundantly utter it," (v. 7.) or pour it out, as the word is; they shall praise God with a gracious fluency, better than the most curious oratory. David's zeal would provoke many, and it has done so. (2.) "They shall keep it up, when I am gone, in an uninterrupted succession; (v. 4.) One generation shall praise thy works to another." The generation that is gone off shall tell them to that which is rising up, shall tell what they have seen in their days, and what they have heard from their fathers; they shall fully and particularly declare thy mighty acts; (lxxxviii. 3.) and the generation that is rising up shall follow the example of that which is going off; so that the death of God's worshippers shall be no diminution of his worship; for a new generation shall rise up in their stead to carry on that good work, more or less, to the end of time, when it shall be left to that world to do it in, in which there is no succession of generations.

II. What we must give to God the glory of.

1. Of his greatness, and his great works. We must declare, Great is the Lord, his presence infinite, his power irresistible, his brightness insupportable, his majesty awful, his dominion boundless, and his sovereignty contestable; and therefore there is no dispute, but Great is the Lord, and if great, then greatly to be praised, with all that is within us, to the utmost of our power, and with all the circumstances of solemnity imaginably. His greatness indeed cannot be comprehended, for it is unspeakable; who can conceive, or express, how great God is! But then it is so much the more to be praised, when we cannot, by searching, find the bottom, when we know not the brink, and adore the depth, Rom. xi. 33. God is great; (1.) His majesty is glorious in the upper world, above the heavens, where he has set his glory; and when we are declaring his greatness, we must not fail to speak of the glorious honour of his majesty, the splendour of the glory of his majesty, v. 5. How bright he shines in the upper world, so as to dazzle the eyes of the angels themselves, and oblige them to cover their faces, as unable to bear the lustre of it. (2.) His works are wondrous in this lower world; the preservation, maintenance, and government, of all the creatures, speak the Creator very great. When therefore we declare his greatness, we must observe the unquestionable proofs of it, and must declare his works. (4.) Speak of his wondrous works, (v. 5.) the might of his terrible grace; we must see God acting and working in all the affairs of this lower world; various instruments are used, but in all events God is the supreme Director; it is he that performs all things. Much of his power is seen in the operations of his providence; they are mighty acts, such as cannot be paralleled by the strength of any creature; and much of his justice, they are terrible acts, awful to saints, dreadful to sinners. Then we would have all occasions to speak of, observing the finger of God, his hand, his arm, in all, that we may marvel.

2. Of his goodness; this is his glory, Exod. xxxiii. 19. It is what he glories in, (Exod. xxxiv. 6, 7.) and it is what we must give him the glory of; They shall abundantly utter the memory of thy great goodness, v. 7. God's goodness is great goodness, the treasures of it can never be exhausted, nay, they can never be lessened, for he will ever be as rich in mercy as he ever was. In that goodness, it is what we ought always to lay before us, always to have in mind, and preserve the memorials of; for it is worthy to be had in everlasting remembrance: and the memory we have of God's goodness we should utter, we should abundantly utter, as those who are full of it, very full of it, and desire that others may be acquainted and affected with it. But, whenever we utter God's great goodness, we must not forget, at the same time, to sing of his righteousness; for as he is gracious in regarding those that serve him faithfully, so he is righteous in punishing those that rebel against him. Impartial and inflexible justice is as surely in God as inexhaustible goodness; and we must sing of both together, Rom. xi. 22.

(1.) There is a fountain of goodness in God's nature; (v. 8.) The Lord is gracious to those that serve him, he is full of compassion to those that need him, slow to anger to those that have offended him, and of great mercy to all that seek him, and sue to him. He is ready to give, and ready to forgive, more ready than we are to ask, than we are to repent.

(2.) There are streams of goodness in all the dispensations of his providence, v. 9. As he is good, so he does good; he is good to all, to all his creatures, from the highest angels to the meanest worm; to all but devils and damned sinners, that have shut themselves out from his goodness. His tender mercies are over all his works. (1.) All his works, all his creatures, receive the fruits of his merciful care and bounty; it is extended to them all, he hastes nothing that he has made. (2.) The works of his mercy outshine all his other works, and declare him more than any of them. In nothing will the memory of God be for ever so illustrious, as in the vessels of mercy ordained to glory. To the divine goodness will the everlasting hallelujahs of all the saints be sung.

10. All thy works shall praise thee, O Lord; and thy saints shall bless thee. 1. They shall speak of the glory of thy kingdom, and talk of thy power; 12. To make known to the sons of men his mighty acts, and the glorious majesty of his kingdom. 13. Thy kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and thy dominion endureth throughout all generations. 14. The Lord upholdeth all that fall.
and raiseth up all those that be bowed down. 15. The eyes of all wait upon thee; and thou givest their meat in due season. 16. Thou openest thy hand, and satisfishest the desire of every living thing. 17. The Lord is righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works. 18. The Lord is nigh unto all them that call upon him, to all that call upon him in truth. 19. He will fulfill the desire of them that fear him: he also will hear their cry, and will save them. 20. The Lord preserveth all them that love him: but all the wicked will he destroy. 21. My mouth shall speak the praise of the Lord: and let all flesh bless his holy name for ever and ever.

The greatness and goodness of God is optimus et maximus—the best and greatest of beings, were celebrated in the former part of the psalm; here, in these verses, we are taught to give him the glory of his kingdom, in the administration of which his greatness and goodness shine so clear, so very bright. Observe, as before.

1. From whom the tribute of praise is expected? (v. 13.) All God's works shall praise him; they all minister to us to matter for praise, and so praise him according to their capacity; even those that refuse to give him honour, he will get him honour upon; but his saints do bless him, not only as they have peculiar blessings from him, which other creatures have not, but as they praise him actively, while his other works praise him only objectively. They bless him, for they collect the rent and tribute of praise from the inferior creatures, and pay it into the treasury above. All God's works do praise him, as the beautiful building praises the builder, or the well-drawn picture praises the painter; but his saints bless him, as the children of prudent tender parents rise up and call them blessed. Of all God's works, the saints, the workmanship of his grace, the first-fruits of his creatures, have most reason to bless him.

2. For what this praise is to be given; They shall speak of thy kingdom. The kingdom of God among men is a thing to be often thought of, and often spoken of. As, before, he had magnified God's greatness and goodness in general, so, here, he magnifies them with application to his kingdom. Consider then,

1. The greatness of his kingdom; it is great indeed, for all the kings and kingdoms of the earth are under his control. To show the greatness of God's kingdom, he observes, (1.) The pomp of it. Would we by faith look within the veil, we should see, and believing, we should speak of, the glory of his kingdom, (v. 11.) the glorious majesty of it, (v. 12.) for he has prepared his throne in the heavens, and it is high and lifted up, and surrounded with an innumerable company of angels. The courts of Solomon and Absaureus were magnificent; but, compared with the glorious majesty of God's kingdom, they were but as glow-worms to the sun. The consideration of this should strike an awe upon us in all our approaches to God. (2.) The power of it; When they speak of the glory of God's kingdom, they must talk of his power; the extent of it, the efficacy of it, the ability and power to do a thing, and do every thing he pleases; (v. 11.) and, as a proof of it, let them make known his mighty acts, (v. 12.) that the sons of men may be invited to yield themselves his willing subjects, and so put themselves under the protection of such a mighty Poten-
1. PRAISE ye the Lord. Praise the Lord, O my soul. 2. While I live will I praise the Lord: I will sing praises unto my God while I have any being. 3. Put not your trust in princes, nor in the son of man, in whom there is no help. 4. His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth, in that very day his thoughts perish.

David is supposed to have penned this psalm; and he was himself a prince, a mighty prince; as such, it might be thought,

1. That he should be exempted from the service of praising God, that it was enough for him to see that his priests and people did it, but that he needed no other service to that end. If it be of nature, (ver. 2.) I thought it a disparagement to him to dance before the ark; but he was so far from being of this mind, that he will himself be first and foremost in the work, v. 1. 2. He thinks his dignity is so far from excusing him from it, that it rather obliged him to lead in it; and that it was so far from lessening him, that it really magnified him; therefore he stirs up himself to it, and makes a business of it. Where the argument is in God's part, he wants nothing to abide by it; “I will praise him with my heart, I will sing praises to him with my mouth. Herein I will have an eye to him as the Lord, infinitely blessed and glorious in himself, and as my God, in covenant with me.” Then praise is most pleasant, when, in praising God, we have an eye to him as ours, whom we have an interest in, and stand in relation to. “This I will do constantly while I live every day of my life, and to my life’s end also. I will do it while I have any being; for when I have no being on earth, I hope to have a being in heaven, a better being, to be doing it better.” That which is the great end of our being, ought to be our great employment and delight while we have any being; “In thee must our time and powers be spent.”

2. It might be thought that he himself, having been so great a blessing to his country, should be allowed, according to the usage of the heathen nations, who deified their heroes; that they should all come and trust in his shadow, and make him their stay and strong hold. “No,” says David, “Put not your trust in princes, (v. 3.) net in me, nor in any other; do not repose your confidence in them, do not raise your expectations from them. Be not too sure of their sincerity, some have thought they knew better how to reign by knowing how to dissemble; be not too sure of their constancy and fidelity, it is possible they may both change their minds and break their words.” But though we suppose them wise and good as David himself, yet we must not be too sure of their ability and continuance, for they are sons of Adam, weak and mortal. There is indeed a Son of man in whom there is help, in whom there is salvation, and who will not fail those that trust in him. But all other sons of men are like the man they are sprung of, who, being in honour, did not abide.

1. Without our being able to be sure of our ability; even the power of kings may be so straitened, cramped, and weakened, that they may not be in a capacity to do that for which we expect. David himself owned, (2 Sam. iii. 39.) I am this day weak, though anointed king. So that in the son of man there is often no help, no salvation; he is at a loss, at his wit’s end, as a man anonised and, then, though a mighty man, he cannot save his life. 9. (2.) We cannot be sure of their continuance. Suppose he has it in his power to help us while he lives, yet he may be suddenly taken off when we expect most from him; (v. 4.) His breath goeth forth, so it does every moment, and comes back again, but that is an intimation that it will shortly go for good and all, and then he returns to his earth. He is his earth, in respect of his original as a man, the earth out of which he was taken, and to which therefore he must return, according to the sentence, Gen. iii. 19. It is he, if he be a worldly man, in respect of choice, his earth which he has chosen for his portion, and on the things of which he has set his affections. He shall go to his own place. Or rather, it is his earth, because of the property he has in it; and, though he has had large possessions on earth, a grave is all that will remain to him. The earth God has given to the children of men, and great strength thereof, is a part of the Lord of their authority, men call their lands by their own names. But, after a while, no part of the earth will be their own, but that in which the dead body shall make its bed, and that shall be theirs while the earth remains. But when he returns to his earth, in that very day his thoughts perish; all the projects and designs he had of kindness to us, vanish and are gone; and he cannot take one step further in them; all his purposes are cut short, and therefore we are to know, that none of those things can come to pass, which of ourselves we imagine on earth, or which comes of our expectations from him? Princes are mortal, as well as other men, and therefore we cannot have that assurance of help from them, which we may have from that Potentate who hath immortality. Cease from man, whose breath is in his nostrils, and will not be there long.

5. Happy is he that hath the God of Jacob for his help, whose hope is in the Lord his God; 6. Which made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that therein is; which keepeth truth for ever; 7. Which executeth judgment for the oppressed; which giveth food to the hungry. The Lord looseth the prisoners. 8. The Lord openeth the eyes of the blind: the Lord raiseth them that are bowed down: the Lord loveth the righteous. 9. The Lord preserveth the strangers, he revealeth the fatherless and widow: but the way of the wicked he turneth upside down. 10. The Lord shall reign for ever, even thy God, O Zion, unto all generations. Praise ye the Lord.

The psalmist, having cautioned us not to trust in princes, (because, if we do, we shall be miserably disappointed,) here encourages us to put our confidence in God, because, if we do so, we shall be happily secured. Happy is he that has the God of Jacob for his Help, that has an interest in his attributes and promises, and has them engaged for him; and whose hope is in the Lord his God. Those shall have God for their Help, 1. Who take him for their God, and serve and worship him accordingly. 2. Who have their hope in him, and live a life of dependence upon him; who have good thoughts of him, and encourage themselves in him, when all other supports fail. Every believer may look upon him as the God of Jacob, of the church in general, and therefore may expect relief from him, in reference thereunto, and as he is God in particular, and therefore may depend upon him in all personal wants and straits. We must hope, (1.) In the providence of God, for all the good things we need, which relate to the life that now is. (2.) In the grace of Christ, for all the good things which relate to the life that is to come. To this especially the learned Dr. Hammond refers this and the following verses, looking upon the latter part of this psalm to have a most visible remarkable aspect toward the eternal Son of God in his incarnation. He quotes one of the rabbins, who says of v. 10. that it belongs to the days of the Messiah. And that it does so, he thinks will appear by comparing v. 7, 8. with the characters of Christ, and of the Messiah; (Matth. x. 5, 6.) The blind receive their sight, the lame walk; and the closing words there, Blessed is he whose word shall be offended in me, he thinks may very well be supposed to refer to v. 5. Happy is the man that hopes in the Lord his God, and who is not offended in him.

Let us take a view of the mighty encouragements here given us to hope in the Lord our God.

1. He is the Maker of the world, and therefore has all power in himself, and the command of the powers of all the creatures, which, being derived from him, depend upon him; (v. 6.) He made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and therefore his arm is not shortened, that it cannot save. It is very applicable to Christ, by whom God made the world, and without whom was not any thing made that was made. It is a great support to faith, that the Redeemer of the world is the same that was the Creator of it, and therefore has a good-will to it, a perfect knowledge of its case, and power to help it.

2. He is a God of inviolable fidelity. We may venture to take God's word, for he keepeth truth for ever, and therefore no word of his shall fall to the ground; it is true from the beginning, and therefore true to the end. Our Lord Jesus is the Amen, the faithful Witness, as well as the Beginning, the Author and Finisher, of the creation of God. Rev. iii. 14. The keeping of God's truth for ever is committed to him, for all the promises are in him yea and amen.

3. He is the Patron of injured innocency; He pleads the cause of the oppressed, and (as we read it) he executes judgment for them. He often does it in his providence, righting those that suffer wrong, and clearing up their integrity; he will do it in the judgment of the great day. The Messiah came to rescue the children of men out of the hands of Satan the great oppressor, and, all judgment being committed to him, the executing of judgment upon persecutors is so among the rest, Jude 15.

4. He is a bountiful Benefactor to the necessituous; He gives food to the hungry; so God does in an ordinary way for the answering of the cravings of nature; so he has done sometimes in an extraordinary way, as when ravens fed Elijah; so Christ did more than once, when he fed thousands miraculously with that which was intended but for one meal or two for his own family; this encourages to hope in him as the Nourisher of our souls with the bread of life.

5. He is the Author of liberty to those that were bound; The Lord looseth the prisoners. He brought Israel out of the house of bondage in Egypt, and afterward in Babylon. The miracles Christ wrought, in making such an extraordinary proclamation with that one word, Ephphatha, Be opened, his cleansing of lepers, and so discharging them from their confinement, and his raising the dead out of their graves, may all be included in this one of loosing the prisoners; and we may take encouragement from those, to hope in him for that spiritual liberty which he came to proclaim, Isa. lxv. 1, 2.

He gives sight to those that have been long deprived of it; The Lord guideth the blind, and has often given to his afflicted people to see that comfort which before they were not aware of; witness Gen. xxii. 19. and the prophet's servant, 2 Kings vi. 17. But this has special reference to Christ; for since the world began, was it not heard that any man opened the eyes of one that was born blind, till Christ did it, (John ix. 32.) and thereby encouraged us to hope in him for spiritual illumination.

He sets that straight that was crooked, and makes those that were pained and ready to sink; he raises them that are bowed down, by comforting and supporting them under their burdens, and, in due time, removing their burdens. This was literally performed by Christ, when he made a poor woman straight, that had been bowed together, and could in no wise lift up herself; (Luke xiii. 12.) and he still does it by his grace, giving rest to them that are weary, and heavy-laden, and raising up with his comforts those that were humbled and cast down by convictions.

8. He has a constant kindness for all good people; The Lord loveth the righteous, and they may, with the more confidence, depend upon his power when they are sure of his good-will. Our Lord Jesus showed his love to the righteous, by fulfilling all righteousness.

9. He has a tender concern for those that stand in special need of his care; The Lord preserveth the strangers. It ought not to pass without remark, that the name Jehovah is repeated here five times in five lines, to intimate that it is an almighty power (that of Jehovah) that is engaged and exerted for the relief of the oppressed; and that it is as much the glory of God to succour them that are in misery, as it is to ride on the heavens by his name Jah, lxviii. 4. (1.) Strangers are exposed, and are commonly destitute of friends, but the Lord preserveth them, that they be not run down and ruined. Many a poor stranger has found the benefit of the divine protection, and been kept alive by it. (2.) Widows and fatherless children, that have lost the head of the family, who took care of the affairs of it, often fall into the hands of those that make a prey of them, that will not do them right, say, that will do them wrong; but the Lord relieth them, and raiseth up friends for them. See Exod. xxii. 22, 23. Our Lord Jesus came into the world to help the helpless, to receive Gentiles, strangers, into his kingdom, and with him poor sinners, that are as fatherless, may find mercy, Hos. xiv. 3.

10. He will appear for the destruction of all those that oppose his kingdom, and oppress the faithful subjects of it; the way of the wicked he turneth upside down, and therefore let us hope in him, and not be afraid of the fury of the oppressor, as though he were ready to destroy. It is the glory of the Messiah, that he will subvert all the counsels of hell and earth, that militate against his church, so that, having for us, we need not fear any thing that can be done against us.

11. His kingdom shall continue through all the revolutions of time, to the utmost ages of eternity, v. 10. Let this encourage us to trust in God at all times, that the Lord shall reign forevermore; in the exaltation of his kingdom, and in the possession of darkness, even thy God, O Zion, unto all generations. Christ is set King on the holy hill of Zion, and his kingdom shall continue in an endless glory. It cannot be destroyed by an invader, it shall not be left to a successor, either to a succeeding monarch, or a succeeding monarchy, but it shall stand for ever. It is matter of unspeakable comfort, that the Lord reigns as Zion's God, as Zion's King, that the Messiah is Head evermore to the church, and will be so while the world stands.

PSALM CXLVII.

This is another psalm of praise; some think it was penned after the return of the Jews from their captivity; but it is so much of a piece with Ps. cxlv. that I rather think it was penned by David, and what is said, v. 2, 13. may well enough be applied to the first building and fortifying of Jerusalem in his time, and the gathering in of those that escaped outcasts in Saul's time. The Septuagint divides it into two; and we may divide it into the first and second part, but both of the same import. 1. We are called upon to praise God, v. 1., 12. II. We are furnished with matter for praise, for God is to be glorified, v. 1. As the God of nature, and so he is very great, v. 4, 5, 6, 9, 15., 18. 2. As the God of grace, comforting his people, v. 3., 6., 11. 3. As the God of Israel, Jerusalem, and Zion, settling their civil state, v. 2, 13, 14. and especially settling religion among them, v. 19, 20. It is easy, in singing this psalm, to apply it to ourselves, both as to personal and national mercies, were it but as easy to do it with suitable affections.

1. Praise ye the Lord: for it is good to sing praises unto our God; for it is pleasant; and praise is comely. 2. The Lord doth build up Jerusalem: he gathereth together the outcasts of Israel. 3. He healeth the broken in heart, and bindeth up their wounds. 4. He telleth the number of the stars; he calleth them all by their names.

5. Great is our Lord, and of great power: his understanding is infinite. 6. The Lord lifteth up the meek: he casteth the wicked down to the ground. 7. Sing unto the Lord with thanksgiving; sing praise upon the harp unto our God; 8. Who covereth the heaven with clouds, who prepareth rain for the earth, who maketh grass to grow upon the mountains. 9. He giveth to the beast his food, and to the young ravens which cry. 10. He delighteth not in the strength of the horse; he taketh not pleasure in the legs of a man. 11. The Lord taketh pleasure in them that fear him, in those that hope in his mercy.

Here,

I. The duty of praise is recommended to us. It is not without reason, that we are thus called to it again and again; Praise ye the Lord, (v. 1.) and again, (v. 7.) Sing unto the Lord with thanksgiving, sing praise upon the harp to our God, let all our praises be directed to him, and centre in him; for it is said of God, it is our duty, and therefore good in itself; it is our interest, and therefore good for us: it is acceptable to our Creator, and it answers the end of our creation. The law for it is holy, just, and good, the practice of it will turn to a good account. It is good; for, 1. It is pleasant; holy joy and delight are required as the principle of it, and that is pleasant to us as men; giving glory to God is the design and business of it, and that is pleasant to us as saints that are in a spiritual estate. Giving glory to God is what he is, and therefore is his own; he is his own works, it is heaven upon earth, it is what we should be in, as in our element. 2. It is comely, it is that which becomes us as reasonable creatures, much more as people in covenant with God. In giving honour to God, we really do ourselves a great deal of honour.

II. God is recommended to us as the proper Object of our most exalted and enlarged praises, upon several accounts. 1. The care he takes of his chosen people, v. 2. Is Jerusalem to be raised out of small beginnings? Is it to be recovered out of its ruins? In both cases, The Lord buildeth up Jerusalem. The gospel-church, the Jerusalem that is from above, is of his building; he framed the model of it in his own counsels, he founded it by the preaching of his gospel, he adds to it daily such as shall be saved, and so increases it.
He will build it up unto perfection, build it up as high as heaven. Are any of his people outcasts? Have they made themselves so by their own folly? He gathers them by giving them repentance, and brings them again into the heart of their souls. Have they been forced out by war, famine, or persecution? He opens a door for their return; many that were missing, and thought to be lost, are brought back, and they that were scattered in the cloudy and dark day are gathered together again.

2. The comforts he has laid up for true penitents, v. 3. They are broken in heart, and wounded, humbled, and troubled, for sin, inwardly pained at the remembrance of it, as a man is, that is sorely wounded. Their very hearts are not only pricked, but rent, under the sense of the dishonour they have done to God, and the injury they have done to themselves, by sin. To those whom God heals with the consolations of his Spirit, he speaks peace; assures them that their sins are pardoned, and that he is reconciled to them, and so makes them easy, pours the balm of Gilead into their bleeding wounds, and then binds them up, and makes them to rejoice. They who have had experience of this need not be called upon to praise the Lord, for, when he brought them out of the horrible pit, and set their feet upon a rock, he put a new song in their mouths, xl. 2, 3. And, for this, let others praise him also.

3. The sovereign dominion he has over the lights of heaven, v. 4, 5. The stars are innumerable, many of them being scarcely discernible with the naked eye, and yet he counts them, and knows the exact number of them, for they are all the work of his hands, and the instruments of his providence; their bulk and power are very great, but he calleth them all by their names, which bespeaks his dominion over them, and the command he has them at, to make what use of them he pleases. They are his servants, his soldiers, he musters them, he marshals them, they come and go at his bidding, and all their moves and direction. He mentions this as one instance of many, to show that great is our Lord, and of great power; he can do what he pleases, and of his understanding there is no computation, so that he can contrive everything for the best. Man's knowledge is soon drained, and you have his utmost length; hitherto his wisdom can reach, and no farther; but God's knowledge is a depth that no man can fathom, and no soul can comprehend.

4. The pleasure he takes in humbling the proud and exalting them of low degree; (v. 6.) The Lord lifteth up the meek, who abuse themselves before him, and whom men trample on; but the wicked, who carry it insolently toward God and scornfully toward all mankind, who lift up themselves in pride and folly, he casteth down to the ground, sometimes by very humbling providences in this world, at furthest in the day of his anger, the very word of his wrath, is everlasting shame. God proves himself to be God, by looking on the proud and abusing them, Job xl. 12.

5. The provision he makes for the inferior creatures. Though he is so great as to command the stars, he is so good as not to forget even the fowls, v. 8, 9. Observe in what method he feeds man and beast. (1.) He covereth the heaven with clouds; which God interposed, and covered the sun, and yet in them he prepareth that rain for the earth which is necessary to its fruitfulness. Clouds look melancholy, and yet without them we could have no rain, and consequently no fruit. Thus afflictions, for the present, look black, and dark, and unpleasant, and we are in heaviness because of them, as sometimes, when the sky is overcast, it makes us dull; but they are necessary, for from these clouds of affliction come those showers that make the harvest to yield the exceeding fruits of righteousness, (Heb. xii. 11.) which should help to reconcile us to them. Observe the necessary dependence which the earth has upon the heavens, which directed the heavens to depend on God in heaven. All the rain, with which the earth is watered, is o. God's preparing. (2.) By the rain which distils on the earth, he makes grass to grow upon the mountains, even the high mountains, which man neither takes care of, nor reaps the benefit of. The mountains, which are not watered with the springs and rivers, as the valleys are, are yet watered so that they are not barren. (3.) This grass he gives to the beast for his food, the beasts of the mountains, which run wild, which man makes no provision for. And even the young ravens, which, being forsaken by their old ones, cry, are heard by him, and ways are found to feed them, so that they are kept from perishing in the nest.

6. The complacency he takes in his people, v. 10, 11. In times when great things are doing, and there are great expectations of the success of them, it concerns us to know (since the issue proceeds from the Lord) whom, and what, God will delight to honour and crown with victory. It is not the strength of armies, but the strength of grace, that is pleased to own. (1.) Not the strength of armies; not in the cavalry, for he delighteth not in the strength of the horse, the war-horse, noted for his courage; (Job xxxix. 19, &c.) nor in the infantry, for he taketh no pleasure in the legs of a man; he does not mean the swiftness of them for flight, to quit the field, but the steadiness of them for charging, to stand the ground. If one king, making war with another king, goes to God to pray for success, it will not avail him to plead, "Lord, I have a gallant army, the horse and foot in good order, it is pity that they should suffer any disgrace;" for that is no argument with God, Ps. xx. 7. Jehoshaphat's was much better, Lord, we have no might, 2 Chron. xx. 12. But, (2.) God is pleased to own the strength of grace; a serious and suitable regard to God, is that which is, in the sight of God, of great price in such a case. The Lord accepts of, and takes pleasure in, those that fear him, and that hope in his mercy. Observe, [1.] A holy fear of God and hope in God, not only may consist, but must occur. In the same heart, at the same time, there must be both a reverence of his majesty, and a complacency in his goodness; both a believing dread of his wrath, and a believing expectation of his favour. Nor must we hang in suspense between hope and fear, but we must act under the gracious influences of hope and fear. Our fear must save our hope from swelling into presumption, and our hope must save our fear from sinking into despair; thus must we take our work before us. [2.] We must hope in God's mercy, his general mercy, even then when we cannot find a particular prospect of our own issue. A humble confidence in the goodness of God's nature is very pleasing to him, as that which turns to the glory of that attribute which he most glorifies in. Every man of honour loves to be trusted.

12. Praise the Lord, O Jerusalem; praise thy God, O Zion. 13. For he hath strengthened the bars of thy gates; he hath blessed thy children within thee. 14. He maketh peace in thy borders, and filleth thee with the finest of the wheat. 15. He sendeth forth his commandment upon earth, his word runneth very swiftly. 16. He giveth snow like wool: he scattereth the hoar-frost like ashes. 17. He casteth forth his ice like morsels: who can stand before his cold
18. He sendeth out his word, and melteth them: he causeth his wind to blow, and the waters flow. 19. He showeth his word unto Jacob, his statutes and his judgments unto Israel. 20. He hath not dealt so with any nation: and as for his judgments, they have not known them. Praise ye the Lord.

Jerusalem, and Zion, the holy city, the holy hill, are here called upon to praise God, v. 12. For where should praise be offered up to God, but where his altar is? Where may we expect that glory should be given to him, but in the beauty of holiness? Let the inhabitants of Jerusalem praise the Lord in their own houses; let the priests and Levites, who attend in Zion, the city of their solemnities, in a special manner, praise the Lord, because they have more cause to do it than others, and they lie under greater obligations to do it than others; for it is their business, it is their profession. "Praise thy God, O Zion: he is thine, and therefore thou art bound to praise him; his being thine includes all happiness, so that thou canst never want matter for praise."

Jerusalem and Zion must praise God,

I. For the prosperity and flourishing estate of their civil interests, v. 13, 14. 1. For the common safety; they had gates, and kept their gates barred in times of danger; but that would not have been an effectual security to them, if God had not strengthened the bars of their gates, and fortified their fortifications. The most probable means we can devise for our own preservation will not answer the end, unless God give his blessing with them; we must, therefore, in the careful and diligent use of these means, look to God for that blessing, and attribute the undisturbed repose of our land, more to the wall of fire, than to the wall of water, round about us, Zech. ii. 5. 2. For the increase of their people; this strengthens the bars of the gates as much as any thing; He hath blessed thy children within thee, with that first and great blessing, Bountiful, and multiply, and replenish the land. It is a comfort to know, that God doth give increase of the Lord, (Gen. xxii. 9.) and a comfort to the generation that is going off, to see the rising generation numerous and hopeful; for which blessing God must be blessed. 3. For the public tranquility, that they were delivered from the terrors and desolations of war; He maketh peace in thy borders, by putting an end to the wars that were, and preventing the wars that were threatened and feared. He makes peace within thy borders, in all parts of the country, by composing differences among neighbours, that there may be no intestine broils and animosities; and upon thy borders, that they may not be attacked by invasions from abroad. If there be trouble any where, it is in the borders, the marches of a country, the frontier-towns lie most exposed, so that if there be peace in the borders, there is a universal peace, a mercy we can never be enough thankful for. 4. For great plenty, the common effect of peace; He filleth thee with the finest of the wheat; wheat, the most valuable grain, the fat, the finest of that, and a fulness thereof. What would they more? Canaan abounded with the best wheat, (Deut. xxxii. 14.) and exported it to the countries abroad, as appears, Ezek. xxxvii. 17. The land of Israel was not enriched with precious stones or spices, but with the finest of the wheat, with bread, which strengthens man's heart; that made it the glee of all lands, and for that God was praised in Zion.

II. For the wonderful instances of his power in the wear; particularly the winter-weather; he that protects Zion and Jerusalem is God of power from whom all the powers of nature are derived, and on whom they depend, and who produces all the changes of the seasons, which, if they were not common, would astonish us.

1. In general, whatever alterations there are in this lower world, (and it is that world that is subject to continual changes,) they are produced by the will, and power, and providence, of God, (v. 13.) He sendeth rain upon the earth, and he clotheth all flesh: he that has an incontestable authority to give orders, and innumerable attendants ready to carry his orders, and put them in execution. As the world was at first made, so it is still upheld and governed, by a word of almighty power; God speaks, and it is done, for all are his servants. That word takes effect, not only surely, but speedy; his word runneth very swifly, for nothing can oppose or retard it. As the lightning, which passes through the air in an instant, we must take word of God's providence, and such the word of his grace, when it is sent forth with commission, Luke xvii. 24. Angels, who carry his word, and fulfil it, fly swiftly, Dan. ix. 21.

2. In particular, frosts and thaws are both of them wonderful changes, and in both we must acknowledge the word of his power.

(1.) Frosts are from God; with him are the treasures of the snow and the hail, (Job xxxviii. 22, 23.) and his treasures of snow and hail. [1.] He giveth snow like wool; it is compared to wool for its whiteness, (Isa. i. 18.) and its softness; it falls silently, and makes no more noise than the fall of a lock of wool, it covers the earth, and keeps it warm like a fleece of wool, and so promotes its fruitfulness. See how God can work by contraries, and bring meat out of the eater, can warm the earth with cold snow. [2.] He scattereth the hoar-frost, which is so renowned for its coldness, and its freezing power; and rain conceal'd; this looks like ashes scattered upon the grass, and is sometimes prejudicial to the products of the earth, and blasts them as if it were hot ashes, Ps. lxxviii. 47. [3.] He casteth forth his ice like morsels, which may be understood either of large hail-stones, which are as ice in the air, or of the ice which covers the face of the waters, and when it is broken, though naturally it was as drps or morsels, it must be upon them blessed of meat, or crusts of bread. [4.] When we see the frost, and snow, and ice, we feel it in the air; Who can stand before his cold? The beasts cannot, they retire into dens, (Job xxxviii. 8.) they are easily conquered then, 2 Sam. xxiii. 20. Men cannot, but are forced to take the benefit of fires, or furs, or both, and all little enough where and when the cold is in extremity. We see not the causes when we feel the effects; and therefore we must call it his cold, it is of his sending, and therefore we must bear it patiently, and be thankful for warm houses, and clothes, and beds, to relieve us against the rigour of the season, and must give him the glory of his wisdom and sovereignty, his power and faithfulness, which appear in the winter-weather, which shall not cease more than summer, Gen. vii. 22. And let us also infer from it, If we cannot stand before the cold of his frosts, how can we stand before the heat of his wrath, as he pleases.

(2.) Thaws are from God; when he pleases, (v. 18.) he sendeth out his word, and melteth them; the frost, the snow, the ice, are all dissolved quickly, in order to which he causeth the wind, the south wind, to blow, and the waters, which were frozen, flew again as they did before. We are soon sensible of the change, but we see not the causes of it, but must resolve it into the will of God. If we must be content with it, it must be according to the power of God, that he can so suddenly, so insensibly, make such a great and universal alteration in the temper of the air, and the face of the earth; (what cannot he do, that doeth this every winter, perhaps often every winter?) but also of the goodness of God; hard weather does not always continue, it would be sad if it should; he does not contend for ever, but newens the face of the earth. As he remembered Noah, and released him, (Gen. viii. 1.) so he remembers the earth, and his covenant with the earth, Cant. ii. 11, 12. This thawing word may represent the gospel of Christ, and this thawing wind the Spirit of Christ, (for the Spirit is compared to the wind, John iii. 8.) both are sent for the melting of frozen souls; contrasting grace, like the thaw, softens the heart that was hard, moistens it, and melts it into tears of repentance; it warms good affections, and makes them to flow, which, before, were chilled and stopped up. The change which the thaw makes is universal, and yet gradual; it is very evident, and yet how it is done is unaccountable: such is the change wrought in the conversion of a soul, when God's word and Spirit are sent to melt it, and restore it to itself.

III. For his distinguishing favour to Israel, in giving them his word and ordinances, a much more valuable blessing than their peace and plenty, (v. 14.) as much as the soul is more excellent than the body. Jacob and Israel had God's statutes and judgments among them; they were under his peculiar government, the municipal laws of their nation were of his framing; and although, as is observable in theocracy, they had the benefit of divine revelation, the great things of God's law were written to them; they had a priesthood of divine institution for all things pertaining to God, and prophets for all extraordinary occasions. No people besides went upon sure grounds in their religion. Now this was, 1. A preventing mercy; they did not find out God's statutes and judgments of themselves, but God showed his word unto Jacob, and his word he made known to them his statutes and judgments. It is a great mercy to any people to have the word of God among them; faith comes by hearing and reading that word, that faith without which it is impossible to please God. 2. A distinguishing mercy, and upon that account the more obliging; He hath not dealt so with every nation, not with any nation; and as for his judgments, they have not known them, nor sought after them. All the universe cannot take down the partition-wall between Jew and Gentile, that the gospel may be preached to every creature. Other nations had plenty of outward good things; some nations were very rich, others had pompous powerful princes, and polite literature, but none were blessed with God's statutes and judgments as Israel were; let Israel therefore praise the Lord in the observation of these statutes; Lord, how is it that thou wilt manifest thyself to us, and not to the world? Even so, Father, because it seemed good in thine eyes.

PSALMS, CXLVIII.

This psalm is a most solemn and earnest call to all the creatures according to the order of being, to glorify the Creator, and to show forth his eternal power and Godhead, the invisible things of which are manifested in the things that are seen. Thereby the psalmist designs to express his great affection to the duty of praise: he is highly satisfied that God is praised, is very desirous that he may be more praised, and therefore does all he can to engage all about him in this pleasant work, yea, and all who shall come after him, whose hearts must be very dead and cold, if they are not raised, in praise and thanksgiving, by the lofty flights of divine poetry which we find in this psalm.

1. He calls upon the higher house, the creatures that are placed in the upper world, to praise the Lord, both these that have wings, and are swift to be moved, (v. 7, 10.) and those that are not, and are therefore capable of doing it only objectively, v. 3.-6. II. He calls upon the lower house, the creatures of this lower world, both those that can only minister matters of praise, (v. 7.-10.) and those that, being endued with reason, are capable of offering up this sacrifice, (v. 11.-13.) especially his own people, who have more cause to do it, and are more concerned to do it, than any other. v. 14.

1. PRAISE ye the Lord. Praise ye the Lord from the heavens: praise him in the heights. 2. Praise ye him, all his angels; praise ye him, all his hosts. 3. Praise ye him, sun and moon: praise him, all ye stars of light. 4. Praise him, ye heavens of heavens, and ye waters that be above the heavens. 5. Let them praise the name of the Lord: for he commanded, and they were created. 6. He hath also established them for ever and ever: he hath made a decree which shall not pass.

We, in this dark and depressed world, know but little of the world of light and exaltation, and, conversing within narrow confines, can scarcely admit any tolerable conceptions of the vast regions above. But this we know, I. That there is above us a world of blessed angels, by whom God is praised, an innumerable company of them; Thousand thousands minister unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stand before him; v. 1. II. That God may be praised from the heavens, that thence a praising frame may be transmitted to this world in which we live, that from the inhabitants of that world we may learn this blessed work. It is his delight to think that God is praised in the heights; that, while we are so cold, and low, and flat, in praising God, there are those above who are doing it in a better manner, and that, while we are so often interrupted in this work, they rest not day nor night from it. In particular, he had an eye to God's angels, to his hosts, and calls upon them to praise God. That God's angels are his hosts, is plain enough; as soon as they were made, they were listed, armed, and disciplined; he employs them in fighting his battles, and they keep ranks, and know their place, and observe the word of command as his hosts. But what is meant by the psalmist's calling upon them, and exalting them to praise God, is not so easy to account for. I will not say, They do not need it; because we find that to the prinicipalities and powers is known by the church the manifold wisdom of God; (Eph. iii. 10.) but I will say, They do not need it, for they are continually praising God, and there is no deficiency at all in their performances; and therefore, when, in singing this psalm, we call upon the angels to praise God, (as we did, cit. 26.) we mean, that we desire God may be praised by the ablest hands and in the best manner; that we are sure it is fit he should be so; that we are pleased to think he is so; and that we have a spiritual communion with those that dwell in his house above, and are still praising him; and that we are come by faith, and hope, and holy love, to the innumerable company of angels, Heb. xii. 22.
1. What these creatures are are thus shewn us the way in praising God, and, whenever we look up and consider the heavens, furnish us with matter for his praises. (1.) There are the sun, moon, and stars, which continually, either day or night, present themselves to our view, as looking-glasses, in which we do see a faint shadow (for I must call it, not a resemblance) of the glory of him that is the Father of lights, v. 3. The greater lights, the sun and moon, are not too great, too bright, to praise him; and the praises of the lesser lights, the stars, shall not be slighted. Idolaters made the sun, moon, and stars, their gods, and praised them, worshipping and serving the creature, because it is seen, more than the Creator, because he is not seen; but we, who worship the true God, make them only our fellow-worshippers, and call upon them to praise him with us, nay, as Levites to attend us, who, as priests, offer the spiritual sacrifice. (2.) There are the heavens of heavens above the sun and stars, the seat of the blessed; from the vastness and brightness of these unknown orbs abundance of glory redounds to God, for the heavens of heavens are the Lord's, (cxxv. 16.) and yet they cannot contain him, 1 Kings viii. 27. Dr. Hammond and other writers (not without reason), by the heavens of heavens, the upper regions of the air, or all the regions of it, as Ps. lxxviii. 33. We read of the heaven of heavens, whence God sends forth his voice, and that a mighty voice, meaning the thunder. (3.) There are the waters that be above the heavens, the clouds that hang above in the air, where they are reserved against the day of battle and war, Job xxxviii. 23. We have reason to praise God, not only that these waters do not drown the earth, but that they water it and make it fruitful. The Chaldee paraphrase reads it, Praise him, ye heavens of heavens, and ye waters that depend on the word of him which is above the heavens; for the key of the clouds is one of the keys which God has in his hand, wherewith he opens, and none can shut, he shuts, and none can open.

2. Upon what account we are to give God the glory of them; Let them praise the name of the Lord; let us praise the name of the Lord; and observe what constant and fresh matter for praise may be fetched from them. (1.) Because he made them, gave them their powers, and assigned them their places; He commanded them (great as they are) out of nothing, and they were created at a word's speaking. God created, and therefore may command; for he commanded, and so created; his authority must always be acknowledged and acquiesced in, because he once spake with such authority. (2.) Because he still upholds and preserves them in their being and posts, their powers and motions; (v. 6.) He hath established them for ever and ever, to the end of time; a short ever, but it is their ever; they shall last as long as there is occasion for them. He hath made a decree, the law of creation, which shall not pass; it was enacted by the wisdom of God, and therefore needs not be altered; by his sovereignty and inviolable fidelity, and therefore cannot be altered. All the creatures that praised God at first for their creation, must praise him still for their continuance. And we have reason to praise him, that they are kept within the bounds of a decree; for to that it is owing that the waters above the heavens have not a second time drowned the earth.

7. Praise the Lord from the earth, ye dragons, and all deeps. 8. Fire and hail; snow and vapour; stormy wind fulfilling his word: 9. Mountains, and all hills; fruitful trees, and all cedars: 10. Beasts, and all cattle; creeping things, and flying fowl: 11. Kings of the earth, and all people; princes, and all judges of the earth: 12. Both young men and maidens; old men and children: 13. Let them praise the name of the Lord: for his name alone is excellent; his glory is above the earth and heaven. 14. He also exalteth the horn of his people, the praise of all his saints; even of the children of Israel, a people near unto him. Praise ye the Lord.

Considering that this earth, and the atmosphere that surrounds it, are the very sediment of the universe, it concerns us to inquire after those considerations that are to be of importance for our conduct in this place and in this life; and I know none more likely than this, (next to the visit which the Son of God once made to it,) that even in this world, dark and as bad as it is, God is praised; Praise ye the Lord from the earth, v. 7. As the rays of the sun, which are darted directly from heaven, reflect back (though more weakly) from the earth, so should the praises of God, with which this cold and infected world should be surrounded and perfumed.

1. Even those creatures which are not dignified with the powers of reason are summoned into this concert, because God may be glorified in them, v. 7-10. Let the dragons or whales, that sport themselves in the mighty waters, (civ. 26.) dance before the Lord, to his glory, who largely proves his own omnipotence, by his dominion over the leviathan or whale, Job xli. 1, &c. All deeps, and their inhabitants, praise God; the sea, and the animals there; the bowels of the earth, and the animals thereof; the depth of the deeps may be praised as well as prayed unto. If we look up into the atmosphere, we meet with a great variety of meteors, which, being a kind of new productions, (and some of them unaccountable,) do, in a special manner, magnify the power of the great Creator. There are fiery meteors, lightning is fire, and there are other blazes sometimes kindled, which may be so called; there are watery meteors, snow, hail, and frost; which are clouds that they are gendered; there are airy meteors, stormy winds; we know not whence they come, nor whither they go; whence their mighty force comes, nor how it is spent; but this we know, that, be they ever so strong, so stormy, they fulfil God's word, and do that, and no more than he appoints them; and by this Christ showed himself to have a divine power, that he commanded even the winds and the sea, and they obeyed him. Those that will not fulfill God's word, but rise up in rebellion against it, show themselves to be more violent and headstrong than even the stormy winds, for they fulfil it. Take a view of the surface of the earth, (v. 9.) and there are presented to our view the exalted grounds, mountains, and all hills; from the barren tops of some of which, and the fruitful tops of others, we may fetch matter for praise; there are the exalted plants, some that are exalted by their own freshness and fragrance, as cedars, for the fruits of which God is said to be praised; others by their staleness, as all cedars, those trees of the Lord, civ. 16. Cedars, the high trees, are not the fruitful trees, yet they had their use even in God's temple. Pass we next to the animal kingdom, and there we find God glorified, even by the beasts that run wild, and all cattle that are tame and in the service of man, v. 10. Nay, even the creeping things are not sunk so low, as to the flying fowl so high, as not to be called upon to praise the Lord. Much of the wisdom, power, and goodness, of the Creator, appears in the several capacities and instincts of the created; and in their heart, and the use made of them. When we see all so very strange, and all so very good, surely we cannot but acknowledge God with wonder and thankfulness.

2. Much more, those creatures that are dignified with the powers of reason, ought to employ them in praising God.

Kings of the earth and all people. v. 11, 12. (1.) God is to be glorified in and for these, as in and for the inferior created; for their hearts are in the hand of the Lord, and he makes what use he pleases of them. God is to be praised in the order and constitution of kingdoms, the pars imprimi- rans—the part that commands, and the pars subdi- tita—the part that is subject; kings of the earth, and all people. It is by him that kings reign, and people are subject to them; the princes and judges of the earth have their wisdom and their commission from him, and we, to whom they assent, ought to bless God for them. God is to be praised also in the constitution of families, for he is the Founder of them; and for all the comfort of relations, the comfort that parents and children, brothers and sisters, have in each other, God is to be praised. (2.) God is to be glorified by these. Let all manner of persons praise God. [1.] Those of each rank, high and low; the praises of kings, and princes, and judges, are demanded; those from God have put them in honor and power. So conjecture, they are intrusted with, and the figure they make in the world, put them in a capacity of bringing more glory to God, and doing him more service, than others. Yet the praises of the people are expected also, and God will graciously accept of them; Christ despised not the hosannas of the multitude. [2.] Those of each sex, young men and maidens, who make merry together, let them turn it into this channel, let the mirth be sacred, that it may be pure. [3.] Those of each age; old men must still bring forth this fruit in old age, and not think that either the gravity or the infirmity of their age will excuse them from it; and children too must begin betimes to praise God; even out of the mouths of babes and sucklings this good work is perfected. A good reason is given (v. 13.) why all these should praise the name of the Lord, because his name alone is excellent, he is to be praised; his name is a name above every name; no name, no nature, but his, has in it all excellency. His glory is above both the earth and the heaven, and let all the inhabitants both of earth and heaven praise him, and yet acknowledge his name to be exalted far above all blessing and praise.

3. Most of all, his own people, that are dignified with peculiar privileges, must in a peculiar manner give glory to him, v. 14. Observe, (1.) The dignity God has put upon his people, even the children of Israel, typical of the honor reserved for all true believers, who are God's spiritual Israel. He ex- alts their horn, their brightness, their plenty, their power. The people of Israel were, in many respects, honored above any other nation, for to them pertained the adoption, the glory, and the covenants, Rom. ix. 4. It was their horn, honour, that they were chosen by God, with peculiar honor, to be a peculiar treasure; they were admitted into his courts, when a stranger that came nigh must be put to death. They had him nigh to them in all that which they called upon him for. This blessing is now come upon the Gentiles, through Christ, for they that were afar off, by his blood are made nigh, Eph. ii. 13. It is the greatest honour that can be put upon a man, to be brought near to God, the nearer the better; and it will be best of all, when nearest of all in the kingdom of glory. (2.) The duty God expects from them in consideration of this; Let those whom God honours, honour him; Praise ye the Lord. Let him be the Praise of all his saints, the Object of their praise; for he is a Praise to them. He is thy praise, and he is thy God, Deut. x. 21. Some by the horn of his people und-stand David, as a type of Christ, whom God has exalted to be a Prince and a Saviour, who is indeed the Praise of all his saints, and will be for ever; for it is through him that they are a people near to God.

PSALM CXLIX.

The foregoing psalm was a hymn of praise to the Creator this to the Redeemer. It is a psalm of triumph in the God of Israel, and over the enemies of Israel. Probably, it was penned upon occasion of some victory which Israel was blessed and honoured with. Some conjecture that it was penned when David had taken the stronghold of Zion, and settled his government there. But it looks further, to the kingdom of the Messiah, who, in the chariot of the everlasting gospel, goes forth conquering and to conquer. To him, and his glories and graces, we must have an eye, in singing this psalm, which speaks, I. Abundance of joy to all the people of God, v. 11–5. Abundance of terror to the proudest of their en-emies, v. 6–9.

1. PRAISE ye the Lord. Sing unto the Lord a new song, and his praises in the congregation of saints. 2. Let Israel rejoice in him that made him: let the children of Zion be joyful in their King. 3. Let them praise his name in the dance: let them sing praises unto him with the timbrel and harp. 4. For the Lord taketh pleasure in his people: he will beautify the meek with salvation. 5. Let the saints be joyful in glory, let them sing aloud upon their beds.

We have here,

1. The calls given God's Israel to praise. All his works were in the foregoing psalm, excited to praise him; but here his saints in a particular manner are required to bless him. Observe then,

1. Who are called upon to praise God. All Israel in general, the whole body of the church, (v. 2.) the children of Zion particularly, the inhabitants of that holy hill, who are nearer to God than other Israelites; these that have the word and ordinances of God near them, that are not put to travel far to them, are justly expected to do more in praising God than others. All true Christians may call themselves the children of Zion, for in faith and hope we are come unto mount Zion, Heb. xii. 22. The saints must praise God, saints in profession, saints in power, for this is the intention of their sanctification; they are therefore devoted to the glory of God, and renewed by the grace of God, that they may be unto him for a name and a praise.

2. What must be the principle of this praise; and that, is holy joy in God; Let Israel rejoice, and the children of Zion be joyful, and the saints be joyful in glory. Our praises of God should flow from a heart that is filled with delight and triumph in God's attributes, and our relation to him. Much of the power of godliness in the heart consists in making God our chief Joy, and solacing ourselves in him; and our faith in Christ is described by our rejoicing in him. We then give honour to God, when we take pleasure in him. We must be joyful in glory, in him as our Glory, and in the interest we have in him; and let us look upon it as our glory to be of those that rejoice in God.

3. What must be the expressions of the praise. We must, by all proper ways, show forth the praises of God; Sing to the Lord. We must entertain ourselves, and proclaim his name, by singing praises unto him, (v. 3.) singing aloud, (v. 5.) for we should sing psalms with all our heart, as these that are not only not ashamed of it, but are enlarged in it. We must sing a new song, new melodies, at every special occasion; sing with new affections, which make the song new, though the words have been used before, and keep them from growing threadbare. Let God be praised in the dance with timbrel and harp; according to the usage of the Old Testament church very early, (Exod. xv. 20.) where we find God praised with timbrels and dancing. They who from hence urge the use of music in the church, often protest that they shall never introduce dancing, for they went together, as in David’s dancing before the ark, and Judg. xxi. 21. But whereas many scriptures in the New Testament keep up singing as a gospel-ordinance, none provide for the keeping up of music and dancing; the gospel-canon for psalmody, is, to sing with the spirit and with the understanding.

4. What opportunities must be taken for praising God; none must be let slip; but particularly, (1.) We must praise God in public, in the solemn assembly, (v. 1.) in the congregation of saints; the more the better, it is the more like heaven. Thus God’s name must be owned before the world; thus the service must have a solemnity put upon it, and we must mutually excite one another to it. The principle, end, and design, of our coming together in religious assemblies, is, that we may join together in praising God. Other parts of the service must be in order to this. (2.) We must praise him in private. Let the saints be so transported with their joy in God, as to sing aloud upon their beds, when they awake in the night, full of the praises of God, as David, cxix. 62. When God’s Israel are brought to a quiet settlement, let them enjoy that with thankfulness to God; much more may true believers, that are entered into God’s rest, and find repose in Jesus Christ, sing aloud, for joy of that. Upon their sick-beds, their death-beds, let them sing the praises of their God.

II. The cause given God’s Israel for praise. Consider,

1. God’s doings for them. They have reason to rejoice in God, to devote themselves to his honour, and employ themselves in his service; for it is he that made them. He gave us our being as men, and we have reason to praise him for that, for it is noble and excellent being. He gave Israel their being as a people, as a church; made them what they were, so much different from other nations; let that people therefore praise him, for he formed them for himself, on purpose that they might show forth his praise, Isa. lxxiii. 21. Let Israel rejoice in his Makers, so it is in the original; for God said, Let us make man; and in this, some think, is the mystery of the Trinity. God’s dealings with them. This follows upon the former: if he made them, he is their King; he that gave being, no doubt, may give law; and this ought to be the matter of our joy and praise, that we are under the conduct and protection of such a wise and powerful King. Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion, for behold, thy King cometh, the King Messiah, whom God has set upon his holy hill of Zion; let all the children of Zion be joyful in him, and be glad; to the utmost to meet him with their hosannas, Zech. ix. 9.

3. God’s delight in them. He is a King that rules by love, and therefore to be praised; for the Lord takes pleasure in his people, in their services, in their prosperity, in communion with them, and in the communications of his favour to them. He that is infinitely happy in the enjoyment of himself, and to whose fidelity no accession can be made, yet graciously condescends to take pleasure in his people, cxlvii. 11.

4. God’s designs concerning them. Beside the present complacency he has in them, he has prepared for their future glory; He will beautify the neck, the humble, and lovely, and contrite in heart, that tremble at his word, and submit to it, that are patient under their afflictions, and show all meekness towards all men. These, men vili and asper, but God will justify them, and wipe off their reproach, may, he will beautify them, they shall appear not only clear, but comely, before all the world, with the comeliness that he puts upon them. He will be beautiful to them, and make them beautiful, with all those external ornamentations, when God works remarkable deliverances for his people, they that had been among the pots, become as the wings of a dove covered with silver, (lxxviii. 13.) but especially with eternal salvation. The righteous shall be beautified in that day, when they shine forth as the sun. In the hopes of this, let them now, in the darkest day, sing a new song.

6. Let the high praises of God be in their mouth, and a two-edged sword in their hand; 7. To execute vengeance upon the heathen, and punishments upon the people; 8. To bind their kings with chains, and their nobles with fetters of iron; 9. To execute upon them the judgment written: this honour have all his saints. Praise ye the Lord.

The Israel of God are here represented triumphing over their enemies, which is both the matter of their praise, (let them give to God the glory of those triumphs,) and the recompense of their praise; they that are truly thankful to God for their tranquility, shall be blessed with victory. Or it may be taken as a further expression of their praise; (v. 6.) Let the high praises of God be in their mouth, and then, in a holy zeal for his honour, let them take a two-edged sword in their hand, to fight his battles against the enemies of his kingdom.

Now this may be applied. 1. To the many victories which God blessed his people Israel with over the nations of Canaan, and other nations that were devoted to destruction. These began in Moses and Joshua, who, when they taught Israel the high praises of the Lord, did withal put a two-edged sword in their hand; David did so too, for as he was the sweet singer of Israel, so he was the captain of their hosts, and taught the children of Judah the use of the bow, (2 Sam. i. 18.) taught their hands to war, as God had taught his. Thus he and they went on victoriously, fighting the Lord’s battles, and avenging Israel’s quarrels on those that had oppressed them; then they executed vengeance upon the heathen, (as the Gentiles, Chaldees, Ammonites, and others, 2 Sam. viii. 1, &c.) and punishments upon the people, for all the wrong they had done to God’s people, v. 7. Their kings and nobles were taken prisoners, (v. 8.) and on some of them the judgment written was executed, as by Joshua on the kings of Canaan, by Gideon on the princes of Midian, by Samuel on Agag. The honour of this redounded to all the Israel of God, and led to him who put it upon them; they return to it entirely in their hallelujahs. Jehovah’s army had at the same time the high praises of God in their mouth, and a two-edged sword in their hand, for they went forth to war, singing the praises of God, and then their sword did execution, 2 Chron. xx. 23. Some apply it to the time of the Maccabees.
when the Jews sometimes gained great advantages against their oppressors. And if it seem strange that the meek should, in righteousness, be exalted above the sons of men, we must remember that the sons of men may be exalted upon kings and nobles too, here is one word that justifies them in it, it is the judgment written.

They do not do it from any personal malice and revenge, or any bloody politics that they govern themselves by, but by commission from God, according to his direction, and in obedience to his command; and Saul lost his kingdom for disobeying a command of this nature. Thus the kings of the earth, that shall be employed in the destruction of the New-Testament Babylon, will but execute the judgment written, Rev. xvii. 16, 17. But, since now no such special commissions can be produced, this will by no means justify the violence either of subjects against their princes, or of princes against their subjects, or both against their neighbours, under pretence of religion; for Christ never intended that his gospel should be propagated by fire and sword, or his righteousness wrought by the wrath of man.

When the high praises of God are in our mouth, with them we should have an olive-branch of peace in our hands.

To Christ's victories, by the power of his gospel and grace over spiritual enemies, in which all believers are more than conquerors. The word of God is the two-edged sword, (Heb. iv. 12.) the sword of the Spirit, (Eph. vi. 17.) and therefore it is not contrary, we must have it in our hand also, as our Master had, when he said, It is written. Now, (1.) With this two-edged sword the first preachers of the gospel obtained a glorious victory over the power of darkness; vengeance was executed upon the gods of the heathen, by the conviction and conversion of those that had been long their worshippers, and by the constitution and confusion of those that would not return. (Rev. vi. 15.) The strong-holds of Satan were cast down; (2 Cor. x. 4, 5.) great men were made to tremble at the word, as Felix; Satan, the god of this world, was cast out, according to the judgment given against him. This is the honour of all Christians, that their holy religion has been so victorious. (2.) With this two-edged sword believers fight against their own corruptions and, through the grace of God, subdue and mortify them; the sin that had dominion over them is crucified; (Rom. vi.) that once sitting, is bound with chains, and brought into subjection to the yoke of Christ; the tempter is foiled and bruised under their feet; This honour have all the saints. (3.) The complete accomplishment of this will be in the judgment of the great day, when the Lord shall come with ten thousand of his saints, to execute judgment upon all, Jude, v. 14, 15. Vengeance shall then be executed upon the heathen. (Ps. cxlviii. 8, 9.) Vengeance is on those upon whom they shall cast their eyes; (Isa. xlix. 23.) upon the people, kings and nobles, that cast away the bands and cords of Christ's government, (Ji. 3.) shall not be able to cast away the chains and fetters of his wrath and justice. Then shall be executed the judgment written, for the secrets of men shall be judged according to the gospel. This honour shall all the saints have, that, as assessors with Christ, they shall judge the world; (1 Cor. vi. 2.) in the day when they let them praise the Lord and continue Christ's faith and servants and soldiers to the end of their lives.

The first and last of the psalms have both the same number of verses, are both short, and very memorable; but the scope of them is very different; the first psalm is an elaborate instruction in our duty, to prepare us for the comforts of our devotion; this is all rapture and transport, and, perhaps, was penned on purpose to be the conclusion of those sacred songs, to show what is the design of them all, and that is, to assist us in praising God. The psalmist had been himself full of the praises of God, and here he would fain fill all the world with them: again and again he calls, Praise the Lord, praise him, praise him, no less than thirteen times in these six verses, verses. He shows, 1. For what and upon what account, God is to be praised, v. 1. 2. How, and with what expressions of joy, God is to be praised, v. 3. 5. III. Who must praise the Lord; it is every one's business, v. 6. In sing these psalms, when we think, our hearts much affected with the perfections of God, and the praises with which he is, and shall be, for ever attended, throughout all ages, world without end.

1. Praise ye the Lord. Praise God in his sanctuary: praise him in the firmament of his power. 2. Praise him for his mighty acts: praise him according to his excellent greatness. 3. Praise him with the sound of the trumpet: praise him with the psaltery and harp. 4. Praise him with the timbrel and dance: praise him with stringed instruments and organs. 5. Praise him upon the loud cymbals: praise him upon the high-sounding cymbals. 6. Let every thing that hath breath praise the Lord. Praise ye the Lord.

We are here with the greatest earnestness imaginable, excited to praise God; if, as some suppose, it was primarily intended for the Levites, to stir them up to do their office in the house of the Lord, as singers and players on instruments, yet we must take it as speaking to us, who are made to our God spiritual priests. And the repeated incalculating of the call thus, intimates that it is a great and necessary duty, a duty which we should be much employed, and many enlarged, in; but which we are naturally backward to, and cold in, and therefore need to be brought to, and held to, by precept upon precept, and line upon line. Observe here,

1. Whence this tribute of praise arises, and out of what part of his dominion it especially issues. It comes, (1.) From his sanctuary; praise him there: let his priests, let his people that attend there, attend with their eyes and ears. Wherever he is praised, there he is honored, and where he is not praised, there he is dishonored, in a special manner, both manifest his glory, and communicate his grace. Praise God upon the account of his sanctuary, and the privileges we enjoy by having that among us, Ezek. xxxvii. 26. Praise God in his holy ones, so some read it: we must take notice of the image of God, as it appears on those that are sanctified, and love them for the sake of that image; and, when we praise them, we must praise God in them. (2.) From the firmament of his power; Praise him, because of his power and glory which appear in the firmament; its vastness, its brightness, and its splendid furniture; and because of the powerful influences it has upon this earth. Let them have that dwelling in the firmament of his power, even the holy angels, lead in this good work. Some, by the sanctuary, as well as by the firmament of his power, understand the highest heavens, the residence of his glory; that is indeed his sanctuary, his holy temple, and there he is praised continually, in a far better manner than we can praise him. And it is a comfort to us, when we find we do it so poorly, that it is so well done there.

2. Upon what account this tribute of praise is due: upon many accounts; particularly, (1.) The works of his power; (v. 2.) Praise him for his mighty acts; for his mightiness, so the word is; for all the instances of his might, the power of his providence, the power of his grace; what he has done in the creation, government, and redemption, of the world; for the children of men in general, for his own church and children in particular. (2.) The glory and majesty of his being; Praise him according to his excellent greatness, according to the multitude of his magnificenes; (so Dr. Hammond reads it;) not that our praises can bear any proportion to God's greatness, for it is infinite; but, because he is greater than we can express or conceive, we must raise our conceptions and expressions to the highest degree we can attain to. Be not afraid of saying too much in the praises of God, as we often do in praising even great and good men; Deus non patitur hyperbolum—We cannot speak hyperbolically of God; all the danger is of saying too little; and therefore, when we have done our utmost, we must own, that though we have praised him in consideration of, yet not in proportion to, his excellent greatness.

3. In what manner this tribute must be paid; with all the kinds of musical instruments that were then used in the temple-service, v. 3-5. It is well that we are not concerned to inquire what sort of instruments each of these was; it is enough that they were well known then: our concern is, to know, (1.) That hereby is intimated how full the psalmist's heart was of the praises of God, and how desirous he was that this good work might go on. (2.) That in serving God we should spare no cost or pains. (3.) That the best music in God's ears is devout and pious affections; non musica chordula, sed cor—not a melodiou string, but a melodious heart. Praise God with a strong faith; praise him with holy love and delight; praise him with an entire confidence in Christ; praise him with a believing triumph over the powers of darkness; praise him with an earnest desire toward him, and a full satisfaction in him; praise him by universal respect to all his commands; praise him by a cheerful submission to all his dispositions; praise him by rejoicing in his love, and solacing yourselves in his great goodness; praise him by promoting the interests of the kingdom of his grace; praise him by a lively hope and expectation of the kingdom of his glory. (4.) That various instruments being used in praising God, it should yet be done with an exact and perfect harmony; they must not hinder, but help, one another. The New-Testament concert, instead of this, is, with one mind, and one mouth, to glorify, Rom. xv. 6.

4. Who must pay this tribute; (v. 6.) Let every thing that has breath praise the Lord. He began with a call to those that had a place in his sanctuary, and were employed in the temple-service; but he concludes with a call to all the children of men, in prospect of the time when the Gentiles should be taken into the church, and in every place, as acceptably as at Jerusalem, this incense should be offered, Mal. i. 11. Some think that in every thing that has breath, here we must include the inferior creatures, (as Gen. vii. 22,) all in whose nostrils was the breath of life. They praise God according to their capacity: the singing of birds is a sort of praising God. The brutes do in effect say to man, "We would praise God if we could, do you do it for us." John in vision heard a song of praise from every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, Rev. v. 13. Others think that the children of men only are meant; for into them God has in a more peculiar manner breathed the breath of life, and they are become living souls Gen. ii. 7. Now that the gospel is ordered to be preached to every creature, to every human creature, it is required that every human creature praise the Lord. What have we our breath, our spirit, for, but to spend it in praising God; and how can we spend it better? Prayers are called our breathings, Lam. iii. 56. Let every one that breathes toward God in prayer, finding the benefit of that, breathe forth his praises too. Having breath, let the praises of God perfume our breath; let us be in this work as in our element; let it be to us as the air we breathe in, which we could not live without. Having our breath in our nostrils, let us consider that it is still going forth, and will shortly go, and not return. Since therefore we must shortly breathe our last, while we have breath let us praise the Lord; and then we shall breathe our last with comfort, and, when death runs us out of breath, we shall remove to a better state, to breathe God's praises in a freer better air.

The three first of the five books of psalms (according to the Hebrew division) concluded with Amen and Amen, the fourth with Amen, Hallelujah, but the last, and in it the whole book, concludes only with Hallelujah, because the six last psalms are wholly taken up in praising God, and there is not a word of complaint or petition in them. The nearer good Christians come to their end, the fuller they should be of the praises of God. Some think that this last psalm is designed to represent to us the work of glorified saints in heaven, who are there continually praising God. And musical instruments, here said to be used, are no more to be understood literally than the gold, and pearls, and precious stones, which are said to adorn the New Jerusalem, Rev. xxi. 18, 19. But as those intimate that the glories of heaven are the most excellent glories, so these intimate that the praises the saints offer there are the most excellent praises. Prayers will there be swallowed up in everlasting praises; there will be no intermission in praising God, and yet no weariness. Hallelujahs for ever repeated, and yet still new songs. Let us often take a pleasure in thinking what glorified saints are doing in heaven, what those are doing whom we have been acquainted with on earth, but are gone before us thither; and let it not only make us long to be among them, but quicken us to do this part of the will of God on earth, as they do it that are in heaven.

And therefore let us spend as much of our time as may be in this good work, because in it we hope to spend a joyful eternity. Hallelujah is the word there; (Rev. xix. 1, 3,) let us echo to it now, as those that hope to join in it shortly. Hallelujah, praise ye the Lord.
AN

WITH

OF THE

PROVERBS.

We have now before us,

I. A new Author, or Penman rather, or Pen, (if you will,) made use of by the Holy Ghost, for making known the mind of God to us, writing as moved by the Finger of God, so the Spirit of God is called; and that is Solomon, through his hand came this book of Scripture, and the two that follow it, Ecclesiastes and Canticles, a Sermon and a Song. Some think he wrote Canticles when he was very young, Proverbs in the midst of his days, and Ecclesiastes when he was old. In the title of his song, he only writes himself Solomon, perhaps, because he wrote it before his accession to the throne, being filled with the Holy Ghost when he was young. In the title of his Proverbs he writes himself the son of David, king of Israel, for then he ruled over Israel. In the title of his Ecclesiastes he writes himself the son of David, king of Jerusalem, because then, perhaps, his influence was grown less upon the distant tribes, and he confined himself very much in Jerusalem. Concerning this author we may observe: 1. That he was a king, and a king’s son. The penman of scripture, hitherto, were most of them men of the first rank in the world, as Moses and Joshua, Samuel and David, and now Solomon; but, after him, the inspired writers were generally poor prophets, men of no figure in the world, because that dispensation was approaching in which God would choose the weak and foolish things of the world to confound the wise and mighty, and the poor should be employed to evangelize. Solomon was a very rich king, and his dominions very large, a king of the first magnitude, and yet he addicted himself to the study of divine things, and was a prophet, and a prophet’s son. It is no disparagement to the greatest princes and potentates in the world to instruct these about them in religion and the laws of it. 2. That he was one whom God endued with extraordinary measures of wisdom and knowledge, in answer to his prayers at his accession to the throne; his prayer was exemplary, Give me a wise and an understanding heart; the answer to it was encouraging, he had that, and all other things were added to him. Now here we find what good use he made of the wisdom God gave him; he not only governed himself and his kingdom with it, but he gave rules of wisdom to others also, and transmitted them to posterity. Thus we must trade with the talents with which we are trusted, accordingly as they are. 3. That he was one who had his faults, and in his latter end turned aside from those good ways of God which in this book he had directed others in. We have the story of it, 1 Kings xi. and a sad story it is, that the penman of such a book as this should apostatize as he did; tell it not in Gath; but let these who are most eminently useful take warning, by this, not to be proud or secure; and let us all learn not to think the worse of good instructions, though we have them from those who do not themselves altogether live up to them.

II. We have here a new way of writing, in which divine wisdom is taught us by Proverbs, or short sentences, which contain their whole design within themselves, and are not connected with one another. We have had divine laws, histories, and songs, and now divine proverbs; such various methods has Divine Wisdom used for our instruction, that, no stone being left unturned to do us good, we may be inexcusable if we perish in our folly. Teaching by proverbs was, 1. An ancient way of teaching, it was the most ancient way among the Greeks; the seven wise men of Greece had each of them some one saying that they valued themselves upon, and that made them famous; these sentences were inscribed on pillars, and had in great veneration, as that which was said to come down from heaven; *A callo descendit, γιρισε συγγια—Know thyself, in a precept which came down from heaven. 2. It was a plain and easy way of teaching, which cost neither the teachers nor the learners much pains, nor put their understandings or their memories to the stretch. Long periods, and arguments far-fetched, must be laboured both by him that frames them and by him that takes them; while a proverb, which carries both its sense and its evidence in a little compass, is quickly apprehended and subscribed to, and is easily retained. Both David’s devotions and Solomon’s instructions are sententious, which may recommend that way of expression to those who minister about holy things, both in praying and preaching. 3. It is a very probable way of teaching, and served admirably well to answer the end. The word *Mashal, here used for a proverb, comes from a word that signifies to rule; or have dominion, because of the commanding power and influence which wise and weighty sayings have upon the children of men; he that teaches by them, *dominatur in concionibus—rules his auditory. It is easy to observe how the world is governed by proverbs; *Asaith the proverb of the ancients, (1 Sam. xxiv. 15.) or, as the vulgar express it, as the old saying is, goes very far with most men in forming their notions and fixing their resolves. Much of the wisdom of the ancients had been handed down to posterity by proverbs; and some think we may judge of the temper and character of a nation by the complexion of its vulgar proverbs. Proverbs in conversation are like axioms in philosophy, maxims in law, and postulates in the mathematics, which nobody disputes, but every one endeavours to expound, so as to have them on his side. Yet there are many corrupt proverbs, which tend to debauch men's minds and harden them in sin. The Devil has his proverbs, and the world and the flesh have their proverbs, which reflect on God and religion, (as Ezek. xii. 22—xxvii. 2.) to guard us against the corrupt influences of which, God has his proverbs, which are all wise and good, and tend to make us so. These proverbs of Solomon were not merely a collection of the wise sayings that had been formerly delivered, as some have imagined, but were the dictates of the Spirit of God in Solomon. The very first of them, (ch. 1. 7.) agrees with what God said to man in the beginning, (Gen. xxviii. 28.) Behold, the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom; so that, though Solomon was great, and his name may serve as much as any man's to recommend his writings, yet behold, a greater than Solomon is here. It is God, by Solomon, that here speaks to us; I say, to us; for these proverbs were written for our learning, and when Solomon speaks to his son, the exhortation is said to speak to us as children, Heb. xii. 5. And as we have no book so useful to us in our devotions as David's psalms, so have we none so serviceable to us, far the right ordering of our conversations, as Solomon's proverbs, which, as David signs of the commandments, are exceeding broad, containing, in a little compass, a complete body of divine truths, and economics, exposing every vice, recommending every virtue, and suggesting rules for the government of ourselves in every relation and condition, and every turn of conversation. The learned Bishop Hild has drawn up a system of moral philosophy out of Solomon's Proverbs and Ecclesiastes. The nine first chapters of this book are reckoned as a preface by way of exposition to the study and practice of wisdom's rules, and caution against those things that would hinder therein. We have then the first volume of Solomon's proverbs; (ch. x.—xxiv.) after that, a second volume; (ch. xxv.—xxxix.) and Amos Agur's prophecy, (ch. xxx.) and Lemuel's, ch. xxxi. The scope of all is one and the same, to direct us so to order our conversations aright, as that in the end we may see the salvation of the Lord. The best comment on those rules is to be ruled by them.

PROVERBS, I.

CHAP. I.

Those who read David's psalms, especially those toward the latter end, would be tempted to think that religion is all rapture, and consists in nothing but the ecstasies and transports of devotion; and doubtless there is a time for them, and, if there be a heaven upon earth, it is in them: but, while we are on earth, we cannot be wholly taken up with them, we have a life to live in the flesh, must have a conversation in the world, and into that we must now be taught to carry our religion, which is a rational thing, and very serviceable to the conduct of human life, and tends as much to make us discreet as to make us devout, to make the face shine before men in a prudent, honest, useful conversation, as to make the heart burn toward God in holy and pious affections. In this chapter, then, I teach the bounds of the boundless and the vast scope and design of it, v. 1—6. II. The first principle of it recommended to our serious consideration, v. 7—9. III. A necessary caution against bad company, v. 10—19. IV. A faithful and lively representation of wisdom's reasonings with the proverbs, when, and the certain ruin of those who turn a deaf ear to those reasonings, v. 20—33.

1. THE proverbs of Solomon, the son of David, king of Israel; 2. To know wisdom and instruction; to perceive the words of understanding; 3. To receive the instruction of wisdom, justice, and judgment; and equity; 4. To give subtlety to the simple, to the young man knowledge and discretion. 5. A wise man will hear, and will increase learning; and a man of understanding shall attain unto wise counsels; 6. To understand a proverb, and the interpretation; the words of the wise, and their dark sayings.

We have here an introduction to this book, which some think was prefixed by the collector and publisher, as Ezra; but it is rather supposed to have been penned by Solomon himself, who, in the beginning of his book, proposes his end in writing it, that he might keep to his business, and closely pursue that end. We are here told,

I. Who wrote these wise sayings; (v. 1.) they are the proverbs of Solomon. I. His name signifies peaceable, and the character both of his spirit and of his reign answered to it; both were peaceable. David, whose life was full of troubles, wrote a book of devotion; for, Is any afflicted? Let him pray. Solomon, who lived quietly, wrote a book of instruction, for when the churches had rest, they were edified. In times of peace, we should learn ourselves, and teach others, that which, in troublous times, both they and we must practise. 2. He was the son of David; it was his honour to stand related to that good man, and he reckoned it so with good reason, for he fared the better for it, 1 Kings xi. 12. He had been blessed with a good education, and many a good prayer had been put up for him, (Ps. lxxxii. 1.) the effect of both which appeared in his wisdom and usefulness. The generation of the upright is sometimes thus blessed, that they are made blessings, eminent blessings, in their day. Christ is often called the Son of David, and Solomon was of the same type of him in this, as in other things, that he opened his mouth in parables or proverbs. 3. He was king of Israel; a king, and yet it was no disapprobation to him to be an instructor of the ignorant, and a teacher of babes; king of Israel, that people among whom God was known, and his name was great; among them he learned wisdom; and to them he communicated it. All the earth sought to hear his wisdom, which excelled all men's; (1 Kings iv. 30—xxiv.) it was an honour to Israel, that their king was such a dictator, such an oracle, Solomon was famous for apothegms; every word he said had weight in it, and something that was surprising and edifying; his servants, who attended him, and heard his wisdom, had, among them, collected 3000 proverbs of his, which they wrote in their day-books, but these were of his own writing, and do not amount to near a thousand; in these, he was divinely inspired. Some think, that out of those other proverbs of his, which were not so inspired, the apocryphal books of Ecclesiasticus, and the Wisdom of Solomon were compiled, in which are many excellent sayings, and of great use; but, take all together, they are far short of this book.
The Roman emperors had each of them their symbol or motto, as many now have with their coat of arms. But Solomon had many weighty sayings, not, as theirs, borrowed from others, but all the product of that extraordinary wisdom which God had endowed him with.

II. For what end they were written; (v. 2-4.) not to gain a reputation to the author, or strengthen his interest among his subjects, but for the use and benefit of all that in every age and place will govern themselves by these dictates, and study them close.

This book will help us,

1. To form right notions of things, and to possess our minds with clear and distinct ideas of them, that we may know wisdom and instruction; that wisdom which is got by instruction, by divine revelation; may know both how to speak and act wisely ourselves, and to give instruction to others.

2. To distinguish between truth and falsehood, good and evil; to perceive the words of understanding; to apprehend them, to judge of them, to guard against mistakes, and to accommodate what we are taught to ourselves, and our own use, that we may discern things that differ, and not be imposed upon, and may approve things that are excellent, and not lose the benefit of them, as the apostle prays, Phil. i. 10.

3. To order our conversation aright in every thing, v. 3. This book will give, that we may receive, the instruction of wisdom, that knowledge which will guide our practice in justice, judgment, and equity, (v. 3.) which will dispose us to render to all their due, to God the things that are God’s, in all the exercises of religion, and to all men what is due to them, according to the obligations which, by relation, office, contract, or upon any other account, we lie under to them. Note, Those are truly wise, and none but those, who are universally conscientious; and the design of the scripture is, to teach us that wisdom is not only sensible of their own ignorance, and their need to be taught, and are therefore desirous to receive instruction; and those who receive those instructions, in their light and power, though they be simple, will hereby be made subtle, graciously craftry to know the sin they should avoid, and the duty they should do, and to escape the tempter’s wiles. He that is harmless as the dove, by observing Solomon’s rules, may become wise as the serpent, and may avoid the snares of wickedness, he begins to govern himself by the word of God, becomes graciously wise. 2. For young people, to give them knowledge and discretion. Youth is the learning age, catch es at instructions, receives impressions, and retains what is then received; it is therefore of great consequence that the mind be then seasoned well, nor can it receive a better tincture than from the proverbs. Young people is prone to be rash, heady, and inconsiderate: man is born like the wild ass’s colt; and therefore needs to be broken by the restraints, and managed by the rules, we find here. And if young people will but take heed to their ways, according to Solomon’s proverbs, they will soon gain the knowledge and discretion of the ancients. Solomon had an eye to posterity in writing this book, hoping by it to season the minds of the rising generation with the generous principles of wisdom and virtue.

IV. What good use may be made of them, v. 5, 6. Those who are young and simple may be them be made wise, and are not excluded from Solomon’s school, as they were from Plato’s. But is it only for such? No, here is not only milk for babes, but strong meat for hungry men. But make the foolish and bad wise and good, but the wise and good wiser and better; and though the simple and the young man may perhaps slight these instructions, and not be the better for them, yet the wise man will hear; wisdom will be justified by her own children, though not by the children sitting in the market-place. Note, While wise men must hear, and not think themselves too wise to learn. A wise man is sensible of his own defects, (Prover. i. 7.) sed ignorantiam meam non ignorabo—I am ignorant of many things, but not of my own ignorance, and therefore is still pressing forward, that he may increase in learning, may know more, and know it better, more clearly and distinctly, and may know better how to make use of it. As long as we live, we should strive to increase in all useful learning. It was a saying of one of the greatest of the rabbins, Qui non aget scieniaciae, (Pirke Avevros.)—He that has not an increasing stock of knowledge be not increasing, it is wasting; and they that would increase in learning must study the scriptures; those perfect the man of God. A wise man, by increasing in learning, is not only profitable to himself, but to others also.

1. As a counsellor. A man of understanding in these precepts of wisdom, by comparing them with one another, and with his own observations, shall by degrees attain unto wise counsel, he shall, by his preferment, and will be consulted as an oracle, and intrusted with the conduct of public affairs; he shall come to sit at the helm, so the word signifies. Note, Industry is the way to honour; and those whom God has blessed with wisdom must study to do good with it, according as their sphere is. It is more dignity, indeed, to be counsellor to the prince, but it is more charity to be counsellor to the poor, as Job was with his wisdom, (Job xxix. 15.) I was eyes to the blind. 2. As an interpreter; (v. 6.) to understand a proverb. Solomon was himself famous for expounding riddles, and resolving hard questions, which was, of old, the celebrated entertainment of the eastern princes; witness the solutions he gave to the knots with which the queen of Sheba thought to puzzle him. Now, here he undertakes to furnish his reader with a full and satisfactory interpretation to the best purposes. They shall understand a proverb, even the interpretation, without which the proverb is a nut uncracked; when they hear a wise saying, though it be figurative, they shall take the sense of it, and know how to make use of it. The words of the wise are sometimes dark sayings. In St. Paul’s epistles there was that which was hard to be understood; but to those who, being well versed in the scriptures, and are in a spirit and furnished with spiritual, they will be easy and safe. So that, if you ask them, Have ye understood all these things? they may answer, Yes, Lord. Note, It is a credit to religion, when men of honesty are men of sense; all good people, therefore, should aim to be intelligent, and run to and fro, take pains in the use of means, that their knowledge may be increased.

7. The fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge: but fools despise wisdom and instruction. 8. My son, hear the instruction of thy father, and forsake not the law of thy mother: 9. For they shall be an ornament of grace unto thy head, and chains about thy neck.

Solomon, having undertaken to teach a young man knowledge and discretion, here lays down two genera.
and the king’s anger is but the" "fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge; it is the primitive part of knowledge, so the margin; it is the head of knowledge; that is, knowledge, that those know nothing who do not know this. 2. In order to the attaining of all useful knowledge, this is most necessary, that we fear God; we are not qualified to profit by the instructions that are given us, unless our minds be possessed with a holy reverence of God, and every thought within us be brought into obedience to him. If any man do his will, he shall know of his doctrine, John vii. 17. 3. Knowledge is the first step from the fear of God, so it must tend to it as its progression and centre. Those know enough who know how to fear God, who are careful in every thing to please him, and fearful of offending him in any thing; this is the alpha and omega of knowledge.

To confirm this truth, that an eye to God must both direct and quicken all our pursuits of knowledge, he observes, Fools (atheists who have no regard to God) despise wisdom and instruction; having no dread at all of God’s wrath, nor any desire of his favour, they will not give you thanks for telling them what they may do to escape his wrath, and obtain his favour. They who say to the Almighty, Depart from us, who are so far from fearing him, that they set him at defiance, can excite no surprise if they desire not the knowledge of his ways, but despise that instruction. Note, Those are fools who do not fear God, and value the scriptures; and, though they may pretend to be admirers of wit, they are really strangers and enemies to wisdom.

II. Let them have regard to their parents, as their superiors; (v. 8, 9.) My son, hear the instruction of thy father. He means, not only that he would have his own children to be observant of him, and of what he said to them, nor only that he would have his pupils, and those who came to him to be taught to look upon him as their father, and attend to his precepts with the respect due to the parent of children; but that he would have all children to be dutiful and respectful to their parents, and to conform to the virtuous and religious education which they give them, according to the law of the fifth commandment.

1. He takes it for granted, that parents will, with all the wisdom they have, instruct their children, and, with all the authority they have, give law to them for their good; and therefore he tells them, Thou art the children of children; but that he would have all children to be dutiful and respectful to their parents, and to conform to the virtuous and religious education which they give them, according to the law of the fifth commandment.

2. He charges children both to remember, and to retain, the good lessons and laws their parents give them.

(1.) To receive them with readiness; “Hear the instruction of thy father; hear, and heed it; hear it, and bid it welcome, and be thankful for it, and subscribe to it.”

(2.) To retain them with resolution; “Forsake not their law; think not that, when thou art grown up, and no longer under tutors and governors, thou mayest live at large; no, the law of thy mother was according to the law of thy God, and therefore it must never be forsaken.” That is, I commend the instruction of parents, carefully gathered up, and lived up to, shall be an ornament of grace unto thy head, (v. 9.) such an ornament as is, in the sight of God, of great price, and shall make thee look as great as those that wear gold chains about their necks.” Let divine truths and commands be to us as a coronet, or a collar of SS, which are badges of first-rate honours; let us value them, and be ambitious of them, and then they shall be so to us. Those are truly valuable, and shall be valued, who value themselves more by their virtue and piety than by their worldly wealth and dignity.

10. My son, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not. 11. If they say, Come with us, let us lay wait for blood, let us lurk privily for the innocent without cause: 12. Let us swallow them up alive, as the grave; and whole, as those that go down into the pit: 13. We shall find all precious substance, we shall fill our houses with spoil: 14. Cast in thy lot among us; let us all have one purse. 15. My son, walk not thou in the way with them; refrain thy foot from their path: 16. For their feet run to evil, and make haste to shed blood: 17. (Surely in vain the net is spread in the sight of any bird:) 18. And they lay wait for their own blood; they lurk privily for their own lives. 19. So are the ways of every one that is greedy of gain; which taketh away the life of the owners thereof.

Here Solomon gives another general rule to young people, in order to their finding out, and keeping in, the paths of wisdom, and that is, to take heed of the snare of bad company. David’s psalms begin with this caution, and so do Solomon’s proverbs; for nothing is more destructive both to a lively devotion and to a regular conversation; (v. 10.) My son, whom I love, and have a tender concern for, if sinners entice thee, cast out those not. This is good advice for parents not to give their children, when they send them abroad into the world; it is the same that St. Peter gave to his new converts, (Acts ii. 40.) Save yourselves from this untoward generation. Observe, 1. How industrious wicked people are to seduce others into the paths of the destroyer; they will entice; sinners love company in sin; the angels that fell were tempters almost as soon as they were sinners. They do not therefore stand, but condescend and talk with flattering and fair speech; with a bait they draw the unwary young man to the hook. But they mistake, if they think, that, by bringing others to partake with them in their guilt, and to be bound, as it were, in the bond with them, they shall have the less to pay themselves; for they will have so much the more to answer for. 2. How cautious young people should be that they be not seduced by them; "Consent thou not; and then, though they entice thee, they cannot force thee. Do not say as they say, nor do as they do, or would have thee to do; have no fellowship with them."

To enforce this caution,

1. He represents the fallacious reasonings which sinners use in their induciments, and the arts of wheedling which they have, for the beguiling of unstable souls. He specifies highwaymen, who do what they can to draw others into their gang, v. 11-14. See here what they would have the young man to do; "Come with us, (v. 11.) let us have thy company;" at first, they pretend to ask no more; but the courtship rises higher, v. 14. Cast in thy lot among us; come in partner with us, join our force to yours, and let us resolve to live and die together; thou shalt fare as we fare; and let us all have one purse, that which we get together we may spend merrily together;" for that is it they aim at.

Two unreasonable unsatiable lusts they propose to themselves the gratification of, and therewith entice their prey into the snare.

1. Their cruelty. They thirst after blood, and have no compassion in them, and never gave them any provocation, because, by their honesty and industry, they shame and condemn them; "Let us therefore lay wait for their blood, and lurk privily for them; they are conscious to themselves of no crime, and consequently apprehensive of no danger, but travel unarmed; therefore we shall make the more easy prey of them. And, Oh how sweet it will be to swallow them up alive!" v. 12. These bloody men would do this as greedily as the hungry lion devours the lamb. If it be objected, "The remains of the murdered will betray the murderers;" they answer, "No danger of that, we will swallow them whole as those that are buried." Who could imagine that human nature should degenerate so far, that it ever should be a pleasure to one man to destroy another?

2. Their covetousness. They hope to get a good booty by it; (v. 13.) "We shall find all precious substance by following this trade; what though we venture our necks by it, we shall fill our houses with spoil." See here, (1.) The idea they had of worldly wealth. They call it precious substance; whereas it is neither substance, nor precious; it is a shadow, it is vanity, especially that which is got by robbery, Ps. lxxi. 10. It is as that which is not, which will give a man no solid satisfaction. It is cheap, it can be got at the end of his fingers, and therefore they will hazard their lives, and perhaps their souls, in pursuit of it. It is the ruining mistake of thousands, that they over-value the wealth of this world, and look on it as precious substance. (2.) The abundance of it, which they promised themselves; We shall fill our houses with it. Those who trade with sin promise themselves mighty bargains, and yet they say to a vain and foolish grace, All this will I give thee, (says the tempter;) but they only dream that they eat; the housefuls dwindle into scarcely a handful, like the grass on the house-tops.

II. He shows the perniciousness of these ways, as a reason why we should dread them; (v. 15.) "My son, walk thou not in the way with them; do not associate with them; get, and keep, as far off from them as thou canst, refrain thy foot from their path, do not let them, nor be found in it. Such is the corruption of our nature, that our foot is very prone to step into the path of sin, so that we must use necessary violence upon ourselves to refrain our foot from it, and check ourselves, if at any time we take the least step towards it. Consider, 1. How pernicious their way is in its own nature; (v. 16.) Their feet run to evil, to that which is displeasing to God and hurtful to mankind, for they make haste to shed blood. Note, The way of sin is down-hill; men not only cannot stop themselves, but, the longer they continue in it, the faster they run, and make haste in it, as if they were afraid they should not do mischief enough, and were resolved to lose no time. They said they would proceed leisurely, (Let us lay wait for blood, v. 11.) but they will find all in haste, so much has Satan filled their hearts."

2. How pernicious the consequences of it will be. They are plainly told that this wicked way will certainly end in their own destruction, and yet they persist in it. Herein, (1.) They are like the silly bird, that sees the net spread to take her, and yet it is in vain; she is decoyed into it by the bait, and yet is not taken, because the fowler who gave her, v. 17. But we think ourselves of far more value than many sparrows, and therefore should have more wit, and act with more caution. God has made us wiser than the fowls of heaven; (Job xxxv. 11.) and shall we, then, be as stupid as they? (2.) They are worse than the birds, and have not the sense which we sometimes perceive them to have: for the fowler knows it is in vain to lay his snare in the sight of the bird; he therefore he has an art to conceal it. But the sinner sees ruin at the end of his way; the murderer, the thief, see the jail and the gallows before them, nay, they might see hell before them, their watchmen tell them they shall surely die, but it is to no purpose; they rush into sin, and rush on in it, like the horse into the battle. For really the stone they roll will turn upon themselves, v. 18, 19. They lay wait, and lurk privily, for the blood and lives of others, but it will prove contrary to their intention, to be for their own blood, their own lives; they will come at length, to a shamefu]l end; and, if they escape the sword of the magistrate, yet there is a divine Nemesis that pursues them. Vengeance suffers them not to live. Their greediness of gain hurries them upon those practices which will not suffer them to live out half their days, but will cut off the number of their months in the midst. They have little reason to be proud of their property in that which takes away the life of the owners, and then passes to other masters; and what is a man profited, though he gain the world, if he lose his life? for then he can enjoy the world no longer; much less if he lose his soul, and that be drowned in destruction and perdition, as multitudes are by the love of money.

Now, though Solomon prescribes only the temptation to rob on the highway, yet he intends hereby to warn us against all other evils which sinners entice men to; such are the ways of the drunkards and unclean, they are indulging themselves in those pleasures which tend to their ruin, both here and for ever; and, therefore, consent not to them.

20. Wisdom crieth without; she uttereth her voice in the streets; 21. She crieth in the chief place of concourse, in the openings of the gates: in the city she uttereth her words, saying, 22. How long, ye simple ones, will ye love simplicity, and the scorner delight in his scorning, and fools hate knowledge? 23. Turn you at my reproof; behold, I will pour out my Spirit unto you, I will make known my words unto you. 24. Because I have called, and ye refused; I have stretched out my hand, and no man regarded; 25. But ye have set at nought all my counsel, and would none of my reproof; 26. I also will laugh at your calamity; I will mock when your fear cometh. 27. When your fear cometh as desolation, and your destruction cometh as a whirlwind; when distress and anguish cometh upon you; 28. Then shall they call upon me, but I will not answer; they shall seek me early, but they shall not find me:

For that they hated knowledge, and did not choose the fear of the Lord: 30. They would none of my counsel; they despised all my reproof: 31. Therefore shall they eat of the fruit of their own way, and be filled with their own devices. 32. For the turning away of the simple shall slay them, and the prosperity of fools shall destroy them. 33. But whose heartened unto me shall dwell safely, and shall be quiet from fear of evil.

Solomon, having showed how dangerous it is to hearken to the temptations of Satan, here showeth how dangerous it is not to hearken to the calls of God, which we shall for ever rue the neglect of.

I. By whom God calls to us; by wisdom. It is wisdom that crieth without. The word is plural, wisdoms, for, as there is infinite wisdom in God, so there is the manifold wisdom of God, Eph. iii. 10. God speaks to the children of men by all the kinds of wisdom, and as in every will, so in every word, of God there is a counsel. 1. Human understanding is wisdom, the light and law of nature, the powers and faculties of reason, and the office of conscience, Job xxxviii. 36. By these God speaks to the children of men, and reasons with them; The spirit of a man is the candle of the Lord; and, wherever men go, they may hear a voice behind them, saying, This is the way; and the voice of conscience is the voice of God, and not always a still small voice, but sometimes it crieth. 2. Civil government is wisdom; it is God’s ordinance, magistrates are his vicegerents. God, by David, had said to the fools, Deal not foolishly, Ps. lxxv. 4. In the opening of the gates, and in the places of concourse, where courts were kept, the judges, the wisdom of the nation, call to the wicked people, in God’s name, to repent and reform. 3. Divine revelation is wisdom; all its dictates, all its laws, are wise as wisdom itself. God does, by the written word, by the law of Moses, which sets before us the blessing and the curse, by the priests’ prayers which keep knowledge, by his servants the prophets, and all the ministers of this word, declare his mind to sinners, and give them warning as plainly as that which is proclaimed in the streets or courts of judicature by the criers. God, in his word, not only opens the case, but argues it with the children of men. Come now, and let us reason together, Is. i. 18. 4. Christ himself is Wisdom, is Wisdoms, for in him are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, and he is the centre of all divine revelation, not only the essential Wisdom, but the eternal Word, by whom God speaks to us, and to whom he has committed all judgement; he it is, therefore, who here both pleads with sinners, and passes sentence on them; he calls himself Wisdom, Luke v. 21.

II. How he calls to us, and in what manner. I. Very publicly, that whosoever hath ears to hear may hear, since all are welcome to take the benefit of what is said, and all are concerned to hear it. The rules of wisdom are published without in the streets, not in the schools only, or in the palaces of princes, but in the chief places of concourse, among the common people, that pass and repass in the opening of the gates, and in the city. It is comfortable casting the net of the gospel there where there is a multitude of fish, in hopes that some will then be enclosed. This was the case at Jerusalem, Lord Jesus, 4. John xxi. 18. He taught openly in the temple, and in the crowds of people, and in secret said nothing, (John xviii. 20.) and charged his ministers to proclaim his gospel on the house-tops, Matt. x. 27. God says, (Isa. xlv. 19.) I have not spoken in secret. There is no speech or language where wisdom’s voice is not heard. Truth seeks not corners, nor is virtue ashamed of itself. 2. Very pathetically; she cries, and again she cries, one ear in earnest; Jesus stood from the pulpit, and the shouters were among the people, to spread his words with all possible clearness and affection. God is desirous to be heard and heeded. 3. III. What the call of God and Christ is. 1. He reproves sinners for their folly, and their obstinate persisting in it, v. 22. Observe, (1.) Who they are that Wisdom here reproves and expostulates with. In general, they are such as are simple, and therefore might justly be despised; such as are so senseless and shallow that they are despised; but we must us the means even with those that we have little hopes of, because we know not what divine grace may do. Three sorts of persons are here called to; [1.] Simple ones that love simplicity. Sin is simplicity, and sinners are simple ones; they do foolishly, very foolishly; and the condition of those is very bad, who love simplicity, are fond of their simple notions of good and evil, their simple prejudices against the ways of God, and those who are so senseless and shallow that they are doing a simple thing, sporting themselves in their own deceptions, and flattering themselves in their wickedness. [2.] Scorners that delight in scorning. Proud people that take a pleasure in hectoring all about them; jovial people that banter all mankind, and make a jest of every thing that comes in their way. But scoffers at religion are especially meant, the worst of sinners, that scorn to submit to the truths and counsels of God, and to the reproofs and admonitions of his word, and take a pride in running down everything that is sacred and serious. [3.] Fools that hate knowledge. None but fools hate knowledge; those only are enemies to religion that do not understand it aright. And they are the worst of fools that hate to be instructed and reformed, and have a rooted antipathy to serious godliness. (2.) How the reproof is expressed. "And how long will ye utter your words with all possible clearness and affection. God is desirous to be heard and heeded.

The promises are very encouraging. They that love simplicity find themselves under a moral impotency to change their own mind and way, they cannot turn by any power of their own; to this God answers, Behold, I will pour my Spirit unto you; and I will set my Spirit within you, and I will put my Spirit within you, and I will cause you to walk in my statutes, and ye shall keep my judgments and do them. (Ezr. x. 46.) And work in you both to will and to do that good which, without that grace, you could not do." Help thyself, and God will help thee; stretch forth thy withered hand, and Christ will strengthen and heal it. [1.] The Author of this grace is the Spirit, and that a promised; I will pour out my Spirit unto you, as oil, as water; you shall have the Spirit in abundance, rivers of living water. John vii. 38. Our heavenly Father will give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him. [2.] The means of this grace is the word, which, if we take it aright, will turn us; it is therefore promised, "I will make known my words unto you, not only speak them to you, but make them known, give you to understand them. Note, Special grace is necessary to a sin- cestrian, to those who were improved and counselled to any that honestly seek it, and submit to it. 3. He reads the doom of those that continue ob- stinate against all these means and methods of grace. It is large and very terrible, v. 24-32. Wisdom, having called sinners to return, pauses a while, to see what effect the call has, hearten and hears; but they speak not aright, (Jer. viii. 6.) and therefore she goes on to tell them what will be in the end thereof. (1.) The crime is recited, and it is highly pro- voking. See what it is for which judgment will be given against impenitent sinners in the great day, and you will say they deserve it, and the Lord is righteous in it. It is, in short, rejecting Christ, and the offers of his grace, and refusing to submit to the terms of his gospel, which would have saved them both from the wrath of the law of God, and from the dominion of the law of sin. [1.] Christ called to them, to warn them of their danger; he stretch out his hand to offer them mercy, nay, to have helped them out of their misera- ble condition, stretch out his hand for them to take hold of, but they refused, and no man regard- ed; some were careless, and never heeded it, nor took notice of what was said to them; others were worldly, and though they could not avoid hear- ing the voice of Christ, yet they gave him a flat de- nial, they refused, v. 24. They were in love with their folly, and would not be made wise. They were obstinate to all the methods that were taken to reclaim them. God stretch out his hand in mercies bestowed upon them, and, when those would not work upon them, in corrections, but all were in vain, they regarded the operations of his hand no more than the declarations of his mouth. Christ, having said to them that they were rejected, and that every one that rejected him, not only reprieved them for what they did amiss, but counselled them to do better, (these are reproofs of instruction, and evidences of love and good-will,) but they set at nought all his counsel, as not worth heeding, and would none of his reproof; as if they were below them to be reproved by him, and as if they had never done any thing that deserved re- proof, v. 25. This is repeated; (v. 30.) They would none of my counsel, but rejected it with dis- dain; they called reproofs reproaches, and took them amiss; (Jer. vi. 10.) nay, they despised all my reproof, as if it were all a jest, and not worth taking notice of. Note, Those are marked for ruin that are deaf to reproof and good counsel. [3.] They were exhorted to submit to the gov- ernment of right reason and religion, but they re- belled against both. First, Reason should not rule their conscience contrary to the light of divine truth, because it discovered to them the evil of their deeds, John iii. 20. They hated to be told that which they could not bear to know. Secondly, Religion should not rule them, for they did not choose the fear of the Lord, but chose to walk in the way of their hearts, and in the sight of their eyes. They were pressed to set God always before them, but they chose rather to cast him and his fear behind their backs. Note, Those who do not choose the fear of the Lord, show that they have no knowledge. (2.) The sentence is pronounced, and it is cer- tainly ruining; they that will not submit to God’s government will certainly perish in wrath and curse, and the gospel itself will not relieve them. They would not take the benefit of God’s mercy when it was offered them, and therefore justly fall as victims to his justice, ch. xxix. 1. The threat- enings here will have their full accomplishment in the judgment of the great day, and the eternal misery of the impenitent, of which yet there are some earnest in present judgments. [1.] No sinners are in security, and secure; they live at ease, and set sorrow at defiance. But, First, Their calamity will come, (v. 26.) sickness will come, and those diseases which they shall ap- prehend to be the very arrests and harbingers of death. Other troubles will come, in mind, in estate, which will convince them of their folly in setting God at a distance. Secondly, Their calamity will come, and put them into a great fright. Fear seizes them, and they apprehend that bad will be worse. When public judgments are abroad, the sinners in Zion are afraid, fearfulness surprises the hypocrites; death is the king of terrors to them; (Job xx. 21, &c.—xviii. 11, &c.) this fear will be their continual torment. Thirdly, According to their fright it will be to them. Their fear shall come; the thing they were afraid of shall befall them, it shall come as de- solation, as a mighty deluge, bearing down all be- fore it; it shall be their destruction, their total and final destruction, and it shall come as a whirlwind, which suddenly and forcibly drives away all the chaff. Note, Those that will not admit the fear of God, lay themselves open to all other fears, and their fears will not prove causeless. Fourthly, Their fright will then be turned into despair; Dis- tress and anguish shall come upon them, for, being fallen into the pit they were afraid of, they shall see no way to escape, v. 25. Saul cries out, (2 Sam. i. 9.) Anguish is come upon me; and in hell there is weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth for anguish; tribulation and anguish to the soul of the sinner, the fruit of the indignation and wrath of the righteous God, Rom. ii. 8, 9. [2.] Now God pities their folly, but he will then laugh at their calamity; (v. 26.) "I also will laugh at your distress, even as you laughed at my counsel." God will make use of the sin of one who rejects his religion, will thereby make themselves ridiculous before the world, and shall show the righteousness will laugh at them, (Ps. lii. 6.) for God himself will. It intimates that they shall be for ever shut out of God’s compassions; they have so long sinned against mercy, that they have now quite sinned it away; his eye shall not spare, neither will he have pity. Nay, his justice being glorified in their ruin, he will be pleased with it, though now he would rather they should turn and live. Ah, I will ease me of my adversaries. [3.] Now God is ready to hear their prayers, and to meet them with mercy, if they would but seek to him for it; but then the door will be shut, and they shall cry in vain; (v. 28.) "Then shall they call upon me, when it is too late, Lord, God, open to me. They would then gladly be beholden to that mercy which now they reject and make light of; but I will not answer, because, when I called, they did not answer me." This is the language of God, Deport from me, I know you not. This has been the case of some even in this life, as of Saul, when God answered not by Urim or propheths; but, ordi- narily, while there is life, there is room for prayer, and hope of speed; and therefore this must refer to the inexorable justice of the last judgment. Then those that slighted God will seek him early, earnest ly, but in vain; they shall not find him, because they sought him not when he might be found, Isa. lv. 6. The rich man in hell begged, but was denied.
[4.] Now they are eager upon their own way, and fond of their own devices; but then they will have enough of them, (v. 31.) according to the proverb, Let men drink as they brew; they shall eat the fruit of their own ways, their wages shall be according to their work, and, as was their choice, so shall their doom be, Gal. vi. 7, 8. Note, First, There is a natural tendency in sin to destruction, Jam. i. 15. Sinners are certainly miserable, if they do but eat the fruit of their own ways. Secondly, They that perish must thank themselves, and can lay no blame upon any other. It is their own device, let them make their boast of it. God chooses their detusions, Isa. lxi. 4.

[5.] Now they value themselves upon their worldly prosperity; but then that shall help to aggravate their ruin, v. 32. First, They are now proud that they can turn away from God, and get clear of the restraints of religion; but, that very thing will, when they see, the remembrance of it shall cut them to the heart. Secondly, They are now proud of their own security and sensuality; but the case of the simple (so the margin reads it) shall stay them; the more secure they are, the more certain and the more dreadful will their destruction be, and the prosperity of fools shall help to destroy them, by puffing them up with pride, guiling their hearts to the world, furnishing them with fuel for their lusts, and heightening their hopes of prosperity; and this is the case of all who are not inclining to God, and are not afraid of offending him. They must, therefore, be afraid of God; or, as Solomon says, Be afraid of God, and he shall keep thee from the evil. He justly compares the fear of God with the fear of a parent; the young man may be under the protection of his kindred, but there is no certain safety except under the protection of God. For those who are under his protection, he shall keep them, but for those that are under the protection of the world, he shall destroy them. And he says concerning such, 1. They shall dwell under the special protection of Heaven, so that nothing shall do him any real hurt, v. 33. 2. They shall be safe, and have no disquieting apprehensions of danger; he shall not only be safe from evil, but quiet from the fear of it. Though the earth be moved, and may shake their fear; Would we be safe from evil, and quiet from the fear of it? Let religion always rule us, and the word of God be our counselor. That is the way to dwell safely in this world, and to be quiet from the fear of evil in the other world.

CHAP. II.

Solomon, having foretold the destruction of those who are obstinate in iniquity, in this chapter applies himself to those who are willing to be taught, and I. He shows them, that, if they would diligently use the means of knowledge and grace, they should obtain of God the knowledge and grace which they seek, v. 1.-9. He shows them of what unpeachable advantage it would be to them. 1. It would preserve them from the snares of evil men, (v. 10.-15.) and of evil women, v. 16.-19. II. It would direct them into, and keep them in, the way of good men, v. 20.-22. So that, in this chapter, we are taught both how to get wisdom, and how to use it when we have it, that we may neither seek it, nor receive it in vain.

1. My son, if thou wilt receive my words, and hide my commandments with thee; 2. So that thou incline thine ear unto wisdom, and apply thy heart to understanding; 3. Yea, if thou criest after knowledge, and liftest up thy voice for understanding; if thou seest her as silver, and searchest for her as for hid treasures; 5. Then shall thou understand the fear of the Lord, and find the knowledge of God: 6. For the Lord giveth wisdom: out of his mouth cometh knowledge and understanding; 7. He layeth up sound wisdom for the righteous; he is a buckler to them that walk uprightly. 8. He keepeth the paths of judgment, and preserveth the way of his saints. 9. Then shalt thou understand righteousness, and judgment, and equity; yea, every good path.

Job had asked, long before this, Where shall wisdom be found? Where cometh wisdom? Job xxvii. 19. He had given this general answer, (v. 23.) God knoweth the place of it; but Solomon here goes further, and tells us both where we may find it, and how we may get it. Where are we told, I. What means we must use, that we may obtain wisdom.

1. We must closely attend to the word of God, for that is the word of wisdom, which is able to make us wise unto salvation, 2 Cor. iv. 6. We must, therefore, receive the word of God with all readiness of mind, and bid it welcome, even the commandments as well as the promises, without murmuring or disputing. Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth. 3. We must hide them with us, as we do our treasures, which we are afraid of being robbed of. We must not only receive, but retain, the word of God, and lodge it in our hearts, that it may be always ready to us. 4. We must incline our ear to them; we must lay hold on all opportunities of hearing the word of God, and listen to it with attention and seriousness, as those that are afraid of letting it slip. 5. We must apply our hearts to them, else inclining the ear to them will stand us in no stead.

2. We must be much in prayer, v. 3. We must cry after knowledge, as one that is ready to perish, for hunger begs hard for bread; faint desires will not prevail, we must be importunate, as those that knew the worth of knowledge, and our own want of it. We must, therefore, as new-born babes, after the sincere milk of the word, 1 Pet. ii. 2. We must lift up our voice for understanding, lift it up to heaven; from thence these good and perfect gifts must be expected, Jam. i. 17. Job xxxviii, 34. We must give our voice to understanding, so the word is; speak for it, vote for it; submit the tongue to the command of wisdom; we must consecrate our voice to it; having applied our heart to it, we must employ our voice in seeking for it. Solomon could write probatom est, upon this method; he prayed for wisdom, and so obtained it.

3. We must be willing to take pains; (v. 4.) we must seek it as silver, preferring it far before all the wealth of this world, and labouring in search of it as those who dig in the mines, who undergo great toil, and run great hazards, with indefatigable industry, and invincible constancy and resolution, in pursuit of the cress; or as those who hunt up caribou, up early, up late, and turn every stone to get money, and fill their treasures. Thus diligent must we be in the use of the means of knowledge, following on to know the Lord.

II. What success we may hope for in the use of these means; our labour shall not be in vain; for, 1. We shall know how to maintain our acquaintance and communion with God; Thou shalt understand the fear of the Lord; (v. 5, 6.) thou shalt know how to worship him aright, shalt be led into the meaning and mystery of every ordinance, and be enabled to answer the end of its institution." Therefore shall find the knowledge of God, which is necessary to our fearing him aright. It concerns us to understand how much it is our interest to know God, and to evidence it by acceptable affections toward him, and adorations of him. 2. We shall know how to carry it into practice in mankind (v. 9.) "Thou shalt understand, by the word of God, righteousness, and judgment, and equity; shall learn those principles of justice and charity, and fair dealing, which shall guide and govern thee in the whole course of thy conversation, shall make thee fit for every relation, every business, and faithful to every trust. It shall give thee not only a right notion of justice, but a disposition to practise it, and to render to every man his due; for this will not only do thee right, but shall perfectly understand it." This will lead them into every good path, for the scripture will make the man of God perfect. Note, Those have the best knowledge who know their duty, Ps. cxli. 10.

III. What ground we have to hope for this success in our pursuits of wisdom; we must take our encouragement herein from God only, v. 6., 8.

1. God has wisdom to bestow, v. 6. The Lord not only is wise himself, but he gives his wisdom to such as seek it, and that is more than thousand men in the world can do, for it is God's prerogative to open the understanding. All the wisdom that is in any creature is his gift, his free gift, and he gives it liberally, (Jam. 1. 5.) has given it to many, and is still giving it; to him, therefore, let us apply ourselves for it.

2. He has blessed the world with a revelation of his will. Out of his mouth, by the law and the prophets, by the written word, and by his ministers, both of whom are sent to the children of men, come knowledge and understanding; such a discovery of truth and good, as, if we admit and receive the impressions of it, will make us truly knowing and intelligent. It is both an engagement, and an encouragement, to search after wisdom, that we have the scriptures to search in, in which we may find it if we seek it diligently.

3. He has particularly provided that good men, who sincerely desire to do his will, shall have that knowledge and understanding which are necessary for them, John vii. 17. Let them seek, and they shall find it, let them ask, and it shall be given them, v. 7, 8. Observe here, (1.) Who they are that are thus favoured. They are the righteous, on whom the image of God is renewed, which consists in righteousness; and those who walk uprightly, who are honest in their dealings both with God and man, and make conscience of doing their duty as far as they know it. They are his saints, devoted to his honour, and set apart for his service. (2.) What it is that is provided for them. [1.] Instruction. The means of wisdom are given to all, but wisdom itself, sound wisdom, is laid up for the righteous, laid up in Christ their Head, in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, and who is made of God to us Wisdom. The same that is the Spirit of revelation in the word, is a Spirit of wisdom and understanding, that he who is justified shall receive, and who is justified, shall understand his way; and it is sound wisdom, its foundations firm, its principles solid, and its products of lasting advantage. [2.] Satisfaction. Some read it, He lays up substance for the righteous, not only substantial knowledge, but substantial happiness and comfort. Prov. viii. 21. Riches are things that are not, and they that have them only fancy themselves happy; and wisdom is laid up in Christ, in such great store and in heaven, for the righteous, will make them truly, thoroughly, and eternally, happy. [3.] Protection. Even they who walk uprightly may be brought into danger, for the trial of their faith, but God is, and will be, a Buckler to them, so that no thing that happens to them, shall do them any real hurt, or possess them with any terrific apprehensions; they are safe, and they shall think themselves so. "Fear not, Abrahams, I am thy Shield. It is their way, the paths of judgment, in which they walk, that the Lord knoweth and owns, and takes care of. [4.] Grace to persevere to the end. If we depend upon God, and seek to him for wisdom, he will uphold us in our integrity, will enable us to keep the paths of judgment, however we may be tempted to turn aside out of them; for he preserveth the way of his saints, that it be not perverted, and so preserves them in it safe and blameless to his heavenly kingdom. The assurance God has given us his grace, if duly improved, will excite and quicken our endeavours in doing our duty. Work out your salvation, for God works in you.

10. When wisdom entereth into thy heart, and knowledge is pleasant unto thy soul, 11. Discretion shall preserve thee, understanding shall keep thee; 12. To deliver thee from the way of the evil man, from the man that speaketh froward things; 13. Who leave the paths of uprightness, to walk in the ways of darkness; 14. Who rejoice to do evil, and delight in the frowardness of the wicked; 15. Whose ways are crooked, and they froward in their paths: 16. To deliver thee from the strange woman, even from the stranger which flattereth with her words; 17. Which forsaketh the guide of her youth, and forgetteth the covenant of her God. 18. For her house inclineth unto death, and her paths unto the dead; 19. None that go unto her return again, neither take they hold of the paths of life: 20. That thou mayest walk in the way of good men, and keep the paths of the righteous. 21. For the upright shall dwell in the land, and the perfect shall remain in it. 22. But the wicked shall be cut off from the earth, and the transgressors shall be rooted out of it.

The scope of these verses is to show, 1. What great advantage true wisdom will be to us; it will keep us from the paths of sin, which lead to ruin, and will therein do us a greater kindness than if it enriched us with all the wealth of the world. 2. What good use we should make of the wisdom God gives us; we must use it for our own guidance in the paths of virtue, and for the arming of us against temptations of every kind. 3. By what rules we may try ourselves, whether we have this wisdom or no; this tree will be known by its fruits; if we be wise, it will be evident by our care to avoid all evil company and evil practices.

This wisdom will be of use to us, 1. For our preservation from evil, from the evil of sin, and consequently from the evil of trouble that attends it. In general, (v. 10., 11.) "When wisdom has entire possession of thee it will keep thee." And when has it an entire possession of us.

1. When it has dominion over us; when it not only fills the head with notions, but enters into the heart. It is our business to lay up for the righteous, and has a command and power to become so; when it is upon the throne there, and gives law to the affections and passions; when it enters into the heart, as the leaven into the dough, to diffuse its relish there, and to change it into its own image; then it is likely to do us good. 2. When we have knowledge in it: when knowledge becomes pleasant to the soul; "When thou beginnest to relish it as the most agreeable entertainment, and art subject to its rules, of choice, and with satisfaction; when thou callest the practice of virtue, not a slavery and a task, but liberty and pleasure, and a life of serious goodness, the most comfortable life a man can live in this world, then thou wilt find the reward of it." This must be kept in mind, that these responsibilities should be in some respects unpleasant to the soul, yet even those must be pleasant to the soul. When it is come to this, with us, discretion shall preserve us, and keep us. God keeps the way of his saints, (v. 8.) by giving them discretion to keep out of harm's way, to keep themselves, that the wicked one touch them not. Note, A principle of grace reigning in the heart, will be a powerful preservative both against corruptions of sin and temptations without. Ecc. ix. 18, 19. More particularly, wisdom will preserve us,

(1.) From men of corrupt principles; atheistical, profane men, who make it their business to debase young men's judgments, and instil into their minds prejudices against religion, and arguments for vice. "It will deliver thee from the way of the evil man;" (v. 12.) and a blessed deliverance it will be, as from the very jaws of death, from the way in which the wicked man walketh, in which he would persuade thee to walk." The enemy is spoken of as a crafty adversary, (v. 12.) an evil man, but afterward as many; (v. 13.) there is a club, a gang, of them, that are in confederacy against religion, and join hand in hand for the support of the devil's kingdom and the interests of it.

[1.] They have a spirit of contradiction to that which is good; they speak froward things; they say as they can against religion, both to show their own enmity against, and to delude others from it. They are advocates for Satan, they plead for Balaam, and pervert the right ways of the Lord. How peevishly will profane wits argue for sin; and with what frowardness will they carp at the word of God! Wisdom will keep us either from conversing with such men, or at least from being ensnared by them.

[2.] They are themselves apostates from that which is good, and such are commonly the most malicious and dangerous enemies religion has. Notwithstanding, says Julian, (v. 13.) They leave the paths of uprightness, which they were trained up in, and had set out in; shake off the influences of their education, and break off the thread of their hopeful beginnings, to walk in the ways of darkness, in those wicked ways, which hate the light, in which men are led blindfold by ignorance and error, and which lead men into utter darkness. The ways of sin are ways of darkness, uncomfortable and unsafe; what fools are they that leave the plain, pleasant, light, paths of uprightness, to walk in those ways? Ps. lix. 22. John i. 11. 5. 6.

[3.] They take a pleasure in sin; both in committing it themselves, and in seeing others commit it; (v. 14.) They rejoice in an opportunity to do evil, and in the accomplishment and success of any wicked project. It is sport to a fool to do mischief; now, they are sight more grateful to them, than to see the frowardness of the wicked, and to see those that are hopeful drawn into the ways of sin, and then to see them hardened and confirmed in those ways. They are pleased if they can discern that the devil's kingdom gets ground; (see Rom. i. 28.) such a height of impiety are they arrived at.

[4.] They are resolute in sin; (v. 15.) Their ways are crooked, a great many windings and turnings to escape the perils of their convictions, and break the force of them; some sly excuse, some subtle evasion, or their deceitful hearts furnish them with, for the strengthening of their hands in their wickedness; and, in the crookedness of that labyrinth, they secure themselves from the arrests of God's word and their own consciences; for they are froward in their paths, they are resolved to go on in them, whatever is said against it. Every wise man will shun the company of such as these.

(2.) From women of corrupt practices. The former lead to spiritual wickedness, the lusts of the flesh, the unspiritual and unrefined mind; these lead to frowardly lusts, which defile the body, and live in the senses, and against the soul. The adulteress is here called the strange woman, because no man that has any wisdom or goodness in him, will have any acquaintance with her; she is to be shunned by every Israelite, as if she were a heathen, and a stranger to that sacred commonwealth. A strange woman indeed! utterly estranged from all principles of reason, virtue, and honour.

It is a great mercy to be delivered from the allurements of the adulteress, considering,

[1.] How false she is. Who will have any dealings with those that are made up of treachery? She is a strange woman; for, First, She is false to him whom she entices; she speaks fair, tells him how much she admires him above any man, and what a kindness she has for him; but she flatters with her words, she has no true affection for him; nor any desire of his welfare, any more than Dili to the kind of a by-street bawd; all her arguments are to pocket, and gratify a base lust of her own. Secondly, She is false to her husband, and violates the sacred obligation she lies under to him; she was the guide of her youth, by marrying him she chose him to be so, and submitted herself to his conduct, with a promise to attend him only, and forsake all others; but she has forsaken him, and therefore it cannot be thought that she should be faithful to any one else; and whoever entertains her is a weaker with her in her falsehood. Thirdly, She is false to God himself; she forgets the covenant of her God, the marriage covenant, (v. 17.) to which God is not only a witness, but a party, for he having instituted the ordinance, both sides vow to be true to each other. It is not her husband only that she sins against, but her God, who therefore will judge wholemongers and adulterers, because they despise the oath, and break the covenant, Ezekiel x. 18. 19.

[2.] How fatal it will prove to those that fall in league with her, v. 18. 19. Let the sufferings of others be our warnings; take heed of the sin of whoredom; for, First, The ruin of those who are guilty of it is certain and unavoidable, if they do not repent. It is a sin that has a direct tendency to the killing of the soul, the extinguishing of all good affections and dispositions in it, and exposing of it to the wrath and curse of God, and the sword of his justice. Those that live in forbidden pleasures are dead while they live. Let discretion preserve every man, not only from the evil woman, but from the evil house, for the house incites to death, it is in the road that leads directly to eternal death; and her paths unto Rephaim, to the giants, so some read it, the sinners of the old world, who, living in luxury and excess of riot, were cut down out of time, and their foundation overthrown with a flood; and the word there is, a flood of sin, and such is the certainty of its overthrow, with the consideration of everlasting torments which follow them, where the worm dies not, nor is the fire quenched. See Math. v. 28. 29. Secondly, Their repentance and recovery are extremely hazardous; none, or next to none that go unto her, return again. It is very rare that any who are caught in this snare of the devil recover themselves, so much is the heart hardened, and the mind blinded, by the deceitfulness of this sin. Having once lost their hold of the paths of life, they know not how to take hold of them again, but are perfectly besotted and bewitched with those base lusts. Many learned interpreters think that this caution against the strange woman, beside the literal sense, is to be understood figuratively, as a caution, 1. Against idolatry, which is spiritual whoredom. Wisdom will keep thee from all familiarity with the worshippers of images, and all inclination to join with them, which had for many ages been of such pernicious consequence to Israel, and proved so to Solomon himself. 2. Against the debauching of the intellectual powers and faculties of the soul, by the lusts and appetites of the body. Wisdom will keep thee from being captivated by the carnal mind, and from subjecting the spirit to the dominion of the flesh, that notorious adultery which forsakes its guide, violates the covenant of our God, which inclines to death, and which when it has got an undisputed dominion, makes the case of the soul desperate.

II. This wisdom will be of use to guide and direct us in that which is good; (v. 20.) That thou mayest walk in the way of good men. We must therefore avoid the way of the evil man, and the strange woman, that we may walk in good ways; we must therefore cease to do evil, that we may learn to do well. Note. 1. There is a way which is peculiarly the way of good men, the way in which good men, as such, and as far as they have really been such, have always walked. 2. It will be our wisdom to walk in that way, to ask for the good old way, and walk therein, Jer. vi. 16. Heb. vi. 12.—xii. 1. And we must not only walk in that way awhile, but we must keep it, keep in it, and never turn aside out of it: The paths of the righteous are the paths of life, and we, all alike, having taken hold of that, will keep their hold of; "That thou mayest imitate those excellent persons, the patriarchs and prophets, (so Bishop Patrick paraphrases it,) and be preserved in the paths of those righteous men who followed after them."

We must not only choose our way in general, by the good examples of the saints, but must also take directions from them in the choice of our particular paths, and never be behind the track, and go forth by the footsteps of the flock.

Two reasons are here given why we should thus choose.

(1.) Because men's integrity will be their establishment, v. 21. It will be the establishment, [1.] Of their persons; The upright shall dwell in the land, peaceably and quietly, as long as they live: and their uprightness will contribute to it, as it settles their minds, guides their counsels, gains them the good-will of their neighbours, and entitles them to God's special favour. [2.] Of their families; The perfect, in their posterity, shall remain in it. They shall dwell and remain for ever in the heavenly Canaan, of which the earthly one was but a type.

(2.) Because men's iniquity will be their destruction, v. 22. See what comes of the wicked, who choose the way of the evil man; they shall be cut off; not only from heaven hereafter, and all hopes of that, but from the earth now, on which they set their affections, and in which they lay up their treasure. They think to take root in it, but they and their families shall be rooted out of it, in judgment to them, but in mercy to the earth. There is a day coming, which shall leave them neither root nor branch, Mal. iv. 1. Let that wisdom then enter into our hearts, and be pleasant to our souls, which will keep us out of a way that will end thus.

CHAP. III.

This chapter is one of the most excellent in all this book; both for argument to persuade us to be religious, and for direction therein. I. We must be constant to our duty, because that is the way to be happy, v. 1-4. II. We must live a life of dependence upon God, because that is the way to be safe, v. 5. III. We must keep up the fear of God, because that is the way to be healthful, v. 7, 8. IV. We must lay up wealth with God, because that is the way to be rich, v. 9, 10. V. We must bear afflictions well, because that is the way to get good by them, v. 11, 12. VI. We must take pains to obtain wisdom, because that is the way to be lovely, and to gain by her, v. 13-20. VII. We must always govern ourselves by the rules of wisdom, of right reason and religion, because that is the way to be always easy, v. 21, 28. VIII. We must do all we can and be kind to our neighbours, because, according a man and a woman is just, charitable or uncharitable, humble or haughty, accordingly they shall receive of God, v. 27…35. From all which it appears what a tendency religion has to make men both blessed and blessings.

1. My son, forget not my law; but let thy heart keep my commandments:
2. For length of days, and long life, and peace, shall they add to thee.
3. Let not mercy and truth forsake thee; bind them about thy neck; write them upon the table of thy heart.
4. So shalt thou find favour and good understanding in the sight of God and man.
5. Trust in the Lord with all thy heart; and lean not unto thine own understanding.
6. In all thy ways acknowledge him, and he shall direct thy paths.

We are here taught to live a life of communion with God; and without controversy great is this mystery of godliness, and of great consequence to us, and as here showed, will be of unspeakable advantage.

I. We must have a continual regard to God's precepts, v. 1, 2.

We must, 1. Fix God's law, and his commandments, as our rule, by which we will in every thing be ruled, and to which we will yield obedience. 2. We must acquaint ourselves with them; for we cannot be said to forget that which we never knew.

3. We must remember them so that they may be ready to use when we have occasion to use them.

4. Our wills and affections must be subject to them, and must in every thing conform to them. Not only our heads, but our hearts, must keep God's commandments; in them, as in the ark of the testimony, both the tables of the law must be deposited.

To encourage us to submit ourselves to all the restraints and injunctions of the divine law, we are assured, v. 2. that it is the certain way to long life and prosperity. (1.) It is the way to be long-lived.

God's commandments shall add to us length of days; to a good useful life on earth, they shall add an eternal life in heaven, length of days for ever and ever, Ps. xxi. 4. God shall be our Life, and the Length of our days, and that will be indeed long life, with an addition. But, because length of days may possibly become a burthen and a trouble, it is promised, (2.) That it shall prove the way to be easy too, so that even the days of old age shall not be evil days, but days in which thou shalt have reason to be sure; Peace shall they be continually adding to thee. As grace increases, peace shall; and of the increase of Christ's government and peace, in the heart as well as in the world, there shall be no end. Great and growing peace have they that love the law.

II. We must have a continual regard to God's promises, which go along with his precepts, and are to be received, and retained with them; (v. 3.) "Let not mercy and truth forsake thee; God's mercy in promising, and his truth in performing; do not forfeit those, but live up to them, and preserve thine interest in them; do not forget these, but live upon them, and take the comfort of them; bind them about thy neck, as the most graceful ornament."

It is the greatest honour we are capable of in this world, to have an interest in the mercy and truth of God. "Write them upon the table of thine heart, as dear to thee, thy portion, and most delightful entertainment; take a pleasure in applying them, and thinking them over." Or it may be meant of the mercy and truth which are our duty; piety and sincerity; charity toward men, fidelity toward God. Let these be fixed and commanding principles in thee.

To encourage us to do this, we are assured, (v. 4.) that God has prepared both himself and ourselves both to our Creator and fellow-creatures; So shalt thou find favour, and good understanding. 1. A good man seeks the favour of God, in the first place, is ambitious of the honour of being accepted of the Lord, and he shall find that favour, and with it a good understanding; God will make the best of him, and put a favourable construction upon what he says and does. He shall be owned as one of Wisdom's children, and shall have praise with God, as one having that good understanding which is ascribed to all them that do his commandments. 2. He wishes to have favour with men also, (as Christ had, Luke ii. 52.) to be accepted of the multitude of his brethren; (Esth. x. 3.) and that he shall have, they shall understand him aright, and in his dealings with them he shall appear to be prudent, shall act intelligently and with discretion. He shall have good success, so some translate it; the common effect of good understanding.

III. We must have a continual regard to God's providence, must own and depend upon it in all our affairs, both by faith and prayer.

1. By faith. We must repose an entire confidence in the wisdom, power, and goodness, of God, assuring ourselves of the extent of his providence to all the creatures and all their actions. We must therefore trust in the Lord with all our hearts; (v. 5.) we must believe that he is able to do what he will, wise to do what is best, and good, according to his promise, to do what is best for us, if we love him and serve him. We must, with an entire submission and satisfaction, depend upon him to perform all things for us, and not lean to our own understanding; as if we could, by any forecast of our own, without God, help ourselves, and bring our affairs to a good issue. Those who know themselves to be the creatures of God's providence, have no need to be a broken reed, which, if they lean to, it will certainly fail them. In all our conduct, we must be diffident of our own judgment, and confident of God's wisdom, power, and goodness, and therefore must follow Providence, and not force it. That often proves best which was least our own doing.

2. By prayer; (v. 6.) In all thy ways acknowledge God. We must not only in our judgment believe that God is the Lord of our being, serving and disposing of us and all our affairs, but we must solemnly own it, and address ourselves to him accordingly. We must ask his leave, and not design any thing but what we are sure is lawful. We must ask his advice, and beg direction from him, not only when the case is difficult, (when we know not what to do, no thanks to us that we have our eyes up to him,) but in every case, be it ever so plain; many cases as those who know the race is not to the swift; we must refer ourselves to him, as one from whom our judgment proceeds, and patiently, and with a holy indifference, wait his award. In all our ways that prove direct, and fair, and pleasant, in which we gain our point to our satisfaction, we must acknowledge God with thankfulness. In all our ways that prove cross and uncomfortable, and that are hedged up with thorns, we must acknowledge God with submission. Our eye must be ever towards God, to him we must, in every thing, make our requests known, as Jeph-thah uttered all his words before the Lord in Mizpeh, Judg. xxi. 11.

For our encouragement to do this, it is promised, "He shall direct thy paths; so that thy way shall be safe and good, and the issue happy at last." Note, They that put themselves under a divine guidance, shall always have the benefit of it. God will give them that wisdom which is profitable to direct, so that they shall not turn aside into the by-paths of sin, and then will himself so wisely order the event, that they shall be to their mind, or (which is equiva-lent) for their good. They that faithfully follow the pillar of cloud and fire, shall find, that, though it may lead them about, it leads them the right way, and will bring them to Canaan at last.

7. Be not wise in thine own eyes: fear the Lord, and depart from evil. 8. It shall be health to thy navel, and marrow to thy bones. 9. Honour the Lord with thy substance, and with the first-fruits of all thine increase; 10. So shall thy barns be filled with plenty, and thy presses shall burst out with new wine. 11. My son, despise not the chastening of the Lord; neither be weary of his correction: 12. For whom the Lord loveth he correcteth, even as a father the son in whom he delighteth.

We have before us three exhortations, each of them enforced with a good reason.

1. We must live in a humble and dutiful subjection to God and his government; (v. 7.) "Fear the Lord, as your sovereign Lord and Master; be ruled in every thing by your religion, and subject to the divine will. This must be, 1. A humble subject; Be not wise in thine own eyes. Note, There is not a greater enemy to the power of religion, and the fear of God in the heart, than conceitedness of our own wisdom. They that have an opinion of their own sufficiency, think it below them, and a disparagement to them, to take their measures from, much more to hamper themselves with, religion's rules. 2. A dutiful subjection; I Fear the Lord, and depart from evil. Thus he that anything to offend him, and to forfeit his care. To fear the Lord, so as to depart from evil, is true wisdom and understanding; (Job xxviii. 28.) those that have it are truly wise, but self-denyingly so, and not wise in their own eyes.

For our encouragement thus to live in the fear of God, it is here promised (v. 8.) that it shall be as serviceable even to the outward man as our necessary food; it will be nourishing; it shall be health to thy navel; it will be strengthening, it shall be mar-row to thy bones. The prudence, temperance, and sobriety, the calmness and composure of mind, and the good government of the appetites and passions, which religion teaches, tend very much not only to the health of the soul, but to a good habit of body, which is very desirable, and without which our other enjoyments in this world are insipid. Envy is the sin of the martians, because it is the sorrow of the world dries them, but hope and joy in God are marrow to them.

II. We must make a good use of our estates, and that is the way to increase them, v. 9. 10. Here is, 1. A precept which makes it our duty to serve God with our estates; Honour the Lord with thy substance. It is the end of our creation and redemption to honour God, to be to him for a name and a praise; we are no other way capable of serving him than in his honour. His honour we must show forth, and the honour we have for him. We must honour him, not only with our bodies and spirits, which are his, but with our estates too, for they also are his; and we all our appurtenances must be devoted to his use. Worldly wealth hath its point, and will yet, such as it is, we must honour God with it, and then, if ever, it becomes substantial. We must ho-

cour God, (1.) With our increase. Where riches increase, we are tempted to honour ourselves, (Deut. viii. 17.) and to set our hearts upon the world; (Ps. lxxi. 10.) but the more God gives us, the more we should study to honour him. It is meant of the increase of the earth, for we live upon annual produce: and perhaps it also intends our children: and, by this, the doctrine is, (2.) With all our increase; as God has prospered us in every thing, we must honour him. Our law will allow a prescription for a modus decimandia—a modus of tithing, but none de non decimando—for being excluded from paying tithes. (3.) With the first-fruits of all, as Abel, Gen. iv. 4. This was the law, (Exod. xxviii. 19.) and the prophets, Mal. iii. 10. God, who is the first and best, must have the first and best of every thing; his right is prior to all others, he must have it first. Note, It is our duty to make our worldly estates serviceable to our religion; to use them, and the interest we have by them, for the promoting of religion; to do good to the poor with what we have, and abound in all works of piety and charity, devising liberal things.

2. A promise, which makes it our interest to serve God with our estates; it is the way to make a little more, and much more; it is the surest and safest method of thriving; So shall thy barns be filled with plenty. He does not say, thy bags, but, thy barns; not, thy wardrobe replenished, but, thy presses; God shall bless thee with an increase of that which is for use, not for show or ornament; for spending and laying out, not for hoarding and laying up. They that do good with what they have, shall have more to do more good with. Note, If we make our worldly estates serviceable to our religion, we shall find religion very serviceable to the prosperity of our worldly affairs. Godliness has the promise of the life that now is, and most of the comfort of it. We mistake, if we think that giving will undo us, and make us poor; no, giving for God's honour will make us rich, Hag. ii. 19. What we gave we have.

III. We must conduct ourselves aright under our afflictions, v. 11, 12. This the apostle quotes, (Heb. xii. 5.) and calls it an exhortation, which speaks unto us as unto children, with the authority and affection of a father. We are here in a world of troubles. Now observe,

1. What must be our care when we are in affliction; we must neither despise it, nor be weary of it. His exhortation before, was to those that are rich and in prosperity, here, to those that are poor and in adversity. (1.) We must not despise an affliction, be it ever so light and short, as if it were not worth our notice; or as if it were not sent on an errand, and therefore required no answer. We must not be stocks and stones, and Stoics, under our afflictions; insensible of them, hardening ourselves under them, and concluding we can easily get through them without God. (2.) We must not be weary of an affliction, be it ever so heavy and long, nor faint under it, so the apostle renders it; not be dispirited, dispossessed of our own souls, or driven to despair; but use any means to take comfort or relief, and the redress of our grievances. We must not think that the affliction either presses harder, or continues longer, than is meet; nor conclude that deliverance will never come, because it does not come so soon as we expect it.

2. What will be our comfort when we are in afflic-tion. (1.) That it is a divine correction; it is the chastening of the Lord; which, as it is a reason why we should submit to it, (for it is folly to contend with a God of incontestable sovereignty, and irresistible power;) so it is a reason why we should be satisfied in it; for we may be sure that a God of unspotted purity does us no wrong, and that a God of infinite goodness means us no hurt. It is from God, and therefore must not be despised; for a slight put upon the messenger, is an affront to him that sends him. It is from God, and therefore we must not be weary of it, for he knows our frame, both what we need, and what we can bear. (2.) That it is a fatherly correction; it comes not from his vindictive justice as a Judge, but out of that affection as a Father. The father corrects the son when he loves, nay, and because he loves him, and desires he may be wise and good. He delights in that in his son, which is amiable and agreeable, and therefore corrects him for the prevention and cure of that which would be a deformity to him, and an ally to his delight in him. Thus God hath said, do many as I love, I rebuke and chasten, Rev. iii. 19. This is a far more comfortable reflection under their afflictions. [1.] That they not only consist with, but flow from, covenant-love. [2.] That they are so far from doing them any real hurt, that, by the grace of God working with them, they do a great deal of good, and are happy means of their sanctification.

13. Happy is the man that findeth wisdom, and the man that getteth understanding: 14. For the merchandize of it is better than the merchandize of silver, and the gain thereof than fine gold. 15. She is more precious than rubies: and all the things thou canst desire are not to be compared to her. 16. Length of days is in her right hand; and in her left hand riches and honour. 17. Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace. 18. She is a tree of life to them that lay hold upon her; and happy is every one that retaineth her. 19. The Lord by wisdom hath founded the earth; by understanding hath he established the heavens. 20. By his knowledge the depths are broken up, and the clouds drop down the dew.

Solomon had pressed us earnestly to seek diligently for wisdom, (ch. ii. 1, &c.) and had assured us that we should succeed in our sincere and constant pursuits. But the question is, What shall we get by it when we have found it? Prospect of advantage is the spring and spur of industry; he therefore shows us how much it will be to our profit, laying this down for an unquestionable truth, Happy is the man that findeth wisdom, and the man which consists in the knowledge and love of God, and an entire conformity to all the intentions of his truths, providences, and laws. Now observe,

I. What it is to find wisdom, so as to make happy by it.

1. We must get it; he is the happy man, who, having found it, makes it his own, gets both an interest in it, and the possession of it; who draws out understanding; so the word is; (1.) Who derives it from God; having it not in himself, he draws it with the bucket of prayer from the Fountain of all wisdom, who gives liberally. (2.) Who takes pains for it, as he does who draws ore out of the mine; if it does not come easily, we must put the more strength to draw it. (3.) Who improves in it; who having some understanding, draws it out by growing and wise age, and multiplying it, leas only.

(4.) Who does good with it; who draws out from the stock he has, as wine from the vessel, and communicates to others, for their instruction, things new and old. That is well got, and to good purpose, that is thus used to good purpose.

2. We must trade it. We read here of the merchandise of wisdom; which intimates, (1.) That we must make it our business, and not a by-business; as the merchant must be the gain of his trade, and time upon his merchandise. (2.) That we must venture all in it, as a stock in trade, and be willing to part with all for it. This is that pearl of great price, which, when we have found it, we must willingly sell all for the purchase of. Matth. xiii. 45, 46. Buy the truth; (Prov. xxi. 23.) he does not say at what rate, because we must buy it at any rate, rather than miss it.

3. We must lay hold on it, as we lay hold on a good bargain when it is offered us, which we do the more carefully, if there be danger of having it taken out of our hands. We must apprehend with all our might, and put forth our utmost vigour in the pursuit of it; lay hold on all occasions to improve in it, and catch at the least of its dictates.

4. We must retain it; it is not enough to lay hold on wisdom, but we must keep our hold, hold it fast, with a resolution never to let it go, but to persevere in the ways of wisdom to the end. We must susta in it, so we read it; must embrace it with all our might, as we do that which we would sustain. We must do all we can to support the declining interests of religion in the places where we live.

II. What the happiness of those is who do find it.

1. It is a transcendent happiness, more than can be found in the wealth of this world, if we had ever so much of it, v. 14, 15. It is not only a surer, but a more gainful, merchandise to trade for wisdom, for Christ, and grace, and spiritual blessings, than for silver and gold, and rubies; suppose a man to have got these in abundance, may, to have all the things he can desire of this world; and who is it that ever had that? (1.) All this would not purchase heavenly wisdom; no, it would utterly be contemned; it cannot be gotten for gold, Job xxviii. 15, &c. (2.) All this would not counterweigh the want of heavenly wisdom, nor be the ransom of a soul lost by its own folly. (3.) All this would not make a man half so happy, no, not half as much as he would without it; when he who have true wisdom, though they have none of all these things. (4.) Heavenly wisdom will procure that for us, and secure that to us, which silver, and gold, and rubies, will not be the purchase of.

2. It is the true happiness; for it is inclusive of, and equivalent to, all those things which are supposed to make men happy, v. 16, 17. Wisdom is here represented as a bright and refreshing crown, resplendent over her faithful and loving subjects, and offering them to all that will submit to her government.

(1.) Is length of days a blessing? Yes, the most valuable; life includes all good, and therefore she offers that in her right hand. Religion puts us into the best methods of prolonging life, entitles us to the promises of it, and though our days on earth should be no more than our neighbour's, yet it will secure to us a better life in the other world.

(2.) Are riches and honour accounted blessings? They are so, and them she reaches out with her left hand. For as she is ready to embrace those that submit to her with both arms, so she is ready to give out to them with both hands. They shall have the wealth of this world, as far as Infinite Wisdom sees good for them; the true riches, however, by which men are rich toward God, are secured to them; nor is there any honour, by birth or purchase, comparable to that which attends religion; it makes the righteousness of the true faithful an advantage to their neighbour, recommends men to God, commands respect and veneration with all the sober part of mankind, and will in the other world make those that are now buried in obscurity to shine forth as the sun.

(3.) Is pleasure courted as much as any thing? It is so, and it is certain that true piety has in it the greatest true pleasure. Her ways are ways of pleasure, in which she has directed us to walk, are such as we shall find abundance of delight and satisfaction in. All the enjoyments and entertainments of sense are not comparable to the pleasure which gracious souls have in communion with God and doing good. That which is the only right way to bring us to our journey's end, we must walk in, fair or foul, pleasant or unpleasant; but the way of religion, as it is the right way, so it is a pleasant way, it is smooth and clean, and strewed with roses. All her ways are fair paths. There is not only peace in the end, but peace in the way; not only in the way of religion in general, but in the particular paths of that way, in all her paths, all the several acts, instances, and duties, of it. One does not im better what the other sweetness, as it is with the allays of this world; but they are all peace, not only sweet, but safe; the saints enter into peace on this side heaven, and enjoy a present sabbatism.

3. It is the happiness of paradise; (v. 16.) She is a tree of life. True grace is that to the soul which the tree of life would have been, from which our first parents were shut out for eating of the forbidden tree; it is a seed of immortality, a well of living water springing up to life eternal. It is an earnest of the New Jerusalem, in the midst of which is the tree of life, Rev. xxii. 1—4. They that feed and feast on this heavenly wisdom, shall not only be cured by it of every fatal malady, but shall find an antidote against age and death; they shall eat and live for ever.

4. It is a participation of the happiness of God himself, for wisdom is his everlasting glory and blessedness, v. 19, 20. This should make us in love with the wisdom and understanding which God gives, that the Lord by wisdom founded the earth, so that it cannot be removed, nor can ever fail of answering all the ends of its creation, to which it is admirably and exceptionally fitted; by understanding he has likewise established the heavens, and directed all the motions of them in the best manner. The heavenly bodies are vast, yet there is no flaw in them; numerous, yet no disorder in them; the motion rapid, yet no wear or tear; the depths of the sea are broken up, and thence come the waters beneath the firmament, and the clouds drop down the dew, the waters from above the firmament; and all this by the divine wisdom and understanding, without which there would be no wisdom; for he will thereby be thoroughly furnished for every good word and work. Christ is that Wisdom by whom the worlds were made, and still consists, happy therefore are they to whom he is made of God Wisdom, for he has wherewithal to make good all the foregoing promises of long life, riches, and honour; for all the wealth of heaven, earth, and seas, are his.

21. My son, let not them depart from thine eyes: keep sound wisdom and discretion. 22. So shall they be life unto thy soul, and grace to thy neck. 23. Then shalt thou walk in thy way safely, and thy foot shall not stumble. 24. When thou lies down, thou shalt not be afraid; yea, thou shalt lie down, and thy sleep shall be sweet. 25. Be not afraid of sudden fear, neither of the desolation of the wicked, when it cometh. 26. For the Lord shall be thy confidence, and shall keep thy foot from being taken.

Solomon having pronounced them happy, who not only lay hold on wisdom, but retain her, here exhorts us therefore to retain her, assuring us that we ourselves shall have the comfort of doing so.

I. The exhortation is, to have religion's rules always in view, and always at heart, v. 21. 1. To have them always in view; "My son, let them not depart from thine eyes; let not thine eyes ever depart from them to wander after vanity. Have them always in mind, and do not forget them; be ever and anon thinking of them, and conversing with them, and never imagine that thou hast looked upon them long enough, and that it is time now to lay them by; but, as long as thou livest, keep up, and cultivate, thine acquaintance with them. He who learns to write, must always have his eye upon his copy, and not let that be out of his sight; and to the words of wisdom must they, in like manner, have a constant respect, who will walk circumspectly. 2. To have them always at heart; for it is in that treasury, the hidden man of the heart, that we must keep sound wisdom and discretion, keep to the principles of it, and keep in the ways of it. It is wealth that is worth keeping.

II. The argument to enforce this exhortation, is taken from the unspeakable advantage which wisdom, thus kept, will be of to us. 1. In respect of strength and satisfaction; "It will be life to thy soul; (v. 22.) it will quicken thee to thy duty, when thou beginnest to be slack and remiss, it will revive thee under thy troubles, when thou beginnest to droop and despond. It will be thy spiritual life, an earnest of life eternal." Life to the soul is life indeed. 2. In respect of honour and reputation; It shall be grace to thy neck, as a chain of gold, or a jewel. Grace to thy jaws, so the word is; gracious to thy taste and relish, so some; it shall influence grace unto all thou sayest, so others; shall establish thee with acceptable words, which shall gain thee credit. 3. In respect of safety and security; this he insists upon in four verses, the scope of which is to show that the effect of righteousness, (which is the same with wisdom here) is quietness and assurance for ever, Isa. xxxii. 17. Good people are taken under God's special protection, and therein they may have an entire satisfaction. They are safe, and the danger is past.

1. In their motions by day, v. 23. "If our religion be our companion, it will be our convoy; Then shalt thou walk in thy way safely; the natural life, and all that belongs to it, shall be under the protection of God's providence; the spiritual life, and all its interests, under the protection of his grace, so that thou shalt be kept from falling into sin or trouble. Wisdom will direct us into, and keep us in, the safe way; the fear of the Lord will enable us to walk in it with a holy security; the way of duty is the way of safety. "We are in danger of falling, but wisdom will keep thee, that thy foot shall not stumble at those things which are an offence and overthrow to many, but which thou shalt know how to get over."

2. In their rest by night, v. 24. In our retirements, we lie exposed, and are most subject to frights; "But keep up communion with God, and keep a good conscience, and then, when thou liest down, thou shalt not be afraid of fire, or thieves, or spectres, or any of the terrors of darkness, knowing that where God is, and all our friends are asleep, yet He that keeps Israel and every man born for like, neither slumbers nor sleeps; and to him thou hast committed thyself, and taken shelter under the shadow of his wings. Thou shalt lie down, and not need to sit up to keep guard; having lain down, thou shalt sleep, and not have thine eyes held waking by care and fear; and thy sleep shall be sweet and refreshing to thee, being not disturbed by any alarms from without or from within." Ps. iv. 8.—xxvi. 7. The way to have a good night, is, to keep a good conscience; and the sleep, as of the labouring man, so of the wise and godly man, is sweet.

(3.) In their greatest straits and dangers. Integrity and uprightness will preserve us, so that we need not be afraid of sudden fear, v. 25. The harms that surprise us unthought of, giving us no time to arm ourselves by consideration, are most likely to put us into confusion. But let not the wise and good man forget himself, and then he will not give way to any fear that has torment, be the alarm ever so sudden. Let him not fear the desolation of the wicked, when it comes; [1.] The desolation which the wicked ones make of religion and the religious; though it comes, and seems to be just at the door, yet be not afraid of it; for though God may make use of the wicked as instruments of his people's correction, yet he will never suffer them to be the authors of their desolation. Or rather, [2.] The desolation which wicked men will be brought into in a moment. It will come, and timorous saints may be apprehensive that they shall be involved in it; but let this be their comfort, that though judgments last generally, at least promiscuously, yet God knows who is his, and how to separate between the precious and the vile. Therefore be not afraid of that which appears most formidable, for (v. 26.) "The Lord shall be not only the Shelterer to keep thee safe, but thy Confidence to keep thee secure, so that thy foot shall not be taken by thine enemies, nor insnared by thine own fears." God has engaged to keep the feet of his saints.

27. Withhold not good from them to whom it is due, when it is in the power of thine hand to do it. 28. Say not unto thy neighbour, Go, and come again, and tomorrow I will give; when thou hast it by thee. 29. Deceive not against thy neighbour, seeing he dwelleth securely by thee. 30. Strive not with a man without cause, if he have done thee no harm. 31. Envy not thou the oppressor, and choose none of his ways. 32. For the froward is abomination to the Lord: but his secret is with the righteous. 33. The curse of the Lord is in the house of the wicked: but he blesseth the habitation of the just. 34. Surely he scorneth the scorners: but he giveth grace unto the lowly. 35. The wise shall inherit glory; but shame shall be the promotion of fools.

True wisdom consists in the due discharge of our duty toward man, as well as toward God, in honesty as well as piety, and therefore we have here divers excellent precepts of wisdom, which relate to our neighbour.

1. We must render to all their due, both in justice and charity, and not delay to do it; (v. 27, 28.)
"Withhold not good from them to whom it is due; (either for want of love to them, or through too much love to thy money,) when it is in the power of thine hand to do it, for if it be not, it cannot be expected; but it was thy own admission, if thou dost by all thy presumptiveness, desirest thyself to do justly and show mercy, and it ought to be the greatest of thy griefs, if God had disabled thee; not so much that thou art straitened in thy own comforts and conveniences, as that thou hast not wherewithal to give to those to whom it is due." Withhold it not; this implies that it is called for and expected, but that the hand is drawn in, and the bowls of compassion are shut up. We must not hinder others from doing good to them, or not for the best reasons. Withhold it not by thee to-day, hast it in the power of thine hand, say not to thy neighbour, Go thy way for this time, and come at a more convenient season, and I will then see what will be done; to-morrow I will give; whereas thou art not sure that thou shalt live till to-morrow, or that to-morrow thou shalt have it by thee; be not thus loath to part with thy money upon a good account; make not excuses to shift off a duty that must be done; nor deliver not thyself bound in and in suspense, or to show the authority which the giver has over the beggar; but readily and cheerfully, and from a principle of conscience toward God, give good to those to whom it is due; to the lords and owners of it, so the word is, to those who, upon any account, are entitled to it. This requires us, 1. To pay our just debts, without fraud, covet, or delay. 2. To give wages to those that have earned it. 3. To provide for our relations, and those that have dependence on us, for to them it is due. 4. To render dues both to church and state, magistrates and ministers. 5. To be ready to all acts of friendship and humanity, and in every thing to be neighbourly; for these are things that are due by the law of doing as we would be done by. 6. To be charitable to the poor and necessitous; if others want the necessary supports of life, and we have wherewithal to supply them, we must look upon it as due to them, and not withhold it; alms are called righteousness, because they are a debt to the poor; and a debt which we must not defer to pay; Bis dat, qui cito dat—He gives twice, who gives speedily.

II. We must never design any hurt or harm to any body; (v. 29.) "Deceit not evil against thy neighbour; do not contrive how to do him an ill turn undiscovered, to prejudice him in his body, goods, or good name; and the rather, because he dwelleth securely by thee, and, having given thee no provocation, entertains no jealousy or suspicion of thee, and therefore is off his guard." It is against the laws both of honour and friendship to do a man an ill turn, and give him no warning; Cursed be he that smites his neighbour secretly. It is a most base, ungrateful thing, if our neighbours have a good opinion of us, that we will do them no harm, and we hence take advantage to cheat and injure them. We must not deuise evil to the harmless; (v. 30.) "Do not strive with a man without cause; contend not for that which thou hast no title to; resist not that as a provocation, which peradventure was but an oversight. Never trouble thy neighbour with frivolous complaints and accusations, or vexatious law-suits, when either there is no harm done thee, or none worth speaking of, or thou mightest right thyself in a friendly way;" law must be the last refuge; for it is not only our duty, but our interest, and it is one way, to live pleasantly with all men. When accounts are balanced, it will be found there is little left by striving.

IV. We must not envy the prosperity of evil doers, v. 31. This caution is the same with that which is so much insisted on, Ps. lxxxvii. "Envy not the offspring; though he be rich and great, though he live in ease and pleasure, and make all about him to stand in awe of him, yet do not think him a happy man, nor wish thyself in his condition. Choose none of his ways, do not imitate him, nor take the pleasures that he sinneth as a reward;" for we think of doing as he does, though thou wert sure to get by it all that he has, for it would be dearly bought.

Now, to show what little reason saith to envy sinners, Solomon here, in the four last verses of the chapter, compares the condition of sinners and saints together, (as his father David had done, Ps. xxxvii.) sets the one over against the other, that we may see how happy the saints are, though they may fall short of the perfect and the wretched are, though they be offspring. Men are to be judged of as they stand with God, and as he judges of them, not as they stand in the world's books; those are in the right who are of God's mind; and, if we be of his mind, we shall see, whatever pretence one sinner may have to envie another, saints are so happy themselves, that they have no reason at all to envy any sinner, though his condition be ever so prosperous. But, 1. Sinners are hated of God, but saints are loved, v. 32. The froward sinners, who are continually going from-ward him, whose lives are a perverse contradiction to his will, they are abomination to the Lord; He, that hates nothing that he has made, abhors those who have thus marred themselves; they are not only abominable in his sight, but an abomination; the righteous therefore have no reason to envy them, for they have his secret with them; they are his favourites, he has that communion with them which is a secret to the world, and in which they have a joy that a stranger does not intermeddle with; he communicates to them the secret tokens of his love; his covenant is with them; they know his mind, and the meanings and intensions of his providence, better than others can. Shall I hide from Abraham the thing that I do? 2. Sinners are under the curse of God, they and their houses; saints are under his blessing, they and their habitation, v. 33. The wicked has a house, a strong and stately dwelling perhaps, but the curse of the Lord is upon it, it is in it, and though the affairs of the family may prosper, yet the very blessings are cursed, Mal. ii. 2. There is leanness in the soul, when the body is fed to the full, Ps. civ. 15. The curse may work silently and slowly; but it is as a fretting leprosy, it will consume the timber thereof, and the stones thereof; Zech. v. 4. Hab. ii. 11. The just have a habitation, a poor cottage, (the word used for sheep-cotes,) a very mean dwelling; but God blesses it, he is continually blessing it, from the beginning of the year to the end of it. The curse or blessing of God is upon the house, according as the inhabitants are wicked or godly; and it is certain that a blessed family, though poor, has no reason to envy a cursed family, though rich. 3. God puts contempt upon sinners, but shows respect upon sinners. Two kinds of contempt are mentioned, (1.) Those who humble themselves shall certainly be abused; surely he scorns the scorners. Those who scorn to submit to the discipline of religion, scorn to take God's yoke upon them, scorn to be beholden to his grace, who scoff at godliness and godly people, and take a pleasure in bantering and exposing them, God will scorn them, and lay them open to scorn before all the world: he despises their impotent malice, sits in heaven and laughs at them. Ps. lxi. 4. He calumniates them to his face. (2.) Those who humble themselves shall be exalted, for he gives grace to the lowly; he works that in them which puts honour upon them, and for which they are accepted of God, and approved of men. Those who patiently bear contempt from scornful men shall have respect from God and all good men, and then they have no reason to envy the scorers, or to choose their ways.

4. The end of sinners will be everlasting shame, the end of saints endless honour, v. 35. (1.) Sifts are wise men, and act wisely for themselves; for though their religion now wraps them up in obscurity, and lays them open to reproach, yet they are sure to inherit glory at last, the far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory; they shall have it, and have it by inheritance, the sweetest and surest tenure; God gives them grace, (v. 34.) and therefore they shall inherit glory, for grace is glory, 2 Cor. iii. 18. (2.) Sifts are fools, for they are not only preparing disgrace for themselves, but at the same time flattering themselves with a prospect of honour, as if they took only the way to be great. Their end will manifest their folly; shame shall be their promotion. And it will be so much the more their punishment, as it will come instead of their promotion; it will be all the promotion they must ever expect, that God will be glorified in their everlasting confusion.

CHAP. IV.

When the things of God are to be taught, precept must be upon precept, and line upon line; not only because the things themselves are of great worth and weight, but because men's minds, at the best, are apt to admit them, and commonly prejudiced against them; and therefore Solomon, in this chapter, with a great variety of expression, and a pleasant powerful flood of divine eloquence, inculcates the same things that he had pressed upon us in the foregoing chapters. Here is, 1. An earnest exhortation to the study of wisdom, that is, of true religion and godliness, borrowed from the good instructions which his father gave him, and enforced with many considerable arguments, v. 1. 13. II. A necessary caution against bad company, and all fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, v. 14. 19. III. Particular directions for the attaining and preserving of wisdom, and bringing forth the fruits of it, v. 20. 27. So plainly, so pressingly, is the case laid before us, that we shall be far from inexusable if we perish in our folly.

1. Hear, ye children, the instruction of a father, and attend to know understanding. 2. For I give you good doctrine, forsake ye not my law. 3. For I was my father's son, tender and only beloved in the sight of my mother. 4. He taught me also, and said unto me, Let thine heart retain my words: keep my commandments, and live. 5. Get wisdom, get understanding; forget it not: neither decline from the words of my mouth. 6. Forsake her not, and she shall preserve thee: love her, and she shall keep thee. 7. Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom: and with all thy getting get understanding. 8. Exalt her, and she shall promote thee: she shall bring thee to honour, when thou dost embrace her. 9. She shall give to thine head an ornament of grace; a crown of glory shall she deliver to thee. 10. Hear, O my son, and receive my sayings; and the years of thy life shall be many. 11. I have taught thee in the way of wisdom; I have led thee in the right paths. 12. When thou goest, thy steps shall not be straitened: and when thou munnest, thou shalt not stumble.

Here we have,

1. The invitation which Solomon gives to his children to come and receive instruction from him; (v. 1.) I. "Let my own children, in the first place, receive and give good heed to those instructions which I set down for the use of others also." Note, Magistrates and ministers, who are intrusted with the conduct of larger societies, are concerned to take a more than ordinary care for the good instruction of their own families; from this duty their public workmen are not free. This charity must begin at home, though it must not end there; for he that has not his children in subjection with all gravity, and does not take pains in their good education, how shall he do his duty as he ought to the church of God? 1 Tim. iii. 4, 5. The children of those that are eminent for wisdom and public usefulness, ought to improve in knowledge and grace, in proportion to the advantages they derive from their relation to such parents. Yet it may be observed, to save both the credit and the comfort of those parents whose children do not answer the hopes that arose from their education, that Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, was far from being either one of the wisest, or one of the best; we have reason to think that thousands have got more good by Solomon's proverbs than his own son did, to whom they seem to have been dedicated. 2. Let all young persons, in the days of their childhood and youth, take pains to get knowledge and grace, for that is their learning age, and then their minds are formed and seasoned. He does not say, My children, but, Ye children; we read of but one son that Solomon had of his own. He is willing to set up for a school-master, and to teach other people's children; for, at that age, there is most hope of success; the branch is easily bended when it is young and tender. 3. Let all that would receive instruction come with the disposition of children, though they be grown persons; let all prejudices be laid aside, and the mind be as white paper; let them be dutiful, tractable, and self-diffident, and take the words as the word of a father, which comes both with authority and affection. We must see it coming from God as our Father in heaven, to whom we pray, from whom we expect blessings, the Father of our spirits, to whom we ought to be in subjection, that we may live. We must look up upon our teachers as our fathers, who love us, and seek our welfare; and therefore, though the instruction carry it in reproof and correction, for so the word signifies, yet we must bid it welcome.

Now, (1.) To recommend it to us, we are told, not only that it is the instruction of a father, but that it is understanding, and therefore should be welcome to intelligent creatures. Religion has reason on its side, and we are taught to take it by fair means. It is a law indeed, (v. 2.) but that law is founded upon doctrine, upon unquestionable principles of truth, upon good doctrine, which is not only faithful, but worthy of all acceptance. If we admit the doctrine, we cannot but submit to the law.

(2.) To rivet it in us, we are directed to receive it as a gift, to attend to it with all diligence, to attend so as to know it, for otherwise we cannot do it, we cannot do it, by disowning the doctrine, or disobeying the law.

II. The instructions he gives them. Observe, 1. How he came by these instructions; he had them from his parents, and teaches his children the same that they taught him, v. 3. 4. Observe, (1.) His parents loved him, and therefore taught him; I was my father's son. David had many sons, but Solomon was his son, indeed, as Isaac is called, (Gen. xvii. 19.) and for the same reason, because on him the covenant was entailed. He was his father's darling above any of his children. God had a special kindness for Solomon, (the prophet called him Jedidiah, because the Lord loved him, 2 Sam. xii. 25.) and, for that reason, David had a special kindness for him, for he was a man after God's own heart. If parents may ever love one child better than others, they may not be tickled in the least by any signs that God does so. He was tender, and only beloved, in the sight of his mother: surely there was a manifest reason for making such a distinction, when both the parents made it. Now we see how they showed their love; they cated him, kept him to his book, and held him to a strict discipline. Though he was a prince, and heir-apparent to the crown, yet they did not let him live at large; nay, therefore they tutored him. The strictest discipline was them at David's instance, though he was so attached to his Education, because he had seen the ill effects of an undue indulgence in Adonijah, whom he had not crossed in any thing, (1 Kings i. 6.) as also in Absalom. (2.) What his parents taught him he teaches others. Observe, [1.] When Solomon was grown up, he not only remembered, but took a pleasure in repeating, the good lessons his parents taught him when he was a child. He did not forget them, so deep were the impressions made by them on him. He had no occasion to be ashamed of them, such a high value had he for them, nor did he look upon them as the childish things, the mean things, which, when he became a man, a king, he should put away, as a disparagement to him; much less did he repeat them, as some wicked children have done, to ridicule them, and make his companions merry with them, priding himself that he was got clear from grave lessons and restraints. [2.] Though Solomon was a prince, and highly honored, yet, when he was to teach wisdom, he did not think it below him to quote his father, and to make use of his words. They that would learn well, and teach well, in religion, must not affect new-found notions and new-coined phrases, so as to look with contempt upon the knowledge and language of their predecessors; if we must keep to the good old way, why should we scorn the good old words? Jer. vi. 16. [3.] Solomon, having been well instructed in his parents' words, thought it his duty to oblige his children a good education, the same that his parents had given him; and this is one way in which we must require our parents for the pains they took with us, even by showing pity at home, 1 Tim. v. 4. They taught us, not only that we may learn ourselves, but that we might teach our children, the good knowledge of God, Ps. lxxviii. 6. And we are false to a trust if we do not, for the sacred deposit of religious doctrine and law was lodged in our hands, with a charge to transmit it pure and entire to those that shall come after us, 2 Tim. ii. 2. [4.] Solomon enforces his exhortations with the authority of his father David a man famous in his generation upon all accounts. Be it taken notice of, to the honour of religion, that the wisest and best men in every age have been most zealous, not only for the practice of it themselves, but for the propagating of it to others. They could converse in the things which we have learned, knowing of whom we have learned them, 2 Tim. iii. 14.

2. What those instructions were, v. 4-13. [1.] By way of precept and exhortation. David, in teaching his son, though he was a child of great capacity and quick apprehension, to show that he was in good earnest, and to affect his child the more with what he said, expressed himself with warmth and importunity, and inculcated the same thing again and again. So children must be taught; (Deut. vi. 7.) Thou shalt teach them diligently upon thy children. David, though he was a man of public business, and had tutors for his son, took all this pains with himself.

First, He recommends to him his Bible and his catechism, as the means, his father's word, (v. 4.) the words of his mouth, (v. 5.) his sayings, (v. 10.) all the good lessons he had taught him; and, perhaps, he means particularly the book of Psalms, many of which were instrucive, and two of them are expressly said to be for Solomon. These, and all his other words, Solomon must have an eye to. 1. He must hear and receive them, (v. 10.) diligently attend to them, and imbibe them, as the earth drinks in the rain that comes often upon it, Heb. vi. 7. God thus bespeaks our attention to his word, Hear, O my son, and receive my sayings. 2. He must hold fast the form of sound words which he had heard from his father, (v. 9.) that he may retain my words; and except the word be hid in the heart, lodged in the will and affections, it will not be retained. 3. He must govern himself by them; Keep my commandments, obey them, and that is the way to increase in the knowledge of them, John vii. 17. 4. He must stick to them, and abide by them; *Decline not from the words of my mouth, (v. 3.) as fearing they will be too great a check upon thee, but take fast hold of instruction, (v. 13.) as being desirable, all that is done and said, and let not his hand relax, and let not his heart be prevailed upon to depart from them. Those that have a good education, though they strive to shake it off, will find it hang about them a great while, and if it do not, its case is very sad.

Secondly, He recommends to him wisdom and understanding as the end to be aimed at in the use of these means; that wisdom which is the principal wisdom, get that: Quod cupiat est sapientiae eam accep- tumque, non solum sibi, sed omnibus, and be sure to mind that branch of wisdom which is the top branch of it, and that is the fear of God, ch. i. 7. Junius and Tremellius. A principal of religion in the heart, this is the one thing needful: therefor,

1. Get this wisdom, get this understanding, v. 5. And again, "Get wisdom, and with all thy getting get understanding, v. 7. Pray for it, take pains for it, give diligence in the use of all appointed means for it, 2 Tim. iv. 17. of all this gate, Prov. viii. 34. Get dominion over thy corruption, over thy f l i e s; get possession of wise principles, and the habits of wisdom: get it by experience, get it above all thy getting, be more in care, and take more pains, to get this, than to get the wealth of this world: whatever thou forgettest, get this; reckoning it a great achievement, and pursue it accordingly. True wisdom is God's gift, and yet we are here commanded to get it, because God gives it to those that labour for it; yet, after all, we must not say, Our might, and the power of our hand, have gotten us this wealth.

2. Forget her not, (v. 5.) forsake her not, (v. 6.) let her not go, (v. 13.) but keep her. Those that have got this wisdom must take heed of losing it again by returning to folly; it is indeed a good part that shall not be taken from us; but then we must take heed lest we throw it from us, as these do that forget it first, and then pursue it; it is nothing to us, and we shall forsake it, and turn out of its good ways. That good thing which is committed to us we must keep, and not let it drop, through carelessness, nor suffer it to be forced from us, nor suffer ourselves to be wheedled out of it; never let go such a jewel.

3. Love her, (v. 6.) and embrace her, (v. 8.) as worldly men love their wealth, and set their hearts upon it. Religion should be very dear to us, dearer than any thing in this world; and if we cannot reach to be great masters of wisdom, yet let us be true lovers of it; and what grace we have, let us embrace it with a sincere affection, as those that adore its beauty.

4. "Exalt her; (v. 8.) always keep up high thoughts of religion, speak of it with value and fervency, and do all thou canst to bring it into reputation, and maintain the credit of it among men; concur with God in his purpose, which is, to magnify the law and make it honorable, and do what thou canst to hinder the discouragement of children not only justify her, but magnify her, and prefer her before that which is dearest to them in this world. In honouring those that fear the Lord, though they are low in the world, and in regarding a poor wise man, we exalt wisdom.

First, It is the main matter, and that which ought to be the chief and continual care of every man in this life; (v. 7.) Wisdom is the principal thing; other things which we are solicitous to get, and keep, are nothing to it; it is the whole of man, Eccl. xii. 13. It is that which recommends us to God, which beautifies the soul, which enables us to answer the end of our creation, to live to some good purpose in the world, and to get to heaven at last; and the principal thing it is the principal thing.

Secondly, It has reward and equity on its side; (v. 11.) "I have taught thee in the way of wisdom, true wisdom, and it will be found to be at last; I have led thee, not in the crooked way of carnal policy, which does wrong, under colour of wisdom, but in right paths, agreeable to the eternal rules and reasons of good and evil." The rectitude of the divine nature appears in the rectitude of all the divine laws. Observe, David not only taught his son by good instructions, but led him both by a good example, and by applying general instructions to particular cases; so that nothing was wanting on his part to make him wise.

Thirdly, It would be much for his own advantage; "If thou be wise and good, thou shalt be so for thyself.

1. "It will be thy life, thy comfort, thy happiness; what thou canst not live without," Keep my commandments, and live, v. 4. That of our Saviour agrees with this, If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments, Matt. xix. 17. It is upon pain of death, eternal death, and in prospect of life, eternal life, that we are required to be religious; "Receive wisdom's sayings, and the years of thy life shall be many, (v. 10.) as many in this world as Infinite Wisdom sees fit, and in the other world thou shalt live that life, the years of which shall never be numbered. Keep her therefore, whatever it cost thee, for she is thy life, v. 13. All thy satisfaction will be found in this;" and a soul without true wisdom and grace is really a dead soul.

2. "It will be thy guard and guide, thy convey and conduct, through all the dangers and difficulties of thy journey through this wilderness. Love wisdom, and cleave to her, and she shall preserve thee, she shall keep thee (v. 6.) from sin, the worst of evils, the worst of enemies; she shall keep thee from hurting thyself, and then none else can hurt thee." As we say, "Keep thy shop, and thy shop will keep thee;" so "Keep thy wisdom, and thy wisdom will keep thee." It will keep us from straits and stumbling-blocks in the management of ourselves and our affairs, v. 12. (1.) That our steps be not straitened when we go, that we bring not ourselves into such straits as David was in, 2 Sam. xx. 14. They that make God's word their rule shall walk at liberty, and be at ease in themselves. (2.) That our feet do not stumble when we run. If wise and good men be put upon sudden resolves, the certain rule of God's word, which they go by, will keep them even then from stumbling upon any thing that may be pernicious. Integrity and uprightness will preserve us.

3. "It will be thy honour and reputation; (v. 8.) Exalt wisdom, do thou but shew thy good-will to her advancement, and, though she needs not thy service, she will abundantly recompense it, she shall promote thee, she shall bring thee to honour." Solomon was to be a king, but his wisdom and virtue would be more his honour than his crown or people; that was it for which all his neighbours had him so much in veneration; and, no doubt, in his reign, and David's, wise and good men stood fairest for preferment. However, religion will, first or last, bring all those to honour that sincerely embrace her; they shall be accepted of God, respected by all wise men, owned in the great day, and shall inherit everlasting glory. This he insists on, (v. 9.) "She shall give to thine head an ornament of grace, in this world, shall recommend thee both to God and man, and in the other world a crown of glory shall she deliver to thee; a crown that shall never totter, a crown of glory that shall never wither." That is the true honour which attends religion; Nobilitas sola est atque unica virtus—Virtue is the only nobility! David having thus recommended wisdom to his son, no marvel that, when God bid him ask what he would, he prayed, Lord, give me a wise and an understanding heart. We should make it appear by our prayers how well we were taught.

14. Enter not into the path of the wicked, and go not in the way of evil men. 15. Avoid it, pass not by it, turn from it, and pass away. 16. For they sleep not, except they have done mischief; and their sleep is taken away, unless they cause some to fall. 17. For they eat the bread of wickedness, and drink the wine of violence. 18. But the path of the just is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day. 19. The way of the wicked is as darkness; they know not what they stumble.

Some make David's instructions to Solomon, which began v. 4. to continue to the end of the chapter; nay, some continue them to the end of the ninth chapter; but it is more probable that Solomon begins here again, if not sooner. In these verses, having expressed us to walk in the paths of wisdom, he cautions us against the paths of the wicked. 1. We must take heed of the ways of sin, and avoid them; every thing that looks like sin, and leads to it. 2. In order to this, we must keep out of the ways of sinners, and have no fellowship with them. For fear of falling into wicked courses, we must shun wicked company. Here is,

1. The caution itself, v. 14, 15:

1. We must take heed of falling in with sin and sinners; Enter not into the paths of the wicked. Our teacher, having, like a faithful guide, showed us the right paths, (v. 11.) here warns us of the by-paths into which we are in danger of being drawn aside. Those that have been well educated, and trained up in the way they should go, let them never turn aside into the way they should not go; let them not so much as enter into it, no, not to make trial of it, lest it prove a dangerous experiment, and difficult to retreat with safety. "Venture not into the company of these that are infected with the plague, no, not though thou think thyself guarded with an antidote."
2. If at any time we are inveigled into an evil way, we must hasten out of it. "If, ere thou wast aware, thou didst enter in at the gate, because it was wide, yet go not on in the way of evil men. As soon as thou art made sensible of thy mistake, retire immediately, take not a step more, stay not a minute longer, in the way that certainly leads to destruction.

3. We must dread and denounce the ways of sin and sinners. "The way of evil men is as a pleasant way and sociable, and the nearest way to the compassing of some secular end we may have in view; but it is an evil way, and will end ill, and therefore, if thou love thy God and thy soul, avoid it, pass not by it, that thou mayest not be tempted to enter into it; and, if thou find thyself near it, turn from it, and pass away, and get as far off as thou canst." The manner of expression intimates the imminent danger we are in, the need we have of this caution, and the great importance of it; and that our watchmen are, or should be, in good earnest in giving us warning. It intimates likewise at what a distance we should keep from sin and sinners; he does not say, Keep at a due distance, but at a great distance, the further the better; never think you can get far enough from it; escape for thy life, look not behind thee.

II. The reasons to enforce this caution.

1. "Consider the character of the men whose way thou art warned to shun:" they are mischievous men, (v. 16, 17.) they not only care not what hurt they do to those that stand in their way, but it is their business to do mischief, and their delight, purely for mischief’s sake. They are continually designing and endeavouring to cause some to fall, to ruin them body and soul. Wildness and malice are in their nature, and violence in all their actions. They are spiteful in the highest degree for, (1.) Mischief is rest and sleep to them. As my soul was affection as a covetous man has when he has got money, an ambitious man when he has got preferment, and a good man when he has done good, so much have they when they have said or done that which is injurious and ill-natured; and extremely uneasy if they cannot get their envy and revenge gratified; as Haman, to whom every thing was unpleasant, as long as Mordecai was unaimed. It intimates, therefore, whatever the heart may be, either in their mischievous pursuits; they will rather want sleep than want the pleasure of being vexatious. (2.) Mischief is meat and drink to them, they feed and feast upon it; they eat the bread of wickedness, (they eat up my yeeple as they eat bread, Ps. xiv. 4.) and drink the wine of violence, drink iniquity like water, Job xvi. 16. All they eat and drink is get by rapine and oppression. Do wicked men think the time lost in which they are not doing hurt? Let good men make it as much their business and delight to do good; Amici, diem feridi—Friends, I have lost a day. And let all that are wise, and wish well to themselves, avoid the society of the wicked; for, [1.] It is very scandalous; for there is no disposition of mind that is a greater reproach to the human nature, a greater enemy to human society, a bolder defiance to God and conscience, that has more of the Devil in it, or is more serviceable to him, than to do mischief, and to do vex, and hurt, and ruin everybody. [2.] It is very dangerous. "Shun those that delight to do mischief, as thou tenderest thine own safety; for, whatever friendship they may pretend, one time or other they will do thee mischief; thou wilt ruin thyself if thou dost concur with them, (ch. i. 18.) and they will ruin thee if thou dost not."

2. "Consider the character of the way itself which thou art warned to shun, compared with the right way which thou art invited to walk in." (1.) The way of righteousness is light; (v. 18.) The path of the just, which they have chosen, and in which they walk, is as light; the light shines on their ways, (Job xxxi. 28.) and makes them both safe and pleasant. Christ is their Way, and he is the Light. They are guided by the word of God, and that is a light to their feet; they themselves are light in the Lord, and they walk in the light as he is in the light, (12.) and this light shines on their ways. They shine on themselves, in the joy and comfort of it; it shines before others in the lustre and honour of it; it shines before men, who see their good works, Matth. v. 16. They go on in their way with a holy security and serenity of mind, as those that walk in the light. It is as the morning-light, which shines out of obscurity, (Isa. lviii. 8, 10.) and puts an end to the works of darkness. [2.] It is a growing light; it shines more and more; not like the light of a menial candle, which soon disappears, or that of a candle, which burns dim, and burns down; but like that of the rising sun, which goes forward shining, mounts upward shining. Grace, the guide of this way, is growing; he that has clean hands shall be stronger and stronger; that joy which is the pleasure of this way, that honour which is the brightness of it, and all that happiness which is indeed its light, shall be still increasing. [3.] It will arrive, in the end, at the perfect day. The light of the day-spring will at length be noon-day light, and that is it which the enlightened soul is pressing toward. The saints will not be perfect till they come to heaven, but there they shall themselves shine as the sun when he goes forth in his strength, Matth. xiii. 43. Then their graces and joys shall be all consummate. Therefore it is our wisdom to keep close to the path of the just. (2.) The way of sin is as darkness, v. 19. The works he had cautioned ns not to have fellowship with, are, works of darkness. What true pleasure and satisfaction can they have who know no pleasure and satisfaction but what they have in doing mischief? What sure guide have they that cast God’s word behind them? The way of the wicked is dark, and therefore dangerous; for they stumble, and yet know not at what they stumble; they fall into sin, but are not aware which way the temptation came, by which they were overthrown, and therefore they fall; but in this light they are avoided, or they are led into trouble, but never inquire wherefore God contends with them; they consider not that they do evil, nor what will be in the end of it, Ps. lxixii. 5. Job xviii. 5, 6. This is the way we are bid to shun.

20. My son, attend to my words; incline thine ear unto my sayings: 21. Let them not depart from thine eyes; keep them in the midst of thy heart: 22. For they are life unto those that find them, and health to all their flesh. 23. Keep thy heart with all diligence; for out of it are the issues of life. 24. Put away from thee a froward mouth, and perverse lips put far from thee. 25. Let thine eyes look right on, and let thine eyelids look straight before thee. 26. Ponder the path of thy feet, and let all thy ways be established. 27. Turn not to the right hand nor to the left: remove thy foot from evil.

Solomon, having warned us not to do evil, here teaches us how to do well. It is not enough for us to shun the occasion of sin, but we must study the methods of duty
1. We must have a continual regard to the word of God, and endeavour that it may be always ready to us. The sayings of wisdom must be our principles by which we govern our ways, and our reason to warn us of duty and danger; and therefore, (1.) We must receive them readily; "Incline thine ear to them, (v. 20.) humbly bow to them, diligently listen to them." The attentive hearing of the word of God is a good sign of a work of grace begun in the heart, and a good means of carrying it on. It is to be hoped that those are resolved to do their duty who are inclined to know it. (2.) We must retain them faithfully; (v. 21.) we must lay them before us as a rule; "Let them not depart from thine eyes; view them, review them, and in every thing aim to conform to them." We must lodge them within us, as a commanding principle, the influences of which are diffused throughout the whole man; "Keep them in the midst of thine heart, as things dear to thee, and which thou art afraid of losing." Let the word of God be written in the heart, and that which is written there will remain.

The reason why we must thus make much of the words of wisdom, is, because they will be both food and physic to us, like the tree of life, Rev. xxvii. 2. Ezek. xlviii. 12. They that seek and find them, find and keep them, shall find in them, [1.] Food; For they are life unto those that find them, v. 22. As the spiritual life was begun by the word as the instrument of it, so by the same word it is still nourished and maintained. We could not live without it, we may by faith live upon it. [2.] Physic. They are health to all their flesh, to the whole man, both body and soul; they help to keep both in good plight. They are health to all flesh, so the Seventy. There is enough to cure all the diseases of this distempered world. They are a medicine to all their flesh, so the word is; to all their corruptions; for they are called flesh; to all their grievances, which are as thorns in the flesh. There is in the word of God a proper remedy for all our spiritual maladies.

2. We must keep a watchful eye, and a strict hand, upon all the motions of our inward man, v. 23. Here is, (1.) A great duty required by the laws of wisdom, and in order to our getting and preserving wisdom; Keep thy heart with all diligence. God, who gave us these souls, gave us a strict charge with them; Man, woman, keep thy heart; take heed to thy spirit, Deut. iv. 9. We must maintain them, jealous of ourselves, and set a strict guard, accordingly, upon all the avenues of the soul; keep our hearts from doing hurt, and getting hurt, from being defiled by sin, and disturbed by trouble; keep them as our jewel, as our vineyard; keep a conscience void of offence; keep out bad thoughts; keep up good thoughts; keep the affections upon right objects, and in due bounds. Keep with all keepings, so the word is; there are many ways of keeping one another, and God will help at any hand, and we must use them all in keeping our hearts; and all little enough, so deceitful are they, Jer. xvii. 9. Or, above all keepings; we must keep our hearts with more care and diligence than we keep any thing else. We must keep our eyes, (Job xxxi. 1.) keep our tongues, (Ps. xxxiv. 13.) keep our feet, (Eccl. v. 1.) but, above all, keep our hearts. (2.) A good reason given for this care; because any thing out of its place, and that which well kept will flow living issues, good products, to the glory of God, and the edification of others. Or, in general, all the actions of the life flow from the heart, and, therefore, keeping, that is making the tree good and healing the springs. Our lives will be regular or irregular, comfortable or uncomfortable, according as our hearts are kept or neglected.

3. We must set a watch before the door of our lips, that we offend not with our tongue; (v. 24.) Put away from thee a froward mouth, and perverse lips. Our hearts being naturally corrupt, out of them a great deal of corrupt communication is apt to come, and therefore we must conceive a great dread and detestation thereon, in other words, cursing, swearing, lying, sulking, brawling, filthiness, and foolish talking, all which come from a froward mouth, and perverse lips, that will not be governed either by reason or religion, but contradict both; and which are as unsightly and ill-favoured before God, as a crooked distorted mouth drawn awry is before men. All manner of tongue-sins we must, by constant watchfulness and steadfast resolution, shut from us, put far from us; abstaining from all words that have an appearance of evil, and fearing to learn any such words.

4. We must make a covenant with our eyes; "Let them look right on, and straight before thee, v. 25. Let the eye be fixed and not wandering, let it notrove after every thing that presents itself, for then it will be diverted from good, and insurmount in evil. Turn it from beholding vanity; let thine eye be single, and not divided; let thine intentions be sincere and uniform, and look not to the end." We must keep our eye upon our Master, and be careful to approve ourselves to him; keep our eye upon our rule, and conform to that; keep our eye upon our mark, the prize of the high calling, and direct all toward it. Oculum in metam—The eye upon the goal.

5. We must act considerately in all we do; (v. 26.) Ponder the path of thy feet; weigh it, so the word is. "Put the word of God in one scale, and what thou hast done, or art about to do, in the other, and see how they agree; be nice and critical in examining whether thy way be good before the Lord, and whether it will end well." We must consider our past ways, and examine what we have done, and our present ways, What are we doing? Whither are we going? See that ye walk circumspectly. It concerns us to consider, what are the duties, and what the difficulties, what are the advantages, and what the dangers, of our way, that we may act accordingly. "Do nothing rashly."

6. We must act with steadiness, caution, and consistency; "Let all thy ways be established, (v. 26.) and be not unstable in them, as the double-minded man is; halt not between two, but go on in an even uniform course of obedience; turn not to the right hand, nor to the left, for there are errors on both sides, and Satan gains his point, if he prevail to draw us aside either way. Be very careful to remove thy foot from evil; take heed of extremities, for in them there is evil, and let thine eyes look right on, that then mayest keep the golden mean." Those that would approve themselves wisewill always be watchful.

CHAP. V.

The scope of this chapter is much the same with that of ch. 3. To the wise man more is given, not to be grievous, for it is safe, Phil. iii. 1. Here is, 1. An exhortation to get acquaintance with, and submit to, the laws of wisdom in general, v. 1, 2. 1. A particular caution against the sin of whoredom, v. 3, 14. 11. Remedies prescribed against that sin, v. 15., v. 20. 2. A regard to God's omniscience, v. 21. 3. A dread of the miserable end of wicked people, v. 22, 23. And all little enough to arm young people against those fleshly lusts which war against the soul.

1. My son, attend unto my wisdom, and bow thine ear to my understanding;

2. That thou mayest regard discretion, and that thy lips may keep knowledge. 3. For the lips of a strange woman drop as a honeycomb, and her mouth is smoother than oil.
4. But her ene is bitter as wormwood, sharp as a two-edged sword. 5. Her feet go down to death, her steps take hold on hell. 6. Lest thou shouldst ponder the path of life, her ways are movable, that thou canst not know them. 7. Hear me now, therefore, O ye children, and depart not from the words of my mouth. 8. Remove thy way far from her, and come not nigh the door of her house; 9. Lest thou give thine honour unto others, and thy years unto the cruel: 10. Lest strangers be filled with thy wealth, and thy labours be in the house of a stranger; 11. And thou mourn at the last, when thy flesh and thy body are consumed. 12. And say, How have I hated instruction, and my heart despised reproof; 13. And have not obeyed the voice of my teachers, nor inclined mine ear to them that instructed me! 14. I was almost in all evil in the midst of the congregation and assembly.

Here we have,
1. A solemn preface to introduce the caution that follows, v. 1. 2. Solomon here addresses himself to his son, that is, to all young men, as unto his children, whom he has an affection for; and some influence upon. In God's name he demands attention; for he proceeds by divine inspiration, and is a prophet, though he begins not with, Thus saith the Lord. "Attend, and how thin ear; not only hear what is said, and read what is written, but apply thy mind to it, and consider it diligently." To gain attention, he urges, 1. The excellency of his discourse; "It is my wisdom, it is my understanding; if I undertake to teach thee wisdom, I cannot prescribe any thing to be more properly called so; moral philosophy is my philosophy, and that which is to be learned in my school." 2. The usefulness of it; "Attend to what I say," (1) "That thou mayest act wisely; that thou mayest regard discretion." Solomon's lectures are not designed to fill our heads with notions, with matters of nice speculation, or doubtful disputation, but to guide us in the government of ourselves, that we may act prudently, so as becomes us, and so as will be for our true interest. (2) "That thou mayest speak wisely; that thy lips may keep knowledge; and thou mayest have it upon thy tongue's end," (as we say,) "for the benefit of those with whom thou dost converse." The priest's lips are said to keep knowledge; (Mal. ii. 7.) but they that are ready and mighty in the scriptures, may, not only in their devotions, but in their discourses, be spiritual priests.

II. The caution itself, and that is, to abstain from fleshly lusts, from adultery, fornication, and all uncleanness. Some apply this figuratively, and by the adulteress woman here understand idolatry, false doctrine, which tend to debauch men's minds and manners; or, the sensual appetite, to which it may as fitly as any thing be applied; but the primary scope of it is plainly to warn us against seven-commandments-sins, which youth is so prone to, the temptations to which are so violent, the examples of which are so many, and which, where admitted, and allowed themselves to be indulged in, go to the soul, that it is not strange that Solomon's cautions against it are so very pressing, and so often repeated. Solomon here, as a faithful watchman, gives fair warning to all, as they tender their lives and comforts, to dread this sin, for it will certainly be their ruin. Two things we are here warned to take heed of;
1. That we do not listen to the charms of this sin. It is true, the lips of a strange woman drop as a honeycomb; (v. 3.) the pleasures of fleshly lust are tempting, (like the wine that gives its colour to the cup) and moves itself right; its mouth, the kisses of its mouth, the mouth, the words of its mouth, smoother than oil, that the poisonous pill may go down glily, and there may be no suspicion of harm in it.

But consider, (1.) How fatal the consequences will be; how bitter the fruit which the sinner will have of his honey and oil, when the end will be, [1.] The terrors of conscience; it is bitter as wormwood; (v. 1.) which was in the mouth, rises in the stomach, and turns sour there; it curdles the reflection, like a two-edged sword; take it which way you will, it wounds. Solomon could speak by experience, Eccl. vii. 26. [2.] The torments of hell. If some, that have been guilty of this sin, have repented and been saved, yet the direct tendency of the sin is to destruction of body and soul: the feet of it go down to death, may, they take hold on hell, to pull it to the sinner, as if the damnation slumbered, or were not, v. 5. Those that are entangled in this sin should be reminded, that there is but a step between them and hell, and that they are ready to drop into it.

(2.) Consider how false the charms are. The adulteress flatters and speaks fair, her words are honey and oil, but she will deceive these that hear ken to her; her ways are moveable, that thou canst not know them; she often changes her disguise, and puts on a great variety of false colours, because, if she be rightly known, she is certainly hated. Pretens like, she puts on many shapes, that she may keep in with those whom she has a design upon. And what does she aim at with all this art and management? Nothing but to keep them from pondering the path of life, for she knows, that, if they once come to do that, she will certainly lose them. Those are ignorant of Satan's devices who do not understand that the great thing he drives at, in all his temptations, is, [1.] To keep them from considering the path of life, to prevent them from being religious, and from going to heaven, that, being himself shut out from happiness, he may keep them out from it. [2.] In order hereunto, to keep them from pondering the path of life, from considering how reasonable it is that they should walk in that path, and how much it will be for their advantage. Be it observed, to the honour of religion, that it certainly gains its point with all those that will allow themselves the liberty of a serious thought, and will weigh things impartially in an even balance; and that the devil has no way of securing men in his interests, but by diverting them, with continual amusements of one kind or other, from the calm and sober consideration of the things that belong to their peace. And uncleanness is a sin that does, as much as any thing, blind the understanding, scar the conscience, and keep people from pondering the path of life. Whorem takes away the heart, Hos. iv. 11.

2. That we do not approach the borders of this sin, v. 7, 8. This caution is introduced with a solemn preface; "Hear me now therefore, O ye children, whoever you are that read or hear these lines, take notice of what I say, and mix faith with it, treasure it up, and depart not from the words of wisdom; for the words of the strange woman do not only cause the lips of the mouth to be like the words of the strange woman. Do not only receive what I say, for the present merely, but cleave to it, and let it be ready to thee, and of force with thee, when thou art most violently assaulted by the temptation." The caution itself is very pressing; "Re
They that are merry now, shooting thyselv in thine own deceivings, yet thou wilt certainly mourn at the last, v. 11. Thou art all this while making work for repentance, and laying up matter for vexation and torment in the reflection, when the sin is set before thee in its own colours." Sooner or later it will bring sorrow; either when the soul is humbled, and brought to repentance, or when the flesh and body are consumed; either by sickness, when conscience flies in the sinner's face, or by the grave; when the body is rotten there, the soul is racking in the torments of hell, where the worm dies not, and, Son, remember, is the constant peel.

First, That, because he hated to be reformed, he therefore hated to be informed, and could not endure either to be taught his duty, (How have I hated not only the discipline of being instructed, but the instruction itself, though all true and good!) or to be told of his faults, My heart despised reprovery, v. 12. He cannot but own that those who had the charge of him, parents, ministers, had done their part, they had been his teachers, they had instruct- ed him, had given him good counsel and fair warning; (v. 13.) but to his own shame and confusion does he speak it, and therein justifies God in all the miseries that were brought upon him, he had not taken their counsel, had not obeyed their voice, for indeed he never inclined his ear to those that instructed him; never minded what they said, nor admitted the impressions of it. Note, Those who have had a good education, and do not live up to it, will have a great deal to answer for another day. And those who will not now remember what they were taught, to conform themselves to it, will be made to remember it as an aggravation of their sin, and, consequently, of their ruin.

Secondly, That, by the frequent acts of sin, the habits of it were so rooted and confirmed, that his heart was fully set in him to commit it; (v. 14.) I was almost in all evil, in the midst of the congregation and assembly. When he came into the synagogue, or into the courts of the temple, to worship God with the Israelites, his uncleanness was full of wanton thoughts and desires, and his eyes of adultery. Reverence of the place and company, and of the work that was doing, could not restrain him, but he was almost as wicked and vile there as any where. No sin will appear more frightful to an awakened conscience, than the profanation of holy things; nor will any aggravation of sin render it more exceeding sinful than the place we are honoured with in the congregation and assembly, and the advantages we enjoy thereby. Zimri and Cozbi avowed their villany in the sight of Moses, and all the congregation; (Numb. xxv. 6.) and heart-adultery is as open to God, and must needs be most offensive to him, when we draw nigh to him in religious exercises. I was in all evil, in defiance of the magistrates and judges, and their assemblies; so some understand it. Others refer it to the evil of punishment, not to the evil of sin; I was made a spectacle in the congregation of Israel; I was under almost all God's sore judgments in the midst of the congregation of Israel, set up for a mark. I stood up, and cried in the congregation," Job xxx. 28. Let that be avoided which will be thus rued at last.

15. Drink waters out of thine own cistern, and running waters out of thine own well. 16. Let thy fountains be dispersed abroad, and rivers of waters in the streets

1. "It blasts the reputation; thou wilt give thine honour unto others; (v. 9.) thou wilt lose it thyself, thou wilt put into the hand of each of thy neighbours a stone to throw at thee, for they will all, with good reason, cry shame on thee, will despise thee, and trample on thee, as a foolish man." Whoredom is a sin that makes men contemptible and base, and no man of sense or virtue will care to keep company with one that keeps company with has.

2. "It wastes the times, gives the years, the years of youth, the flower of men's time, unto the cruel, that base lust of thine, which, with the utmost cruelty, wars against the soul; that base harlot which pretends an affection for thee, but really hunts for the precious life." Those years that should be given to the honour of a gracious God are spent in the service of a cruel sin.

3. "It ruins the estate; (v. 10.) strangers will be filled with thy wealth, which thou art but institted with as a steward for thy family; and the fruit of thy labours, which should be provision for thine own house, will be in the house of a stranger, that neither has right to it, nor will ever thank thee for it.

4. "It is destructive to the health, and shortens men's days; thy flesh and thy body will be consumed. (v. 11.) I was in all uncleanliness not only war against the soul, which thou, Sir, will not be in no care about, but they war against the body too, which he is so indulgent of, and is in such care to please and pamper; such deceitful, such foolish, such hurtful, lusts are those. Those that give themselves to work uncleanliness with greediness, waste their strength, throw themselves into weakness, and often have their bodies filled with loathsome distempers, by which the number of their months is cut off in the midst, and they fall unpitied sacrifices to a cruel lust.

5. "It will fill the mind with horror, if ever conscience be awakened. Though thou art merry now, shooting thyselv in thine own deceivings, yet thou wilt certainly mourn at the last, v. 11. Thou art all this while making work for repentance, and laying up matter for vexation and torment in the reflection, when the sin is set before thee in its own colours." Sooner or later it will bring sorrow; either when the soul is humbled, and brought to repentance, or when the flesh and body are consumed; either by sickness, when conscience flies in the sinner's face, or by the grave; when the body is rotten there, the soul is racking in the torments of hell, where the worm dies not, and, Son, remember, is the constant peel.

15. Drink waters out of thine own cistern, and running waters out of thine own well. 16. Let thy fountains be dispersed abroad, and rivers of waters in the streets
17. Let them be only thine own, and not strangers with thee. 18. Let thy fountain be blessed; and rejoice with the wife of thy youth. 19. Let her be as the loving hind and pleasant roe; let her breasts satisfy thee at all times, and be thou ravished always with her love. 20. And why wilt thou, my son, be ravished with a strange woman, and embrace the bosom of a stranger? 21. For the ways of man are before the eyes of the Lord, and he pondereth all his goings.

22. His own iniquities shall take the wick-ed ed, and he shall be holden with the cords of his sins. 23. He shall die without instruction; and in the greatness of his folly he shall go astray.

Solomon, having showed the great evil that there is in adultery and fornication, and all such lewd and filthy courses, here prescribes remedies against them.

I. Enjoy with satisfaction the comforts of lawful marriage, which was ordained for the prevention of uncleanness, and therefore ought to be made use of in time, lest it should not prove effectual for the cure of that which it might have prevented. Let none complain that God has dealt unkindly with them, in forbidding them those pleasures which they have a natural desire of, for he has graciously provided for the regular gratification of them. Thou mayest not indeed eat of every tree of the garden, but choose thee out one, which thou pleasest, and of that thou mayest freely eat; nature will be content with that, but lust with nothing. God, in thus confining men to one, has been so far from putting any hardship upon them, that he has really consulted their true interest; for, as Mr. Herbert observes, if God had laid all common, certainly Man would have been the enсуessor.—Church-porch.

Solomon here enlarges much upon this; not only prescribing it as an antidote, but urging it as argument, against fornication, that the allowed pleasures of marriage (however wicked wits may ridicule them, who are factors for the unclean spirit) far transcend all the false forbidden pleasures of whoredom.

1. Let young men marry, marry and not burn. Have a wife, a well of thine own. (v. 15.) even the wife of thy youth; (v. 16.) Wholly abstain, or sed—Herb. "The world is wide, and there are varieties of accomplishments, among which thou mayest please thyself."

2. Let him that is married take delight in his wife, and let him be very fond of her, not only because she is the wife that he himself has chosen, and he ought to be pleased with his own choice, but because she is the wife that God in his providence has appointed for him, and he ought much more to be pleased with the divine appointment; pleased with her because she is his own; Let thy fountain be blessed; (v. 18.) think thyself very happy in her, look upon her as a blessed wife, let her have thy blessing, pray daily for her, and then rejoice with her. Those comforts we are likely to have joy of, that are sanctified to us by prayer and the blessing of God. It is not only allowed us, but commanded us, to be pleasant to our relations; and it particularly becomes yoke-fellows to rejoice together and in each other. Mutual delight is the bond of mutual fidelity. It is not only taken for granted, that the bridegroom rejoices over his bride, (Isa. xxvi. 5.) but given for law. (Ecc. ix. 9.) Live joyfully with thy wife whom thou lovest, all the days of thy life.

Those take not their comforts there where God has appointed, who are jovial and merry with their companions abroad, but sour and morose with their fellow-sinners.

3. Let him be fond of his wife, and love her dearly; (v. 19.) Let her be as the loving hind and pleasant roe, such as great men sometimes kept tame in their houses, and played with. Desire no better diversion from severe study and business, than the innocent and pleasant conversation of thine own wife; let her lie in thy bosom, as the poor man's ewe-lamb did in his, (2 Sam. xii. 3.) and do thou thy head in her's, and let that satisfy thee at all times. They seek not from others what they have not from thee. Err thou always in her love. If thou wilt suffer thy love to run into an excess, and wilt be doting-fond of any body, let it be only of thine own wife, where there is least danger of exceeding. This is drinking waters, to quench the thirst of thine appetite, out of thine own cistern, and running waters, which are clear, and sweet, and wholesome, out of thine own well; (v. 15.) 1 Cor. vii. 2, 3. 4. Let each delight in children, and look upon them with pleasure; (v. 16, 17.) "Look upon them as streams from thine own pure fountain." (the Jews are said to come forth out of the waters of Judah, Is. xlvi. 1.) "so that they are pieces of thyself, as the streams are of the fountain. Keep to thine own wife, and thou shalt have," (1.) "A numerous offspring, like rivers of water, which run in abundance, and they shall be dispersed abroad, matched into other families, whereas they that commit fornication, shall not increase," Hos. iv. 19. (2.) "A peculiar offspring, which shall be only thine own, whereas the children of whoredom, that are fathered upon thee, are, probably, not so, but, for aught thou knowest, are the offspring of strangers, and yet thou must keep them." (3.) "A creditable offspring, which are an honour to thee, and which thou mayest send abroad, and appear with in the streets, whereas a spurious brood is thy disgrace, and that which thou art ashamed to own."

In this matter, virtue has all the pleasure and honour in it; justly therefore is it called wisdom.

5. Let him then scorn the offer of forbidden pleasures, when he is always ravished with the love of a faithful virtuous wife, let him consider what an absurdity it will be for him to be ravished with a strange woman, (v. 20.) to be in love with a filthy harlot, and embrace the bosom of a stranger; which, if he had any sense of honour or virtue, he would loathe the thoughts of. Why wilt thou, being a Brit, such an enemy to thyself, as to prefer puddle-water, and that poisoned too and stolen, before pure living waters out of thine own well?" Note, If the dictates of reason may be heard, the laws of virtue will be obeyed. II. "See the eye of God always upon thee, and let his fear rule in thine heart, v. 21. They that live in this sin, promise themselves secrecy; the eye of God is upon the same; Hos. iv. 22. But to what purpose, when it cannot be hid from God? For. 1. He sees it; the ways of man, all his motions, all his actions, are before the eyes of the Lord, all the workings of the heart, and all the outgoings of the life, that is done ever so secretly, and disguised ever so artfully. God sees it in a true light, and knows it with all its causes, circumstances, and consequences. He does not cast an eye upon these, as a stranger, or with a caviling Inquisition. It is not that he searches, but actually in his view, and under his inspection and darkest thou sin against God in his sight, and do that wickedness under his eye, which thou durst not do in the presence of a man like thyself?"

2. He will call the sinner to an account for it; for he not only sees, butonders, all his goings, judges concerning them, as one that will shortly judge the sinner for

In this chapter, we have, 1. A caution against rash sureties, v. 1–5. 2. A rebuke to slothfulness, v. 6–11. 3. The character and fate of a malicious mischievous man, v. 12–15. 4. An account of seven things which God hates, v. 16–19. 5. An exhortation to make the word of God familiar to us, v. 20–22. 6. A repeated warning of the pernicious consequences of the sin of whoredom, v. 24–35. We are here dissuaded from sin very much by arguments borrowed from our secular interests, for it is not only represented as damping in the other world, but as impoverishing in this.

1. My son, if thou be surety for thy friend, if thou hast stricken thy hand with a stranger, 2. Thou art snared with the words of thy mouth, thou art taken with the words of thy mouth. 3. Do this now, my son, and deliver thyself, when thou art come into the hand of thy friend; go, humble thyself, and make sure thy friend. 4. Give not sleep to thine eyes, nor slumber to thine eyelids. 5. Deliver thyself as a roe from the hand of the hunter, and as a bird from the hand of the fowler.

It is the excellency of the word of God, that it teaches us not only divine wisdom for another world, but human prudence for this world, that we may order our affairs with discretion; and this is one good rule, To avoid suretyship, because by it poverty and ruin are often brought into families, which take away that comfort in relations which he had recommended in the foregoing chapter.

1. We must look upon suretyship as a snare, and decline it accordingly, v. 1. 2. It is dangerous enough for a man and be bound to his friends in it; it is one whose circumstances he is well acquainted with, and well assured of his sufficiency; but much more to strike the hands with a stranger, to become surety for one whom thou dost not know to be either able or honest. Or the stranger here, with whom the hand is stricken, is the creditor, “the usurer to whom thou art become bound, and yet as to thee he is a stranger, thou owest him nothing, nor hast had any dealings with him. If thou hast rashly entered into such a bargain, and hast given to him, or in hopes to have the same kindness done thee another time; know that thou art snared with the words of thy mouth, it was easily done, with a word’s speaking, it was but setting thy hand to a paper; a bond is soon sealed and delivered, and a recognition entered into; but it will not be so easily got clear of, thou art in a snare, more than thou art aware of.” See how little reason we have to make light of tongue-sins; if by a word of our mouth we may become indebted to men, and lie open to their actions, by the words of our mouth we may become obnoxious to God’s justice, and even so may be snared. It is false that words are but wind, they are often snares. 2. If we have been drawn into this snare, it will be our wisdom, by all means, with all speed, to get out of it, v. 3.5. “It sleeps for the present, we hear nothing of it, the debt is not demanded, say the creditors. Never fear, we will take care of it.” But still the true interest is running on, the creditor may come upon thee when he will, and perhaps may be hasty and severe, the principal may prove either knavish or insolvent, and then thou must rob thy wife and children, and ruin thy family, to pay that which thou didst neither eat nor drink for. And therefore deliver thyself, rest not till either the creditor give up the bond, or the principal give thee counter-security, when thou art come into the hand of thy friend, and he has advantage against thee, it is no time to threaten or give ill language, (that will provoke, and make ill worse,) but humble thyself, beg and pray to be discharged, go down on thy knees to them, and give them all the fair words thou canst, engage thy friends to speak for thee, leave no stone unturned till thou hast agreed with thee adversary, and committed the matter, so that thy bond may not come to the hands of a creditor, which a single sin which may well break thy sleep, and let it do so till thou hast got through it. Give not sleep to thine eyes, till thou hast delivered thyself. Strive and struggle to the utmost, and hasten with all speed, as a roe or a bird delivers herself out of the snare of the fowler or hunter. Delays are dangerous, and feeble efforts will not serve. See what care God, in his word, has taken to make men good husbands to their estates, and to preserve the management of them. Godliness has precepts, as well as promises, relating to the life that now is.

But how are we to understand this? We are not to think it is unlawful in any case to become surety, or bail, for another; it may be a piece of justice or charity; he that has friends may see cause in this instance to show himself friendly, and it may be no piece of imprudence. Paul became bound for Onesimus, Philemon 19. We may help a young man into business, that we know to be honest and diligent, and gain him credit by passing our words for him, and to do him great kindness without any detriment to ourselves. But, (1.) It is every man's wisdom to keep out of debt as much as may be, for it is an incumbrance upon him, entangles him in the world, puts him in danger of doing wrong, or suffering wrong; the borrower is servant to the lender, and makes himself very much a slave to the world. Christians therefore, who are bought with a price, should not thus, without need, make themselves the servile debtors to one another. Besides, it is greatly to entangle ourselves with necessitous people, and to become bound for their debts, that are ever and anon taking up money, and lading, as we say, out of one hole into another, for it is ten to one but some time or other, it will come upon us. A man ought never to be bound as surety for more than he is both able and willing to pay, and can afford to pay without wronging his family, in case the principal fail, for he ought to look at it as his own debt. (Ecclesiasticus viii. 13.) Be not surety above thy power, for thou be surety, thou must take care to pay it. (3.) It is a necessary piece of after-wit, if we have foolishly entangled ourselves, to get out of the snare as fast as we can, to lose no time, spare no pains, and stick at no submission, to make ourselves safe and easy, and get our affairs into a good posture. It is better to humble ourselves for an accommodation, than to ruin ourselves by our stiffness and haughtiness. Make sure thy friend, by getting clear from thine engagements from him; for rash suretyship is as much the bane of friendship, as that which is prudent is sometimes the bond of it. (4.) Let us take heed lest we any way make ourselves guilty of other men's sins against God, (1 Tim. v. 22.) for that is worse, and much more dangerous, than being bound for other men's debts; and if we must be in all this care to get our debts to men forgiven, much more to get our peace made with God; 7. Humble thyself to him, make sure of Christ thy friend, to intercede for thee; pray earnestly that thy sins may be pardoned, and thou mayest be delivered from going down to the pit; and it shall not be in vain. Give not sleep to thine eyes, nor slumber to thine eye-lids, till this be done. 9.

6. Go to the ant, thou sluggard; consider her ways, and be wise: 7. Which having no guide, overseer, or ruler, 8. Provideth her meat in the summer, and gathereth her food in the harvest. 9. How long wilt thou sleep, O sluggard? when wilt thou arise out of thy sleep? 10. Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep: 11. So shall poverty come as one that travelleth, and thy want as an armed man.

Solomon, in these verses, applies himself to the sluggard, who loves his ease, lives in idleness, minds no business, sticks to nothing, brings nothing to pass, and in a particular manner is careless in the business of religion. Slothfulness is as sure a way to poverty, though not so short a way, as sure suretyship.

7. A sluggard will not_________:
    1. By way of instruction, v. 6. 8. He sends him to school, for sluggards must be schooled. He is to take him to school himself, for if the scholar will take no pains, the master must take the more; the sluggard is not willing to come to school to him, dreaming scholars will never love wakeful teachers; and therefore he has found him out another school, as low as he can desire. Observe,
    1. The master he is sent to school to; Go to the ant, to the bee, so the Seventy. Man is taught more than the beasts of the earth, and made wiser than the fowls of heaven, and yet is so degenerated, that he may learn wisdom from the meanest insects, and be shamed by them. When we observe the wonderful sagacities of the inferior creatures, we must not only give glory to the God of nature, who has made them thus strangely, but receive instruction to ourselves; by spiritualizing common things, we may make the things of God both easy and ready to us, and converse with them daily.

    2. This application of the master, which is taught of them, is that required in order to the learning of this master; Consider her ways. The sluggard is so, because he does not consider; nor shall we ever learn to any purpose, either by the word or the works of God, unless we set ourselves to consider. Particularly, if we would imitate others in that which is good, we must consider their ways, diligently observe what they do, that we may do likewise, Phil. iii. 17.

    3. The application of the sluggard, is, Particulars, that is required in order to the learning of this master; Consider her ways. The sluggard is so, because he does not consider; nor shall we ever learn to any purpose, either by the word or the works of God, unless we set ourselves to consider. Particularly, if we would imitate others in that which is good, we must consider their ways, diligently observe what they do, that we may do likewise, Phil. iii. 17.

    4. The application of the sluggard, is, Particulars, that is required in order to the learning of this master; Consider her ways. The sluggard is so, because he does not consider; nor shall we ever learn to any purpose, either by the word or the works of God, unless we set ourselves to consider. Particularly, if we would imitate others in that which is good, we must consider their ways, diligently observe what they do, that we may do likewise, Phil. iii. 17.

    5. The application of the sluggard, is, Particulars, that is required in order to the learning of this master; Consider her ways. The sluggard is so, because he does not consider; nor shall we ever learn to any purpose, either by the word or the works of God, unless we set ourselves to consider. Particularly, if we would imitate others in that which is good, we must consider their ways, diligently observe what they do, that we may do likewise, Phil. iii. 17.
gards? How long wouldst thou sleep, if one would let thee alone? When wilt thou think it time to arise?" Sluggards should be reasured with a How long? This is applicable, (1.) To those that are slothful in the works of Belial, whom of their particular calling as men, or their general calling as Christians. "How long wilt thou waste thy time, and when wilt thou be a better husband of it? How long wilt thou love thine ease, and when wilt thou learn to deny thyself, and to take pains? How long wilt thou bury thy talents, and when wilt thou begin to trade with them? How long wilt thou delay, and put off, and trifle away, the advantages of the present, as one regardless of hereafter; and when wilt thou stir up thyself to do what thou hast to do, which, if it be not done, thou art for ever undone?" (2.) To those that are secure in the way of sin and danger; "Hast thou not slept enough? Is it not far in the day? Does not thy Master call? Are not the Philistines upon thee? When, then, wilt thou arise?"

2. He exposes the frivolous excuses he makes for himself, and shows how ridiculous he makes himself; when he is roused, he stretches himself, and begs, as for alms, for more sleep, more slumber; he is well in his warm bed, and cannot endure to think of rising, especially of rising to work: but observe, he promises himself and his master that he will desire but a little more sleep, a little more slumber, and then he will get up and go to his business. But herein he deceives himself; the more a slothful temper is indulged, the more it prevails; let him sleep awhile, and slumber awhile, and still he is in the same tune; for a little more sleep, yet a little more; he never thinks he has enough, and yet, when he is called, pretends he will come presently. Thus men's great work is left undone by being put off yet a little longer, de die in diem—from day to day; and they are cheated of all their time by being cheated of the present moments; a little more sleep proves an everlasting sleep. Sleep on now, and take your rest.

3. He gives him fair warning of the fatal consequences of his slothfulness, v. 11. (1.) Poverty and want will certainly come upon those that are slothful in their business; if men neglect their affairs, they not only will not go forward, but they will go backward; he that leaves his concerns at sixes and sevens, will soon see them go to wreck and ruin, and bring his noble to niphencence. Spiritual poverty comes upon those that are slothful in the service of God; those will want oil, when they should use it, that provide it not in their vessels. (2.) "It will come silently and insensibly, will grow upon thee, and come step by step, as one that travels; but will without fail come at last." It will leave thee as naked as if thou wast stript by a highwayman; so Bishop Patrick. (3.) "It will come irresistibly, like an armed man, whom thou canst not oppose, or make thy part good against.

12. A naughty person, a wicked man, walketh with a froward mouth. 13. He winketh with his eyes, he speaketh with his feet, he teacheth with his fingers; 14. Frowardness is in his heart, he deviseth mischief continually; he soweth discord. 15. Therefore shall his calamity come suddenly; suddenly shall he be broken without remedy. 16. These six things doth the Lord hate; yea, seven are an abomination unto him: 17. A proud look, a lying tongue, and hands that shed innocent blood. 18. An heart that deviseth wicked imaginations, that be swift in running to mischief. 19. A false witness that speaketh lies, and he that soweth discord among brethren.

1. The characters of one that is mischievous to man, and dangerous to be dealt with. If the slothful are to be condemned, that do nothing, much more these that do ill, and contrive to do all the ill they can. It is a naughty person that is here spoken of, Heb. A man of Belial; I think it should have been so translated, because it is a term often used in scripture, and this is the explication of it. Observe

1. How a man of Belial is here described; he is a wicked man, that makes a trade of doing evil, especially with his tongue, for he walks, and works his designs, with a froward mouth, (v. 12.) by lying and perverseness, and a direct opposition to God and man. He says and does every thing. (1.) Very artfully, and with design; he has the subtlety of the serpent, and carries on his projects with a great deal of craft and management, (v. 13.) with his eyes, with his feet, with his fingers: he expresses his malice, when he daren't speak out, so some; or rather, thus he carries on his ploy; these about him, whom he makes use of as the tools of his wickedness, understand the ill meaning of a wink of his eye, a stamp of his feet, the least motion of his fingers. He gives orders for evil-doing, and yet would not be thought to do so, but has ways of concealing what he does, so that he may not be suspected. He is a close man, and upon the reserve; those only shall be let into the secret that will do any thing he would have them to do; he is a cunning man, and upon the trick, he has a language by himself, which an honest man is not acquainted with, nor desires to be. (2.) Very spitefully, and with ill design; it is not so much ambition and covetousness that are in his heart, as downright frowardness, malice, and ill-nature. He aims not so much to enrich and advance himself, as to do an ill turn to those about him. He is continually devising and mischievous, or other, purely for mischief's sake; a man of Belial indeed, of the devil, resembling him not only in subtilty, but in malice.

2. What his doom is; (v. 15.) His calamity shall come, and he shall be broken; he that devised mischief shall fall into mischief. His ruin shall come, (1.) Without warning; it shall come suddenly, suddenly shall he be broken, to punish him for all the wicked arts he had to surprise people into his snares. (2.) Without relief; he shall be irreparably broken, and never able to piece again; he shall be broken without remedy. What relief can he expect that has disabled all mankind? He shall come to his end, and none shall help him, Dan. xi. 43.

11. A catalogue of those things which are in a special manner odious to God, all which are generally to be avoided, because they were by the Lord described in the foregoing verses; and the last of them (which, being the seventh, seems especially to be intended, because he says they are six, yea seven) is part of his character, that he sows discord. God hates sin, he hates every sin, he can never be reconciled to it, he hates nothing but sin. But there are some sins which he does in a special manner hate; and all these here mentioned are such as are injurious to God's glory, and the happiness of his church. If the evidence of the good-will God bears to mankind, that there is no God in a special manner provoking to him which are prejudicial to the comfort of human life and society. Therefore the men of Belial must expect their ruin to come suddenly, and without remedy, because their practices are such as the Lord hates, and are an abomination to him, v. 16. These things which God hates, it is no thanks to us to hate in others, but we must hate them in ourselves.

1. Haughtiness, conceit of ourselves, and contempt of others; a proud look. There are seven things that God hates, and pride is the first, because it is at the bottom of much sin, and gives rise to it. God sees the pride in the heart, and hates it there; but we mustGuard against that degree, that the show of men's countenance witnesses against them, that they overvalue themselves, and undervalue all about them, this is in a special manner hateful to him; for then pride is proud of itself, and sets shame at defiance.

2. Falsehood, and fraud, and dissimulation. Next to a proud look, nothing is more an abomination to God than a lying tongue; nothing more sacred than truth, nor more necessary to conversation than speaking truth; God and all good men hate and abhor lying.

3. Cruelty and blood-thirstiness. The Devil was, from the beginning, a liar and a murderer, (John viii. 44.) and therefore as a lying tongue, so hands that shed innocent blood, are hateful to God; because they have in them the Devil's image, and do him service.

4. Subtility in the contrivance of sin, wisdom to do evil, a heart that designs, and a head that devises, wicked imaginations, that is acquainted with the depths of Satan, and knows how to carry on acovetous, envious, revengeful, plot, most effectually. The more there is of craft and management in sin, the more it is an abomination to God.

5. Vigour and diligence in the prosecution of sin; feet that are swift in running to mischief, as if they were afraid of losing time, or were impatient of delay, in things that are so dear to. The policy and vigilance, the eagerness and industry, of sinners, in their sinful pursuits, may shame us who go about that which is good so awkwardly and so coldly.

6. False-witness bearing, which is one of the greatest mischiefs that the wicked imagination can devise, and against which there is least fence. There cannot be a greater affront to God, (to whom in an oath appeal is made,) nor a greater injury to our fellow men, than the calumnies that are uttered in this world, even the dearest, lie open to an attack of this kind,) than knowingly to give in a false testimony. There are seven things which God hates, and lying involves two of them; he hates it, and doubly hates it.

7. Making mischief between relations and neighbours, and using all wicked means possible, not only to alienate their affections one from another, but to irritate their passions one against another. The God of love and peace hates him that sows discord among brethren, for he delights in concord. Those that, by tale-bearing and slandering, by carrying ill-natured stories, aggravating every thing that is said and done, and suggesting jealousies and evil surmises, blow the coals of contention, are but preparing for themselves a fire of the same nature.

20. My son, keep thy father's commandment, and forsake not the law of thy mother: 21. Bind them continually upon thine heart, and tie them about thy neck. 22. When thou goest, it shall lead thee; when thou sleepest it shall keep thee; and when thou awaketh, it shall talk with thee. 23. For the commandment is a lamp, and the law is light; and reproofs of instruction are the way of life: 24. To keep thee from the evil woman, from the flattery of the tongue of a strange woman. 25. Lust not after her beauty in thine heart; neither let her take thee with her eyelids: 26. For by means of a whorish woman a man is brought to a piece of bread; and the adulteress will hunt for the precious life. 27. Can a man take fire in his bosom, and his clothes not be burnt? 28. Can one go upon hot coals, and his feet not be burnt? 29. So be he goeth in to his neighbour's wife; whosoever toucheth her shall not be innocent. 30. Men do not despise a thief, if he steal to satisfy his soul when he is hungry: 31. But if he be found, he shall restore seven-fold; he shall give all the substance of his house. 32. But whose committed adultery with a woman lacketh understanding: he that doeth it destroyeth his own soul. 33. A wound and dishonour shall he get, and his reproach shall not be wiped away. 34. For jealousy is the rage of a man; therefore he will not spare in the day of vengeance. 35. He will not regard any ransom; neither will he rest content, though thou givest many gifts. Here is,

I. A general exhortation faithfully to adhere to the word of God, and to take it for our guide in all our actions.

1. We must look upon the word of God, both as a light, (v. 23.) and as a law, (v. 20. 23.) (1.) By its arguments it is a light, which our understandings must subscribe to; it is a lamp to our darkness, and so to our feet for direction. The word of God reveals to us truths of eternal certainty, and is built upon the highest reason. Scripture-light is the sure light. (2.) By its authority it is a law, which our wills must submit to. As never such a light shone out of the schools of the philosophers, so never such a law issued from the throne of any prince; so well framed, and so binding. It is such a law as is a lamp and a light, for it carries with it the evidence of its own goodness.

2. We must receive it as our father's commandment, and the law of our mother, v. 20. It is God's commandment, and his law. But, (1.) Our parents directed us to it, put it into our hands, trained us up in the knowledge and observance of it, its original and obligation being most sacred. We believe, indeed, not for their saying, for we have tried it ourselves, and find it to be of God; but we were beholden to them for recommending it to us, and see all the reason in the world to continue in the things we have learned, knowing of whom we have learned them. (2.) The cautions, counsels, and commands, which our parents gave us, agree with the word of God, and therefore we must hold them fast. Children, when they are grown up, must remember the law of a good mother, as well as the commandment of a good father, Ecclesiastes xi. 2. The Lord has given the father honour over the children, and has confirmed the authority of the mother over the sons.

3. We must retain the word of God, and the good instructions which our parents gave us out of it. (1.) We must never cast them off, never think it a mighty achievement (as some do) to get clear of the restraints of a good education; "Keep thy father's commandment, keep it still, and never forsake it." (2.) We must never lay them by, no not for a time; (v. 21.) Bind them continually, not only Upon thine hand, (as Moses had directed, Deut. vi. 8.) but upon thine heart. Phylacteries upon the horse were of no value at all, any further than they occasioned pious thoughts and affections in the heart. There the word must be written, there it must be hid, and laid close to the conscience. "Tie them about thy neck, as an ornament; so shall God command and so shall this word be; it shall not be taken from thy mouth; thou shalt meditate upon it day and night, that thou mayest bless thy soul."

The tongue of a strange woman, who pretends to love thee, but intends to ruin thee. Those that will be wrangled upon by flattery, make themselves a very easy prey to the tempter; and those who will deal that snare, must take well-instructed reproofs as great kindnesses, and be thankful to those that will deal them. Deut. xvii. 9. (t.)

2. The greatest danger that self, indeed, is, to keep at a distance from this sin, and to lose upon it with the utmost dread and detestation; (v. 25.) "Just as not after her beauty, no not in thy heart, for if thou dost, thou hast there already committed adultery with her."

Talk not of the charms in her face, neither be thou smitten with her amorous glances; they are all snares and nets; let her not take thee with her eyes. Her looks are arrows and fiery darts; they wound, they kill, in another sense than what lovers mean; they call it a pleasing captivity, but it is a destroying one, it is worse than Egyptian slavery."

(1.) It is a sin that impoverishes men, wastes their estates, and reduces them to beggary; (v. 26.) By means of a whorish woman a man is brought into a house of bondage, and is made to bear the fear of it. He shall be led by that, let it be thy rule, and then shalt be led by the Spirit; he will be thy Monitor and Support. (2.) It will be our guard, and we must put ourselves under the protection of it; "When thou sleepest, and liest exposed to the malignant powers of darkness, it shall keep thee; thou shalt be safe, and shalt think thyself so." If we govern ourselves by the precepts of the word all day, and make conscience of the duty of God, and are ready to be bound to us, we may shelter ourselves under the promises of the word at night, and take the comfort of the deliverances God does, and will, command for us. (3.) It will be our companion, and we must converse with it; "When thou awaketh in the night, and knowest not how to pass away thy wakening minutes, if thou pleasest, it shall talk with thee, and entertain thee with pleasant meditations in the night; and this shall be the comfort of the day," And art contriving the work of the day, it shall talk with thee about it, and help thee to contrive for the best," Ps. i. 2. The word of God has something to say to us upon all occasions, if we would but enter into discourse with it, would ask it what it has to say, and give it the hearing. And it would contribute to our close and comfortable walking with God all day, if we would begin with him in the morning, and let his word be the subject of our first thoughts. When I awake, I am still with thee; we are so, if the word be still with us. (4.) It will be our life; for, as the law is a lamp, and a light, for the present, so the reproofs of instruction are the way of life. Those reproofs of the word, which not only show us our faults, but instruct us how to do better, are the way that leads to life, eternal life. Let not faithful reproofs, therefore, which have such a direct tendency to make us happy, ever make us unprofitable.

11. Here is a particular caution against the sin of uncleanliness. When we consider how much this iniquity abounds, how heinous it is in its own nature, of what pernicious consequence it is, and how certainly destructive to all the seeds of the spiritual life in the soul, we shall not wonder that the cautions against it are so often repeated, and so largely insisted on.

One great kindness God designed men, in giving them his law, was, to preserve them from this sin; (v. 24.) "The reproofs of instruction are therefore the way of life to thee, because they are designed to keep thee from the evil woman, who will be certain death to thee, from being enticed by the flattery of the Fountain of honour, his word must be the standard of it. [1.] As for the sin of stealing, if a man were brought to it by extreme necessity, if he stole meat for the satisfying of his soul when he was hungry, though that will not excuse him from guilt, yet it is such an extenuation of his crime, that men do not despise him, do not expose him to ignominy, death, or stone walls, and blame will be laid upon those that brought him to poverty, or that did not relieve him; nay, though he have not that to say in his excuse, if he be found stealing, and the evidence be ever so plain upon him, yet he shall only make restitution seven-fold; the law of Moses appointed that he who stole a sheep should restore four-fold, and an ox five-fold; (Exod. xxii. 1.) accordingly David adjudged, of his own act, that which was contrary to the commandment, he will not regard any ransoming; though thou offer to bribe him, and give him many gifts to pacify him, he will not rest content with anything less than the execution of the law, thou must be stoned to death; if a man would give all the substance of his house, it would be a death, (v. 31.) but not for adultery, in that case it would utterly be condemned. Stand in awe therefore, and sin not, expose not thyself to all this misery for a moment’s sordid pleasure, which will be bitterness in the end.”

The scope of this chapter is, as of several before, to warn young men against the lusts of the flesh. Solomon remembered of what ill consequence it was to his father, perhaps found himself, and perceived his son, addicted to it, or at least had observed how many hopeful young men among his subjects had been ruined by those lusts, and therefore he thought he did now see enough to dissuade men from them, that every one may possess his vessel in sanctification and honour, and not in the lusts of unchoosiness. In this chapter, we have, 1. A general exhortation to keep our minds and bodies in the word of God, as a sovereign antidote against this sin, v. 1—3. If. A particular representation of the great danger which unwary young men are in of being involved in it, v. 4—24. 1. M a y son, keep my words, and lay up my commandments with thee. 2. Keep my commandments, and live; and my law as the apple of thine eye. 3. Bind them upon thy fingers, write them upon the table of thine heart. 4. Say unto Wisdom, Thou art my sister; and call Understanding thy kinswoman: 5. That they may keep thee from the strange woman, from the stranger which flattereth with her words. These verses are an introduction to his warning against fleshly lusts, much the same with that, b. vi. 20, &c. and ends, (v. 5.) as that did, (v. 24.) To keep thee from the strange woman, that is it he aims at; only there he had said, Keep thy father’s commandment, here, (which comes all to one.) Keep my commandments, for he speaks to us as unto sons. He speaks in God’s name; for they are God’s commandments that we are to keep, his words, his law. The word of God must be to us,

1. As that which we are most careful of; we must keep it as our treasure, we must lay it up; God’s commandments with us, lay them up safe, that we may not be robbed of them by the wicked one; (v. 1.) We must keep it as our life; I eep my commandments, and live; (v. 2.) “Not only keep them, and you shall live; but, keep them as you would your life, as those that cannot live without them.” It would be death to a good man to be deprived of the word of God, for it he lives, and not by being reviled, blackened, and despised. 2. As that which we are most tender of; Keep my law as the apple of thine eye; a little thing offends the eye, and therefore nature has so well guarded it: we pray, with David, that God would manslaughter, of his brother’s blood. If thou art not afraid of the wrath of God, yet be afraid of the rage of a man; such jealousy is, it is strong as death, and cruel as the grave. In the day of vengeance, when the adulterer comes to be tried for his life, the prosecutor will not spare any pains or cost in the prosecution, will not relent toward the one he knew as his brother, and that one that had robbed him; he will not accept of any composition, he will not regard any ransom; though thou offer to bribe him, and give him many gifts to pacify him, he will not rest content with anything less than the execution of the law, thou must be stoned to death; if a man would give all the substance of his house, it would be a death, (v. 31.) but not for adultery, in that case it would utterly be condemned. Those that keep the law, are light, the law in the heart is the eye of the soul.

3. As that which we are fond of, and would be ever mindful of; (v. 3.) Bind them upon thy fingers, let them be precious to thee, look upon them as an ornament, as a diamond ring, as the signet upon thy right hand, wear them continually as the wedding-ring, the alliance of thy love to God; look upon the word of God as putting an honour upon thee, as an ensign of thy dignity. Bind them upon thy fingers, that they may be constant memorandums to thee of thy duty, that thou mayest have them always in view, as if which is granted upon the palms thine hands.

4. As that which we are fond of, and are ever thinking of; Write them upon the tables of thine heart, the names of thy friends, those dear love, which are written in our hearts. Let the word of God dwell richly in us, and be written there where it will be always at hand to be read. Where sin was written, Jer. xvii. 1. let the word of God be written. It is the matter of a promise; (Heb. viii. 10.) I will write my law in their hearts, which makes the precept practicable and easy.

5. As that which we are intimately acquainted and conversant with; (v. 4.) Say unto wisdom, Thou art my sister, whom I dearly love and take delight in; and calling understand thy kinswoman, to whom I am nearly allied, and for whom I have a pure affection; call her thy friend whom thou countest. We must make the word of God familiar to us, consult it, and consult its honour, and take a pleasure in conversing with it.

6. As that which we make use of for our defence and armour, to keep us from the strange woman, from sin, that flattering, but destroying, thing, that adulteres; particularly from the sin of uncleanness.

7. And beheld among the simple ones, I discerned among the youths, a young man void of understanding.

8. Passing through the street near her corner; and he went the way to her house.

9. In the twilight, in the evening, in the black and dark night. And behold, there met him a woman, with the attire of an harlot, and subtle of heart. (11. She is loud and stubborn; her feet abide not in her house: 12. Now is she without, now in the streets, and lieth in wait at every corner.)

13. So she caught him, and kissed him, and with an impudent face said unto him, I have peace-offerings with me; this day have I paid my vows: 15. Therefore came I forth to meet thee, diligently to seek thy face; and have found thee. 16. I have decked my bed with coverings of tapestry, with carved works, with fine linen of Egypt. 17. I have perfumed my bed with myrrh, aloes, and cinnamon. 18. Come, let us take our fill of love until the morning; let us solace ourselves with loves: 19. For the good man is not at home, he is gone a long journey: 20. He hath taken a bag of money with him, and will come at the day appointed. 21. With her much fair speech she caused him to yield, with the flattering of her lips she forced him. 22. He goeth after her straightforward, as an ox goeth to the slaughter, or as a fool to the correction of the stocks; 23. Till a dart strike through his liver, as a bird hasteth to the snare, and knoweth not that it is for his life.

Solomon here, to enforce the caution he had given against the sin of whoredom, tells a story of a young man that was ruined, to all intents and purposes, by the enticements of an adulterous woman. Such a story as this would serve the lewd profane poets of our age to make a play of, and the harlot, with them, would be a heroine; nothing would be so entertaining to the audience, nor give them so much diversion, as her arts of beguiling the young gentleman, and drawing in the country-squire; her conquests would be celebrated by all the world, the state and love, and the comedy would conclude very pleasantly; and every young man that saw it acted, would covet to be so picked up. Thus fools make a mock at sin. But Solomon here relates it, and all wise and good men read it, as a very melancholy story; the impudence of the adulterous woman is very justly looked upon, by all that have any sparks of virtue in them, with the highest indignation, and the easiness of the young man, with the tenderest compassion; and the story concludes with sad reflections, enough to make all that read and hear it afraid of the snare of earthly lusts, and careful to keep at the utmost distance from them. It is supposed to be a parable, or imagined case, but I doubt it was too true, and, which is worse, that, notwithstanding the warning it gives of the fatal consequences of such wicked courses, it is still too often true, and the agents for hell are still playing the same game, and with like success.

Solomon was a magistrate, and, as such, inspected the manners of his subjects, looked often through his casement, that he might see with his own eyes, and made remarks upon those who little thought his eye was upon them, that he might know the better how to make the sword he bore a terror to evil-doers. But here he writes as a minister, a prophet, who is by office a watchman, to give warning of the approach of the enemies, and especially where they lie in ambush, that we may not be ignorant of Satan's devices, but may know where to double our guard. This Solomon does here, where we may observe the account he gives, without ballast, without pilot, cord, or compass; he knew not how to depart from evil, which is the best understanding, Job xxviii. 28. Those become an easy prey to Satan, who, when they are arrived to the stature of men, have scarcely the understanding of children. 3. He kept bad company; he was a youth, and terrified the young in sin; yielded, as the simple ones; if, being conscious of his own weakness, he had associated with those that were elder and wiser than himself, there had been hopes of him; Christ, at twelve years old, conversed with the doctors, to set young people an example of his; but if those that are simple choose such for their companions as are like themselves, simple they will be, and hardened in their simplicity. 4. He kept bad food; he fared sumptuously, and passed through the street, as one that knew not how to dispose of himself. One of the sins of filthy Solom., was, abundance of idleness, Ezek. xvi. 49. He went in a starched stately manner, so (they say) the word signifies; he appeared to be a nice formal fop, the top of whose accomplishments was to dress well, and walk with a good air; fit game for that bird of prey to fly at. 5. He was a night-walker, that hated the brightness that is to be drawn from day-light, from which he found men in to their repose; and, having fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, he begins to move in the twilight in the evening, v. 9. And he chooses the black and dark night as fittest for his purpose, not the moon-light nights, when he might be discovered. 6. He steered his course toward the house of one that he thought would entertain him, and that he might be merry with; he went near her corner, the way to her house, (v. 8.) contrary to Solomon's advice, (ch. v. 8.) Come not nigh the door of her house. Perhaps he did not know it was the way to an infamous house, but, however, it was a way that he had no business in; and, when we have nothing to do, the Devil will quickly find us something to do. We must take heed, not only of idle days, but of idle evenings, lest they prove inlets into temptation.

1. Of the person tempted, and how he laid himself open to the temptation, and therefore must thank himself if it end in his destruction. 1. He was a young man, v. 7. 2. Fleshly lusts are called wanton lusts, (2 Tim. ii. 22.) and called indulged lusts, as tricks of youth, and therefore excusable, but rather to aggravate them, as robbing God of the first and best of our time, and, by debauching the mind when it is tender, laying a foundation for a bad life ever after; and to intimate that young people ought, in a special manner, to fortify their resolutions against this sin. 2. He was a young man, vain of understanding, that went abroad into the world, not principled, as he ought to have been, with wisdom and the fear of God, and so ventured to sea.

II. Of the person tempting; not a common prostitute, for she was a married wife, (v. 19.) and, for aught appears, lived in reputation among her neighbours, not suspected of any such wickedness, and yet, in the twilight of the evening, when her husband was abroad, abominably impudent. She is here described, 1. By her dress; she had the attire of a harlot, (v. 10.) gaudy and flaunting, to set off as a beauty, perhaps she was painted as Jezebel, and went with her neck and breasts bare, loose, and en deshabille. The purity of the heart will show itself in the modesty of the dress, which becomes women professing godliness. 2. By her craft and management; she is subtile of heart, mistress of all the arts of wheedling, and knowing how by all her caresses to serve her own base purposes. 3. By her temper and carriage; she is loud and stubborn, talkative and self-willed, noisy and troublesome, wild and head-strong, all tongue, and that will have her way; she has a sort of check and control, and cannot bear to be counselled, much less reproved, by husband or parents, ministers or friends; she is a daughter of Belial, that will endure no yoke. 4. By her place; not her own house, she hates the confinement and employment of that, her feet abide not there any longer than needs must. She is all for gadding abroad, changing place and company, and she is without in the country, under pretence of taking the air, now in the streets of the city, under pretence of seeing how the market goes; she is here, and there, and everywhere where but where she should be; she lies in wait at every corner, to pick up such as can make a prey of. Virtue is a penance to those to whom home is a prison.

III. Of the temptation itself, and the management of it. She met the young spark, perhaps she knew him, however, she knew by his fashions that he was such a one as she wished for; so she caught him about the neck and kissed him, contrary to all the rules of modesty, (v. 13.) and waited not for his compliments. She comes, with a beguiling face, invited him not only to her house, but to her bed. 1. She courted him to sipp with her; (v. 14, 15.) I have peace-offerings with me. Hereby she gives him to understand, (1.) Her prosperity, that she was compassed about with so many blessings, that she had occasion to offer peace-offerings, in token of joy and thankfulness; she was before-hand in the world, so that he needed not fear having his pocket pinched. (2.) He makes profession of piety, so, he is a night-walker, he has found in to their repose, and was still respected there as any that worshipped in the courts of the Lord; she had paid her vows, and as she thought, made all even with God Almighty, and therefore might venture upon a new score of sins. Note, The external performances of religion, if they do not harden men against sin, harden them in it, and embolden carnal hearts to venture upon it, in hopes that, when they come to count and discount with God, he will have this to say, he has not offered them their peace-offerings and their vows, as they to him for their sins. But it is sad that a show of piety should become the shelter of iniquity, (which really doubles the shame of it, and makes it more exceeding sinful,) and that men should baffle their consciences with those very things that should startle them. The Pharisees made long prayers, that they might the more plausibly carry on their covetous and mischievous designs. The greatest part of the flesh of the peace-offerings, was, by the law, returned back to the offerers, to feast upon with their friends, which (if they were peace-offerings of thanksgiving) was to be all eaten the same day, and none of it left until the morning, Lev. vii. 15. This law of charity and generosity is abused to be a colour for glutony and excess; "Come," says she, "come home with me, for I have good cheer enough, and only want a good company to help me off with it." It was pity that the peace-offerings should thus become, in a bad sense, sin-offerings, and that what was designed for the honour of God should become the food and fuel of a base lust.

But this is not all; to strengthen the temptation, [1.] She pretends to have a very great affection for him above any man; *Therefore, because I have a good supper upon the table, I came forth to meet thee, for a friend in the world shall be so welcome to it as thou shalt, v. 15. Thou art he whom I came on purpose to seek, to seek diligently; came myself, and would not send a servant." Surely he cannot deny her his company, when she put such a value upon it, and would take all these pains to obtain the favour of it. Sinners take pains to do mischief, and are as the roaring lion himself, they go about seeking to devour, and yet pretend they do good. [2.] She breathes it out, that Providence itself countenanced her choice of him for her companion; for how quickly had she found him whom she sought! 2. She courted him to lie with her; they will sit down to eat and drink, and then rise up to play, to play the wanton, and there is a bed ready for them, where he shall find that which will be, in all respects, agreeable to him; to one whose study is to be a Slender in all the sciences of nature, and carved works, exquisitely fine, he never saw the like; to please his touch, the sheets are not of home-spun cloth, they are far-fetched and dear-bought, they are of fine linen of Egypt; (v. 16.) to gratify his smell, it is perfumed with the sweetest scents, v. 17. Come, Thousands (1.) Is do an on husband, would Potiphar's their man make love therefore,
mer,
and foolish life, therefore,
shall advantage one Sudden;
he this,
he said,
and end in his endless damnation. (2.) That which makes his case the more piteous, is, that he himself aware of his misery and danger; he goes blindfold, for, of all sinners, drunkards are the greatest fools, they wilfully turn themselves into fools is led to the correction of the stocks, and is not sensible of the shame of it, but goes to it as if he were going to a play. The bird that hastes to the snare, looks only at the bait, and promises herself a good bit from that, and considers not that it is for her life. Thus this unthinking unwary young man dreams of nothing but the pleasures he shall have in the embraces of the harlot, while really he is running headlong upon his ruin. Though Solomon does not here tell us that he put the law in execution against this base harlot, yet we have no reason to think but that he did, he was himself so affected with the mischief she did, and had such an indignation at it.

24. Hearken unto me now, therefore, O ye children, and attend to the words of my mouth: 25. Let not thy heart decline to her ways, go not astray in her paths: 26. For she hath cast down many wounded; yea, many strong men have been slain by her. 27. Her house is the way to hell, going down to the chambers of death.

We have here the application of the foregoing story: "Hearken to me therefore, and not to such seducers; (v. 24.) give ear to a father, and not to an enemy."

1. "Take good counsel when it is given you. Let not thine heart decline to her ways; (v. 25.) never leave the paths of virtue, though strait and narrow, and up-hill, for the way of the adulteress, though green and broad, and crowded with company.
Do not only keep thy feet from those ways, but let not so much as thy heart incline to them; never harbour a disposition this way, nor think otherwise than with abhorrence of such wicked practices as these. Let reason, and conscience, and the fear of God, ruling in the heart, check the inclinations of the sensual appetite. If thou goest in her paths, in any of the paths that lead to this sin, thou goest stray, thou art out of the right way, the safe way; therefore take heed, go not astray, lest thou wander endlessly."

2. "Take fair warning when it is given you." (1.) "Look back and see what mischief this sin hath done; the adulteress has been the ruin not of here and there one, but she has cast down many morally wounded." Thousands have been undone, now and and for ever, by this sin; and those not only the weak and simple youths, such as he was of whom we had now spoken, but many strong men have been slain by her, v. 26. Men, who were the样的 illustrious, especially to Samson, who was slain by this sin, and perhaps to David too, who, by his sin, entailed a word upon his house, though so far the Lord took it away, that he himself should not die. These were men not only of great bodily strength, but of eminent wisdom and courage, and yet their fleshly lusts prevailed over them. Howl, fir-trees, if the cedars be shaken. Let him that thinks he stands, take heed lest he fall."

(2.) "Look forward with an eye of faith, and see what will be in the end of it," v. 27. Her house, though richly decked and furnished, and called a house of pleasure, is the way to hell; and her chambers are the stair-case that goes down to the chambers of death, and everlasting darkness. The cup of fornication must shortly be exchanged for the cup of trembling; and the flames of lust, if not quenched by repentance and mortification, will burn to the lowest hell. Therefore stand in awe, and sin not.

CHAP. VIII.

The word of God is two-fold, and, in each sense, is wisdom; for a word without wisdom, is of little value, or wisdom without a word, is of little use. Now, I. Divine revelation is the word and wisdom of God, and so is that pure religion and undefiled, which is built upon it; and of that Solomon here speaks, recommending it to us as faithful, and well worthy of all acceptance, v. 1. ... 21. God, by it, instructs, and governs, and blesses, the children of men. II. The Redeemer is the eternal Word and Wisdom, the Logos; he is the Wisdom that speaks to the children of men, in the former part of the chapter; all divine revelation passes through his hand, and centres in him; but of him as the personal Wisdom, the second Person in the Godhead, in the judgment of many of the ancients, Solomon here speaks, v. 22. ... 31. He concludes with a repeated charge to the children of men, diligently to attend to the voice of God in his word, v. 32 ... 36.

1. BOTH not Wisdom cry? and Understanding stand forth her voice? 2. She standeth in the top of high places, by the way in the places of the paths. 3. She crieth at the gates, at the entrance of the city, at the coming in at the doors; 4. Unto you, O men, I call; and my voice is to the sons of wisdom. 5. O ye simple, understand wisdom; and, ye fools, be ye of an understanding heart. 6. Hear; for I will speak of excellent things; and the opening of my lips shall be right things. 7. For my mouth shall speak truth; and wickedness is an abomination to my lips. 8. All the words of my mouth are in righteousness; there is nothing false or perverse in them. 9. They are all plain to him that understandeth, and right to them that find knowledge. 10. Receive my instruction, and not silver; and knowledge rather than choice gold. 11. For wisdom is better than rubies; and all the things that may be desired are not to be compared to it.

The will of God, revealed to us for our salvation, is here largely represented to us, as easy to be known and understood, that none may have an excuse for their ignorance or error; and as worthy to be embraced, that none may have an excuse for their carelessness and unbelief.

1. The things revealed are easy to be known, for they belong to us and to our children; (Deut. xxix. 29.) and we need not soar up to heaven, or dive into the depths, to get the knowledge of them, (Deut. xxxi. 11.) for they are published and proclaimed, in some measure by the works of creation, (Ps. xix. 1.) more fully by the consciences of men, and the eternal reasons and rules of good and evil, but most clearly by Moses and the prophets; let them hear them.

The prospects of wisdom may easily be known; for—

1. They are proclaimed aloud; (v. 1.) Does not Wisdom cry? Yes, she cries aloud, and does not spare; (Isa. livii. 1) she puts forth her voice, as one in earnest, and desirous to be heard. Jesus stood and cried, John vii. 37. The curses and blessings were read with a loud voice by the Levites, Deut. xxxvii. 14. And men’s own hearts sometimes speak aloud to them; there are clamours of conscience, as well as whispers.

2. They are proclaimed from on high; (v. 2.) She stands in the top of high places; it was from the top of mount Sinai that the law was given, and Christ explained it in a new light. Nay, if we slight divine revelation, we turn away from him that speaks from heaven, a high place indeed, Heb. xii. 25. The adulterous woman spake in secret, the oracles of the heathen muttered, but wisdom speaks openly; truth seeks no corners, but gladly appeals to the light.

3. They are proclaimed in the places of concourse, where multitudes are gathered together, and wisdom begins in the synagogues and in the temple, whither the Jews always resorted, John xviii. 30. Every man that passes by on the road, of what rank or condition soever, may know what is good, and what the Lord requires of him, if it be not his own fault. There is no speech nor language where Wisdom’s voice is not heard; her discoveries and directions are given to all promiscuously. He that has ears to hear, let him hear.

4. They are proclaimed there where they are most needed. They are intended for the guidance of the childless, that are without the way, and therefore are published in the places of the path, where many ways meet, that travelers may be showed, if they will but ask, which is the right way, just then when they are at a loss; thou shalt then hear the word behind thee, saying, This is the way, Isa. xxx. 21. The foolish man knows not how to go to the city, (Eccl. x. 13.) and therefore wisdom stands ready to direct him; stands at the gates, at the entrance of the city, ready to tell him where the seer’s house is, 1 Sam. ix. 18. Nay, she follows men to their own houses, and cries to them at the coming in at the doors, saying, Peace be to this house; and, if the son of peace be there, it shall certainly abide upon it. God’s ministers are appointed to testify to people, both publicly, and from house to house. Their own consciences follow them with admonitions, wherever they go, which they cannot be out of hearing of, while they carry their own heads and hearts about with them, which are a law unto themselves.

5. They are directed to the children of men. We attend to that discourse in which we hear ourselves named, though otherwise we should have neglected it; therefore wisdom speaks to us; *Unto you, O men, I call, (v. 4.) not to angels, they need not these instructions; not to devils, they are past them; nor to the brute-creatures, they are masters of them; but to you, O men, who are taught more than the beasts of the earth, and made wiser than the fowls of heaven. To you is this law given, to you is the word of this invitation, this exhortation, sent. My voice is to the sons of men, who are concerned to receive instruction, and to whom, one would think, it should be very welcome. It is not to you, O Jews, only, that wisdom cries, or to you, O gentlemen, or to you, O scholars; but to you, O men, O men, that are taught more than the beasts of the earth.

6. They are designed to make them wise; (v. 5.) they are calculated not only for men that are capable of wisdom, but for sinful men, fallen men, foolish men, that need it, and are unwise within it; *0 ye simple ones, understand wisdom. Though you are ever so simple, Wisdom will take you for her scholars, and not only so, but, if you will be ruled by her, will undertake to give you an understanding heart. When we better the Jews and become truly religious, then the simple understand wisdom.

II. The things revealed are worthy to be known, well worthy of all acceptance. We are concerned to hear; for—

1. They are of inestimable value; they are cxcellent things, (v. 6.) principally things, so the word is Though they are level to the capacity of the meanest, yet there is that in them which will be entertaining for the greatest. They are divine and holy; they are the descendants, the offspring, the children, with whom, all other learning is but children's play. Things which relate to an eternal God, an immortal soul, and an everlasting state, must needs be excellent things.

2. They are of incontestable equity, and carry along with them the evidence of their own goodness; they are right things, (v. 6.) all in righteousness, (v. 5.) and nothing formal or hasty in them. All the dictates and directions of revealed religion are consonant to, and perfective of, the light and law of nature, and there is nothing in it that puts any hardship upon us, that lays us under any undue restraints, unbecoming the dignity and liberty of the human nature; nothing that we have reason to complain of: all God's precepts concerning all things are right.

3. They are of unutterable truth; Wisdom's doctrines, upon which her laws are founded, are such as we may venture our immortal souls upon; My mouth shall speak truth, (v. 7.) the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, for it is a testimony to the world. Every word of God is true, there are not so much as pious frauds in it; nor are we imposed upon in that which is told us for our good. Christ is a faithful Witness, is the Truth itself; wickedness, lying, is an abomination to his life. Note, Lying is wickedness, and we should not only refrain from it, but it should be an abomination to us, and as far from what we say, as from what God says to us. His word to us is yea, and amen, never then let our's be yea and nay.

4. They are wonderfully acceptable and agreeable to those who take them aright, who understand themselves aright, have not their judgments blinded and biased by the world and the flesh, are not under the power of prejudice, are taught of God, and whose understanding he has opened; who partially seek knowledge, take pains for it, and have found in it the inquiries they have hitherto prided to: them. (1.) They are all plain, and not hard to be understood. If the book issealed, it is to those who are willingly ignorant. If our gospel is hid, it is hid to them who are lost; but to those who depart from evil, which is understanding, who have that good understanding, which they have when they are enlightened from sin, and from the will and commands of evil, they are all plain, and there is nothing difficult in them. The way of religion is a high-way, and the way-faring men, though fools, shall not err therein, Isa. xxxv.

5. They therefore do a great wrong to the common people, who deny them the use of the scripture, under pretence that they cannot understand it, whereas it is plain for plain people. (2.) They are all right, and not hard to be submitted to. They are principles, things in the truth, good and evil, readily subscribe to the rectitude of all wisdom's dictates, and, therefore, without murmuring or disputing, govern themselves by them.

III. From all this he infers, that the right knowledge of those things, such as transforms us into the image of them, is to be preferred before all the wealth of this world; (v. 10, 11.) Receive my instruction, and not silver. Instruction must not only be received, but received in the right manner, receive the impressions of it, and submit to the command of it; and this, rather than choice gold; that is, 1. We must prefer religion before riches, and look upon it, that, if we have the knowledge and fear of God in our hearts, we are really more happy, and better provided for every condition of life, than if we had ever so much silver and gold. Wisdom is, in itself, and therefore must be, in our account, better than rubies. It will bring us in a better price, be to us a better portion; show it forth, and it will be a better ornament than jewels and precious stones of the greatest value. Whatever we can sit down and wish for of the wealth of this world, if we had it, it were not worthy to be compared with the advantages that attend serious godliness. 2. We must be dead to the wealth of this world, that we may the more closely and earnestly apply ourselves to the business of religion. We must receive instruction as the main matter, and then be indifferent whether we receive silver or no; nay, we must not receive it as our portion and reward, as the rich man in his life-time received his good things.

12. I Wisdom dwell with Prudence, and find out knowledge of witty inventions. 13. The fear of the Lord is to hate evil: pride, and arrogancy, and the evil way, and the forward mouth, do I hate. 14. Counsel is mine, and sound wisdom: I am understanding; I have strength. 15. By me kings reign, and princes decree justice. 16. By me princes rule, and nobles, even all the judges of the earth. 17. I love them that love me; and those that seek me early shall find me. 18. Riches and honour are, with me; yea, durable riches and righteousness.

19. My fruit is better than gold, yea, than fine gold; and my revenue than choice silver. 20. I lead in the way of righteousness, in the midst of the paths of judgment: 21. That I may cause those that love me to inherit substance; and I will find their treasures.

Wisdom here is Christ, in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge; it is Christ in the word, and Christ in the heart: not only Christ revealed to us, but Christ revealed in us. It is the word of God, the whole compass of divine revelation; it is God the Word, in whom all divine revelation centres; it is the soul formed by the word, it is Christ formed in the soul; it is religion in the person and property of it. Glorious things are here spoken of this excellent Person, this excellent thing.

1. Divine wisdom gives men good heads; (v. 12.) I wisdom dwell with prudence, not with carnal policy, (the wisdom that is from above is contrary to that, 2 Cor. i. 12.) but with true discretion, which serves for the right ordering of the conversation; that wisdom of the prudent, which is to understand his way, and is in all cases profitable to direct; the wisdom of the serpent, not only to guard from harm, but to use it in doing good. Wisdom dwells with prudence; for prudence is the prince of religion, and an ornament to religion; and there are more witty inventions found out with the help of the scripture, both for the right understanding of God's providences, and for the effectual countering of Satan's devices, and the doing of good in our generation, than were ever discovered by the learning of the philosophers or the politeness of statesmen. We may apply to our Christian life he dwells with prudence, for his whole undertaking is the wisdom of God in a mystery, and in it God abounds towards us in all wisdom and prudence. Christ found out the knowledge of that great invention, and a costly one it was to him, man's salvation, by his satisfaction an admirable expedition: we had found out many inventions for our ruin, he found out one for our recovery. The covenant of grace is so well ordered.

II. It gives men good hearts, v. 13. True religion consisting in the fear of the Lord, which is the wisdom before recommended, teaches men, 1. To hate all sin, as displeased they see it done, and determined to destroy it. The fear of the Lord is to hate evil, the evil way; to hate sin as sin, and therefore to hate every false way. Wherever there is an awe of God, there is a dread of sin, as an evil, an only evil. 2. Particularly to hate pride and passion, those two common and dangerous sins. Conceitedness of ourselves, pride and arrogancy, are sins which Christ hates, and so do all those who have the Spirit of Christ; every one hates them in others, but we must hate them in ourselves. The froward mouth, peevishness towards others, God hates, because it is such an enemy to the peace of mankind, and therefore we should hate it. Be it spoken to the honour of religion, that, however it is unjustly accused, it is so far from making men conceited and sour, that there is nothing more directly contrary to it than pride and passion, nor which it teaches us more to detest.

This has great influence upon public affairs, and the well governing of all societies, v. 14. Christ, as God, has strength and wisdom; wisdom and might are his; as Redeemer, he is the Wisdom of God, and the Power of God. To all that are his, he is made of God both Strength and Wisdom; in him they are laid up for us, that we may both know and do our duty. He is the Wonderful Counsellor, and gives that grace which alone is sound wisdom. He is Understanding itself, and has strength for all those that strengthen themselves in him. True religion gives men the best counsel in all difficult cases, and helps to make their way plain; wherever it is, it is understanding, it has strength, it will be all that to us that we need, both for services and sufferings. Where the word of God dwells richly, it makes a man perfect and furnishes him thoroughly for every good word and work.

Kings, princes, and judges, have, of all men, most need of wisdom and strength, of counsel and courage, for the faithful discharge of the trusts reposed in them, and that they may be blessings to the people over whom they are set. And therefore Wisdom says, By me kings reign; (v. 15, 16.) that is, 1. Civil government is a divine institution, and those that are intrusted with the administration of it have their commission from Christ; it is either of his kingly office, that by him kings reign; from him, to whom all judgment is committed, their power is derived. They reign by him, and therefore ought to reign for him. 2. Whatever qualifications for government any kings or princes have, they are indebted to the grace of Christ for them; he gives them the spirit of government, and they have nothing, no skill, no principles of justice, but what he endues them with. A divine grace which he has bestowed in the highest degree on them, and that is not to their subjects what he makes them.

3. Religion is very much the strength and support of the civil government; it teaches subjects their duty, and so by it kings reign over them the more easily; it teaches kings their duty, and so by it kings reign as they ought; they decree justice, while they rule in the fear of God. Those rule well whom religion rules.

We must all make all those happy, truly happy, that receive and embrace it.

1. They shall be happy in the love of Christ; for he it is that says, I love them that love me, v. 17. They that Love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity shall be loved of him with a peculiar distinguishing love; he will love them, and manifest himself to them. 2. They shall be happy in the success of their inquiries after them; They that seek me early, seek an acquaintance with me, and an interest in me, seek it early, seek it earnestly, seek it first before any thing else, that begin betimes in the days of their youth to seek me, they shall find what they seek, and the Lord shall be their guide, and they shall be his; he never said, Seek, in vain.

3. They shall be happy in the wealth of the world, or in that which is infinitely better. (1.) They shall have as much riches and honour as Infinite Wisdom seems good for them; (v. 18.) they are with Christ, he has them to give, and whether he will see fit to give them to us must be referred to him. Religion sometimes helps to make people rich and great in this world, because it makes a man wise, and so increases his estates; and the riches which Wisdom gives to her favourites have these two advantages; [1.] That they are riches and righteousness, riches honestly got, not by fraud and oppression, but in regular ways; and riches charitably used, for aims are called righteousness. Those that have their wealth from God's blessing on their industry, and that have a heart to do good with it, have riches and righteousness. [2.] That therefore they are durable riches; wealth gotten by fraud and sin so soon begins to consume, which is well-got will wear well, and will be left to the children's children; and that which is well-spent, in works of piety and charity, is set out to the best interest, and so will be durable; for the friends made by the mammon of unrighteousness, when we fail, will receive us into everlasting habitations, Luke xvi. 9. It will be found after many days, for the days of eternity. (2.) They shall have that which is infinitely better, if they have not riches and honour in this world; (v. 19.) My fruit is better than gold, and will turn to a better account, will be of more value in less compass, and my revenue better than the choicest silver, will serve a better trade. We may assure ourselves, that not only Wisdom's products at last, but her incomes in the mean time, not only her fruit, but her revenue, are more valuable than the best, either of the possessions or of the reversions of this world.

4. They shall be happy in the grace of God now; that shall be their guide in the good way, v. 20. This is that fruit of wisdom which is better than gold, than fine gold; it leads us in the way of righteousness, shows us that way, and goes before us in it; the way that God would have us walk in, and which will certainly bring us to our desired end. It leads in the midst of the paths of judgment, and saves us from the harm of the ways of the ungodly. Virtue lies in the midst. Christ by his Spirit guides believers into all truth, and so leads them in the way of righteousness, and they walk after the Spirit.

5. They shall be happy in the glory of God hereafter, v. 21. Therefore Wisdom leads in the paths of righteousness, not only that she may keep her friends in the way of duty and obedience, but that she may cause them to inherit substance, and may fill their hands with the produce of the earth, and of all that is in it; and give them a share of the happiness of this world, nor with any thing less than God and heaven. The happiness of those that love God, and devote themselves to his service, is substantial and satisfactory. (1.) It is substantial, it is substance itself; it is a happiness which will subsist of itself, and stand alone, without the accidental supports of outward conveniences, spiritual and external things are the only real and substantial things. Joy in God is substantial; it is real and well-grounded; the promises are their bonds, Christ is their Surety, and both substantial. They inherit substance; their inheritance hereafter is substantial, it is a weight of glory, it is substance; (Heb. x. 34.) all their happiness they have as heirs, it is grounded upon their sonship. (2.) It is satisfying; it will fill not only their hands, but their treasures; not only maintain them, but make them rich. The things of this world may fill men's bellies, (Ps. xvi. 14.) but not their treasures; for they cannot in them secure to themselves goods for many years, perhaps they may be deprived of them this night; but, let the treasures of the soul be ever so capacious, there is enough in God, and Christ, and heaven, to fill them. In Wisdom's promises believers have goods laid up, not for days and years, but for eternity; her fruit therefore is better than gold.

22. The Lord possessed me in the beginning of his way, before his works of old. 23. I was set up from everlasting, from the beginning, or ever the earth was. 24. When there were no depths, I was brought forth; when there were no fountains abounding with water. 25. Before the mountains were settled; before the hills was I brought forth:

26. While as yet he had not made the earth, nor the fields, nor the highest part of the dust of the world. 27. When he prepared the heavens, I was there; when he set a compass upon the face of the depth; 28. When he established the clouds above; when he strengthened the fountains of the deep; 29. When he gave to the sea his decree, that the waters should not pass his commandment; when he appointed the foundations of the earth:

30. Then I was by him, as one brought up with him; and I was daily his delight, rejoicing always before him: 31. Rejoicing in the habitable part of his earth; and my delights were with the sons of men.

That it is an intelligent and divine Person that here speaks, seems very plain, and that it is not meant of a mere property of the divine nature; for wisdom here has personal properties and actions; and that intelligent, divine Person, can be no other than the Son equal himself, to whom the principal things here spoke of are attributed in other scriptures, and we must explain scripture by itself. If Solomon himself designed only the praise of wisdom, as it is an attribute of God, by which he made the world and governs it, so to recommend to men the study of that wisdom which belongs to them, yet the Spirit of God, who ended what he wrote, carried him, as David often, to such expressions as could agree to no other than the Son of God, and would lead us into the knowledge of great things concerning him. All divine revelation is the revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave unto him, and here we are told who and what he is, as God, designed in the eternal councils to be the Mediator between God and man. The best exposition of these verses we have in the four first verses of St. John's gospel; In the beginning was the Word, &c.

Concerning the Son of God, observe here,

1. His personality, and distinct subsistence; one with the Father, and of the same essence, and yet a person of himself, whom the Lord possessed, (v. 22.) was set up, (v. 23.) was brought forth, (v. 24, 25.) was by him, (v. 30.) for he was the express Image of his person, Heb. i. 3.

2. His eternity; he was begotten of the Father, for the Lord possessed him, as his own Son, laid him in his bosom; he was brought forth as the only-begotten of the Father, and this, before all worlds; which is most largely insisted upon here. The Word was eternal, and had a being before the world, before the beginning of time; and therefore it must follow, that it was from eternity. The Lord possessed him in the beginning of his way, of his eternal councils, for those were before his works; this way, indeed, had no beginning, for God's purposes in himself are eternal like himself, but God speaks to us in our own language. Wisdom explains her self; (v. 23.) I was set up from everlasting. The Son of God was, in the eternal councils of God, designated and appointed to be the Wisdom and Power of the Father, Light and Life, in the creation and in the redemption of the world.

That he was brought forth as to his being, and set up as to the divine councils concerning his office, before the world was made, is here set forth in a great variety of expressions, much the same with those by which the eternity of God himself is expressed, Ps. xc. 2. Before the mountains were brought forth, (1.) Before the earth was, and that was made in the beginning, before man was made; therefore the second Adam had a being before the first, for the first Adam was made of the earth, the second had a being before the earth, and therefore is not of the earth, John iii. 31. (2.) Before the sea was; (v. 24.) when there were no depths in which the waters were gathered together, no fountains from which those waters might arise, none of that deep on which the Spirit of God moved for the production of the earth; everlasti g fore the mountains were, the everlasting mountains, v. 25. Eliphaz, to convince Job of his inability to judge of the divine counsels, asks him, (Job xv. 7.) Was thou made before the hills? No, thou wast not; but before the hills was the eternal Word brought forth. (4.) Before the habitable parts of the world, which men cultivate, and reap the profits of, (v. 26.) the fields in the valleys and plains, to which the mountains are opposed, and which constitute the chief part of the dust of the world; the first part of the dust, so some; the atoms which compose the several parts of the world; the chief or principal part of the dust, so it may be read, and understood of man, who was made of the dust of the ground, and is dust, but is the principal part of the dust, dust enlivened, dust refined. The eternal Word had a being before man was made, for in him was the life of men.

His agency in making the world, He not only had a being before the world, he was present, not as a spectator, but as the Architect, when the world was made. God puzzled and humbled Job, by asking him, "Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? Who hath laid the measures thereof? (Job xxxviii. 4, 8.) Wast thou that eternal Word and Wisdom, which was the prime Manager of that great affair? No; thou art of yesterday." But here the Son of God, referring, as it should seem, to the discourse God had with Job, declares himself to have been engaged in that which Job could not pretend to be a witness of, and a worker in, the creation of the world. By him God made the worlds, Eph. iii. 9. Heb. i. 2. Col. i. 16. (1.) When, on the first day of the creation, in the very beginning of time, God bespoke the light, and with a word produced it, this eternal Wisdom was that almighty Word; Then I was there, when he prepared the heavens, the foundations of the earth, whatever it is here, is there substantial. (2.) He was no less active, when, on the second day, he stretched out the firmament, the vast expanse, and set that as a compass upon the face of the depth, (v. 27.) surrounded it on all sides with that canopy, that curtain. Or, it may refer to the exact order and method with which God framed all the parts of the universe, as the workman marks out his work with his line and compasses. The work in nothing varied from the plan of it formed in the eternal mind. (3.) He was also employed in the third day's work, when the waters above the heavens were gathered together by establishing the clouds above, and those under the heavens by strengthening the fountains of the deep, which send forth those waters, (v. 26.) and by preserving the bounds of the sea, which is the receptacle of those waters, (v. 29.) This speaks much the high praise due to Wisdom for this. But first and next God proves himself a God greatly to be feared, (Jer. v. 22.) that he has placed the sand for the bound of the sea, that the dry land might continue to appear above water, fit to be a habitation for man; and thus he has appointed the foundation of the earth. How able, how fit, is the Son of God to be the Saviour of the world, who was the Creator of it!

4. The infinite complacency which the Father had in the Father the Son, is declared by the following words: (v. 30.) I was by him, as one brought up with him. As by an eternal generation he was brought forth of the Father, so by an eternal council he was brought up with him; which intimates, not only the infinite love of the Father to the Son, who is therefore called the Son of his love, (Col. i. 13.) but the mutual conscious- ness and good understanding that were between them, concerning the work of man's redemption, which the Son was to undertake and accomplish when the council of peace was between them both, Zech. vi. 13. He was alumnus Patris—the Father's pupil, as I may say, trained up from eternity for that service which, in time, in the fulness of time, he was to go forth with, and is now taken under the special tuition and protection of the Father; he is my Servant whom I uphold, Isa. xlii. 1. He did what he saw the Father do, (John v. 19.) pleased his Father, sought his glory, did according to the common method of all great persons, and all this as one brought up with him. He was daily his Father's Delight, (mine Elect, in whom my soul delighteth,) says God; Isa. xlii. 1, and he also rejoiced always before him. This may be understood, either, (1.) Of the infinite delight which the persons of the blessed Trinity have in each other, wherein consists much of the happiness of the divine nature. Or, (2.) Of the pleasure which the Father took in the operations of the Son, when he made the world; God saw every thing that the Son made, and, behold, it was very good, it pleased him, and therefore his Son was daily, day by day, during the six days of the creation, upon that account, his Delight; Exod. xxxix. 43. And the Son also did himself rejoice before him in the beauty and harmony of the whole creation, Ps. civ. 31. Or, (3.) Of the satisfaction they had in each other, with reference to the great work of man's redemption. The Father delighted in the Son, as Mediator between him and man, was well pleased with what he proposed, (Matth. iii. 17.) and therefore loved him, because he undertook to lay down his life for the sheep; he put a confidence in him, that he would go through his work, and not fail or fly off. The Son also rejoiced always before him, delighted to do his will, (Ps. xi. 8.) stuck close to his undertaking, as one that was well satisfied in it, and, when it came to the setting to, expressed as much satisfaction in it as ever, saying, Lo, I come, to do as in the volume of the book it is written of me.

5. The gracious concern he had for mankind, v. 31. Wisdom rejoiced, not so much in the rich products of the earth, or the treasures hid in the bowels of it, as in the habitable parts of it, for her delights were with the sons of men; not only in the creation of man is it spoken with a peculiar air of pleasure, (Gen i. 26.) But let us make man, but in the redemption and salvation of man. The Son of God was ordained, before the world, to that great work, 1 Pet. i. 20. A remnant of the sons of men were given him to be brought, through his grace, to his glory, and those were they in whom his delights were: his church was the habitable part of his earth, made habitable for him, that the Lord God might dwell even among them that had been rebellious; and this he rejoiced in, in the prospect of seeing his seed. Though he foresaw all the difficulties he was to meet with in his work, the services and sufferings he was to go through, yet, because it would be sue in the glory of his Father, and the salvation of these sons of men that were given him, he locked forward upon it with the greatest satisfaction imaginable, in which we have all the encouragement we can desire to come to him, and rely upon him for all the benefits designed us by his glorious undertaking.

32. Now, therefore, hearken unto me, O ye children: for blessed are they that keep my ways. 33. Hear instruction, and be wise, and refuse it not. 34. Blessed is the man that heareth me, watching daily at my gates, waiting at the posts of my doors. 35. For whoso findeth me findeth life, and shall obtain favour of the Lord. 36. But he that sittETH against me worketh against his own soul: all they that hate me love death.

We have here the application of Wisdom's discourse; the design and tendency of it, is, to bring us all into an entire subjection to the laws of religion, to make us wise and good; not to fill our heads with speculations, or our tongue with disputes, but to rectify what is amiss in our hearts and lives. In order to this, here is,

1. An exhortation to hear and obey the voice of Wisdom, to attend and comply with the good instructions that the word of God gives us, and in them to discern the voice of Christ, as the sheep know the shepherd's voice.

1. We must be diligent hearers of the word; for how can we believe in him of whom we have not heard? "Hearken unto me, O ye children," (v. 32.) "read the word written, sit under the word preached, bless God therefore, and your hearts be speaking to you." Let children in age hearken, for it is their learning age; and what they hearken to then, it is likely, they will be so seasoned by, as to be governed by all their days. Let children in relation hearken to God as their Father, to Wisdom as their mother, to whom they ought to be in subjection and live; let Wisdom's children justify Wisdom by hearkening to her, and show themselves to be indeed her children.

We must hear Wisdom's words, (1.) Submissively, and with a willing heart; (v. 33.) "Hear instruction, and refuse it not, either as that which you need not, or as that which you like not; it is offered you as a kindness, and it is at your peril if you refuse it." They that reject the counsel of God, reject it against themselves, Luke vii. 30. "Refuse it not now, lest you have not another offer." (2.) Constantly, and with an attentive ear: We must hear Wisdom so as to watch daily at her gates, as beggars to receive an alms, as clients and patients to receive advice, and to wait as servants, with humility, and patience, and ready observance, at the posts of her doors. See here what a good house Wisdom keeps, for every day is dole-day; what a good school, for every day is lecture-day. While we have God's works before our eyes, and his word in our hand, we may be every day hearing instruction from him, and learning instruction from her. See here what a dutiful and diligent attendance is required of all Christ's disciples; they must watch at his gates. [1.] We must lay hold upon all opportunities of getting knowledge and grace, and must get into, and keep
CHAP. IX.

Christ and sin are rivals for the soul of man, and here we are told how they both make their court to it, to have the innermost and permest place in it. The design of this representation is to prevent before it is too late, the just judgment of God, to prevent misconduct, to guard against sin and evil; and there needs no more than a fair stating of the case, to determine us which of those to choose, and surrender our hearts to. They are both brought in, making entertainment for the soul, and inviting it to accept of the entertainment; concerning both we are told what the issue will be; and the matter being thus laid before us, let us consider, take advice, and speak our minds. And we are therefore to be on our guard against sin, against our own souls, because we see there is such striving for them.

1. Christ, under the name of Wisdom, invites us to accept of his entertainment, and so to enter into acquaintance and communion with him, v. 1., 2. And having foretold the different success of his invitation, v. 7., 9., he shows, in short, what he requires from us, v. 10., and what he designs for us, v. 11. and then leaves it to our choice what we will do, v. 12. II. Sin, under the character of a foolish woman, courts us to accept of her entertainment, and v. 13., 16. pretends it is very charming, v. 17. But Solomon tells what the reckoning will be, v. 18. And now choose you, this day, whom you will choose with.

1. WISDOM hath built her house, she hath hewn out her seven pillars: 2. She hath killed her beasts: she hath mingled her wine; she hath also furnished her table: 3. She hath sent forth her maidsens: she crieth upon the highest places of the city. 4. Whoso is simple, let him turn in hither: as for him that wanteth understanding, she saith to him, 5. Come, eat of my bread, and drink of the wine which I have mingled. 6. Forsake the foolish, and live; and go in the way of understanding. 7. He that reprouveth a scorner geteth to himself shame; and he that rebuketh a wicked man geteth himself a blot. 8. Reprove not a scorner, lest he hate thee: rebuke a wise man, and he will love thee. 9. Give instruction to a wise man, and he will be yet wiser; teach a just man, and he will increase in learning. 10. The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom; and the knowledge of the Holy is understanding. 11. For by me thy days shall be multiplied, and the years of thy life shall be increased. 12. If thou be wise, thou shalt be wise for thyself; but if thou scornest, thou alone shalt bear it.

Wisdom is here introduced as a magnificent Queen, very great and very generous; that Word of God is this Wisdom, in which God makes known his good-will toward men; God the Word is this Wisdom, to whom the Father has committed all judgment. He who, for the chapter before, bestowed his splendour and glory, as the Creator of the world, here shows his grace and goodness, as the Redeemer of it. The word is plural, to Wisdom; for in Christ are hid treasures of wisdom, and in his undertaking appears the manifold Wisdom of God in a mystery. Now, observe here,

1. The rich provision which Wisdom has made for the reception of all those that will be his disciples. This is represented under the similitude of a sumptuous feast, whence, it is probable, our Saviour borrowed those parables, in which he compares, the kingdom of heaven to a great supper, Matth. xxii.
2. Luke xiv. 16. And so it was prophesied of, Isa. xxv. 6. It is such a feast as Ahasuerus made to show the riches of his glorious kingdom. The grace of God is a feast; and he who is set before the throne of the Lord’s supper. To bid her guests welcome.

1. Here is a stately palace provided, v. 1. Wisdom, not finding a house capacious enough for all her guests, has built one on purpose, and, both to strengthen it, and to beautify it, she has hevn out her seven pillars, which make it to be very firm, and look very great. Heaven is the house which Wisdom has built to entertain all her guests that are called to the marriage supper of the Lamb. That is her Father’s house, where there are many mansions, and whither she is gone to prepare places for us. She has hanged the earth upon nothing, therefore in it we have no continuing city; but heaven is a city that has foundations, his pillars. The church is Wisdom’s house, to which she invites her guests, supported by the power and promise of God, as by seven pillars. Probably, Solomon refers to the temple which he himself had lately built for the service of religion, and to which he would persuade people to resort, both to worship God, and to receive the instructions of Wisdom. Some reckon the schools of the prophets to be here intended.

2. Here is a splendid feast got ready; (v. 2.) She has killed her beasts, she has mingled her wine; plenty of meat and drink is provided, and all of the best. She has killed her sacrifice, so the word is; it is a sumptuous, but a sacred, feast, a feast upon a sacrifice. Wisdom has fitted up herself a Sacrifice for us, and it is his flesh that is meat indeed, and his blood that is drink indeed. The Lord’s supper is a feast of reconciliation and joy upon the sacrifice of atonement. The wine is mingled with something richer than itself, to give it more than ordinary spirit and flavour. She has completely furnished her table with all the satisfactions that a soul can desire; righteousness and grace, peace and joy, the assurance of God’s love, the consolations of the Spirit, and all the pledges and covenants of eternal life. Observe, It is all Wisdom’s own doings; she has killed the beasts, she has mingled the wine; which denotes both the love of Christ, who makes the provision, (he does not leave it to others, but takes the doing of it into his own hands,) and the excellency of the preparation. That must needs be exactly fitted to answer the end, which Wisdom herself has the fitting up of.

II. The gracious invitation she has given, not to some particular friends, but to all in general, to come and take part of these provisions. 1. She employs her servants to invite round about in the country; she has sent forth her maidens, v. 3. The ministers of the gospel are commissioned and commanded to give notice of the preparations which God has made, in the everlasting covenant, for all those that are willing to come up to the terms of it; and they, with maiden purity, not corrupting themselves, nor the sons of the congregation of the Lord, in the exercises of orders, are to call upon all they meet with even in the high-ways and hedges, to come and feast with Wisdom, for all things are now ready, Luke xiv. 23. 2. She herself cries upon the highest places of the city, as one earnestly desirous of the welfare of the children of men, and grieved to see them rejecting their own mercies for lying vanities. Our Lord Jesus was himself the Publisher of his last will, when he had sent forth his disciples, he followed them, and finalled to them, and said, “The day began to bespoken by the Lord, Heb. ii. 3. He stood, and cried, Come unto me.” We see who invites; now let us observe, (1.) To whom the invitation is given; Whoso is simple, and wants understanding, v. 4. If we were to make an entertainment, of all people we should not care for much less court, the company of such, but rather of philosophers and learned men, that we might hear their wisdom, and whose table-talk would be improving. Have I need of maid-men? But the Wise Woman AND WISDOM is such, that all who are willing to give is what they most need, and it is their welfare that she consults, and aims at, in the preparation and invitation. He that is simple is invited, that he may be made wise; and he that wants a heart, so the word is, let him come hither, and he shall have one. Her preparations are rather physic than food, designed for the most valuable and desirable cure, that of the mind. Whosoever he be, the invitation is general, and excludes none that do not exclude themselves, if they have the heart. Yet [1.] They shall be welcome. [2.] They may be helped, they shall neither be despised nor despairs of. Our Saviour came, not to call the righteous, but sinners; not the wise in their own eyes, who say they see, (John ix. 41.) but the simple, those who are sensible of their simplicity, and ashamed of it, and him that is willing to become a fool, that he may be wise. 1. Cor. iii. 18.

(2.) What the invitation is. [1.] We are invited to Wisdom’s house; Turn in hither. I say we are, for which of us is there that must not own the character of the invited, that are simple, and want understanding? Wisdom’s doors stand open to such, and she is desirous to have some conversation with them, one word for their own good, nor has she any other design upon them. [2.] We are invited to her table; (v. 5.) Come, eat of my bread, taste of the true portions that are, to be found in the knowledge and fear of God. By faith act on the promises of the gospel, applying them to ourselves, and taking the comfort of them, we feed, we feast, upon the provisions Christ has made for poor souls. What we eat and drink we make our own, and are nourished and refreshed by it, and so are our souls by the word of God; it has that in it that is meat and drink to those that understand themselves.

(3.) What is required of those that may have the benefit of this invitation, v. 6. [1.] They must break off from all bad company; “Forsake the foolish, converse not with them, conform not to their ways, have no fellowship with the works of darkness, or with those that deal in such works.” The first step toward virtue, is, to shun vice, and therefore to shun the vicious; Depart from me, ye evil doers. [2.] They must awake and arise from the dead; they must live, not in pleasure, (for those that so live, do live,) but in the service of God; for these only that do so live indeed, live to some purpose. “Live not a mere animal-life, as brutes, but now, at length, live the life of men. Live, and you shall live; live spiritually, and you shall live eternally,” Eph. v. 14. [3.] They must choose the paths of Wisdom, and keep to them; “Go in the way of understanding; govern thyself hence-forward by the rules of religion and right reason.” It is not enough to extend these blessings, but we must go to ourselves with those that walk in wisdom, and walk in the same spirit and steps.

III. The instructions which Wisdom gives to the maidens she sends to invite, to the ministers and others, who in their places are endeavouring to serve her interests and designs. She tells them, 1. What their work must be; not only to tell in general what preparation is made for souls, and to give a general offer of it, but they must apply the particular portions of the King’s parables, and of their faults, to revolve, rebuke, v. 7. 8. They must instruct them how to amend, teach, v. 9. The word of God is intended, and therefore so is the ministry of that word, for reproof, for correction, and for instruction in righteousness. 2. What different sorts of persons they would meet with, and what course they must take with them, and what success they might expect.
(1.) They would meet with some scorers and wicked men, who would mock the messengers of the Lord, and misuse them, would laugh them to scorn, that invite them; and this fears them, as they did, 2 Chron. xxx. 10. would treat them spitefully, Matth. xxii. 6. And though they are not forbidden to invite those simple ones to Wisdom's house, yet they are advised not to pursue the invitation, by reproving and rebuking them; Reprove not a scorner, cast not these pearls before swine, Matth. vii. 6. Thus Christ said of the Pharisees, Let them alone, Matth. xv. 14. Do not reproach those, 1. [3.] "In justice to them, for they have forfeited the favour of further means, who scorn the means they have had." They that are thus filthy, let them be filthy still; that are joined to idols, let them alone; to, we turn to the Gentiles. 2. [2.] "In prudence to yourselves; because, if you reprove them," First, "You lose your labour, and so get to yourselves shame for the disappointment." Second, "You exasperate them; do it ever so wisely and tenderly, if you do it faithfully, they will hate you, they will load you with reproaches, and say all the ill they can of you, and so you will get a blot; therefore you had better not meddle with them, for your reproves will be likely to do more hurt than good." (2.) They would meet with others who are wise, and good, and just; thanks be to God, all are not scorers. We meet with some who are so wise for themselves, so just to themselves, as to be willing and glad to be taught; and, with whom we meet with such, 1. [1.] If there be occasion, we must reprove them; for wise men are not so perfectly wise, but there is in that which needs a reproof; and we must not connive at any man's faults, because we have a veneration for his wisdom; nor must a wise man think that his wisdom exculpates him from reproof, when he says or does any thing foolishly; but, the more wisdom a man has, the more desirous he should be to have his weaknesses showed him, because a little folly is a great blemish to him that is in reputation for wisdom and honour. [2.] With our reproves we must give them instruction, and must teach them, v. 9. [3.] We may expect that it will be taken as a kindness, Ps. cxli. 5. A wise man will reckon those his friends who deal faithfully with him; "Rebuke such a one, and he will love thee for thy plain dealing, will thank thee, and desire thee to do him the same good turn another time, if God be pleased to give him an opportunity; for great an instance of wisdom to take a reproof well, as to give it well. [4.] Being taken well, it will do good, and answer the intention. A wise man will be made wiser by the reproves and instructions that are given him; he will increase in learning, will grow in knowledge, and so grow in grace. None must think themselves too wise to learn, or so good that they need not be better, and therefore need not be taught. We must study to grow in wisdom, and this will come to the perfect man. Give to a wise man, so it is in the original, give him advice, give him reproof, give him comfort, and he will be yet wiser; give him occasion, so the Seventy, occasion to show his wisdom, and he will show it, and the acts of wisdom will strengthen the habits. IV. The instructions she gives to those that are invited, which her maidens must inculcate upon them. 1. Let them know wherein true wisdom consists, and what will be their entertainment at Wisdom's table, v. 10. (1.) The heart must be principled with the fear of God, that is the beginning of wisdom. A reverence of God's majesty, and a dread of his wrath, is that fear of him which is the beginning, the first step toward true religion, whence all other instances of it take rise. This fear may, at first, have torment, but love will, by degrees, cast out the the torment of it. (2.) The head must be filled with the knowledge of the things of God. The knowledge of holy things (the word is plural) is understanding; the things pertaining to the service of God, (these are many;) and it is certain to our own sanctification; reproof is called that which is holy, Matth. vii. 6. Or the knowledge which holy men have, which was taught by the holy prophets, of those things which holy men spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost; this is understanding, it is the best and most useful understanding, will stand us in most stead, and turn to the best account have we become by it.

2. Let them know what will be the advantages of this wisdom; (v. 11.) "By me thy days shall be multiplied." It will contribute to the health of thy body, and so the years of thy life on earth shall be increased, while men's folly and intemperance shorten their days. It will bring thee to heaven, and there thy days shall be multiplied in infinitum—to infinity, and the years of thy life shall be increased without end." There is no true wisdom but in the way of religion, and no true life but in the end of that way.

3. Let them know what will be the consequence of their choosing, or refusing, this fair offer, v. 12. Here is, (1.) The happiness of those that embrace it; "If thou be wise, thou shalt be wise for thyself, thou wilt be the gainer by it, not Wisdom." A man cannot be profitable to God; it is to our own good that we are thus courted: "Thou wilt not leave the gain to others," (as we do our worldly wealth when we die, which is therefore called another man's, Luke xvi. 12. "but thou shalt carry it with thee into another world." Those that are wise for their souls, are wise for themselves, for the soul is the man; nor do any consult their own true interest, but those that are truly religious. This recommends us to God, and recovers us from that which is our folly and degeneracy; it employs us in that which is most beneficinal in this world, and entitles us to that which is much more so in the world to come. (2.) The shame and ruin of those that slight it; "If thou scorner Wisdom's preacher, thou alone shall bear it." [1.] "Thou shalt bear the blame of it;" those that are good must thank God, but those that are wicked may thank themselves. It is not owing to God, he is not the Author of sin; Satan can only tempt, he cannot force; and wicked companions are but his instruments; so that all the fault must lie on the sinner himself. [2.] "If thou shalt prophesy, and lose of that which thou receivest;" think not to take thine own destruction, thy blood will be upon thine own head, and the consideration of this will aggravate thy condemnation. Son, remember that thou hast this fair offer made thee, and thou wouldst not accept of it; thou stoodest fair for life, but didst choose death rather.

13. A foolish woman is clamorous; she is simple, and knoweth nothing. 14. For she sitteth at the door of her house, on a seat in the high places of the city. 15. To call passengers who go right on their ways; 16. Whoso is simple, let him turn in hither: and as for him that wanteth understanding, she saith to him, 17. Stolen waters are sweet, and bread eaten in secret is pleasant. 18. But he knoweth not that the dead are there; and that her guests are in the depths of hell.

We have heard what Christ has to say, to engage our affections to God and godliness, and one would think the whole world should go after him; but here we are told how industrious the tempter is to seduce unwary souls into the paths of sin, and with the next he gains his point, and Wisdom's courtship is not effectual. Now observe,

1. Who is the tempter, a foolish woman? Folly herself, in opposition to Wisdom. Carnal, sensual pleasure, I take to be especially meant by this foolish woman; (v. 13.) for that is the great enemy to virtue, and inlet to vice; that defiles and debauches the mind, stoppeth conscience, and puts out the sparks of triumph that shall overwhelm her. Curiusher is here described to be, (1.) Very ignorant; she is simple, and knows nothing, she has no sufficient, solid, reason to offer; where she gets dominion in a soul, she works out all the knowledge of holy things, they are lost and forgotten. Whoredom, and wine, and new wine, take away the heart, they besot men, and make fools of them. (2.) Very importunate. The less she has to offer, that is rational, the more violent and pressing she is in this. This woman is; (1.) clamorous and noisy, (v. 13.) continually haunting young people with her enticements. She sits at the door of her house, (v. 14.) watching for a prey; not as Abraham at his tent-door, seeking an opportunity to do good. She sits on a seat, (on a throne, so the word signifies) in the high places of the city, as if she had authority to give law; and we were all debtors to the flesh, to live after the flesh; and as if she had respect of the places of the high places of the city; and, perhaps, she gains upon many, more by pretending to be fashionable, than by pretending to be agreeable. Do not all persons of rank and figure in the world, (says she) give themselves a greater liberty than the strict laws of virtue allow; and why shouldst thou humble thyself so far as to be cramped by them? Thus the tempter affects to seem both kind and great.

2. Who are the more young people that have been well educated; these she will triumph most in being the ruin of. Observe, (1.) What their real character is; they are passengers that go right on their ways, (v. 15.) that have been trained up in the paths of religion and virtue, and set out very hopefully and well; that seem determined and designed for good, and are not (as that young man, ch. vii. 8.) going the way to her house. Such as these has a design upon, and lays snares for, and uses them to perversion, and will not look to the end of the highway to hell, and at the brink of it, but they are already in the depths of hell, under the power of sin, led captive by Satan at his will; sometimes lashed by the terrors of their own consciences, which are a hell upon earth. The depths of Satan are the depths of hell; remorseless sin is remedyless ruin, it is the bottomless pit always. Thus does Solomon show the hook; those that believe him will not meddle with the bait.

CHAP. X.

Hitherto we have been in the porch or preface to the Proverbs, here they begin; they are short, but weighty, sentences; most of them are distichs, two sentences in one verse, illustrating each other; but it is seldom that there is any coherence between the verses, much less any thread of discourse; and therefore in these chapters we need not attempt to reduce the contents to their proper heads, the several sentences will appear best in their own places. The scope of them all, is, to set before us good and evil, the blessing and the curse. Many of the proverbs in this chapter relate to the good government of the tongue, without which men's religion is vain.

1. The proverbs of Solomon. A wise son maketh a glad father; but a foolish son is the heaviness of his mother.

Solomon, speaking to us as unto children, observes here how much the comfort of parents, natural, political, and ecclesiastical, depends upon the good behaviour of those under their charge, as a reason. 1. Why parents should be careful to give their children a good education, and to train them up in the ways of religion, which, if it obtain the desired effect, they themselves will have the comfort of it, or, if not, they will have for their support under their heaviness, that they have done their endeavours. 2. Why children should conduct themselves wisely and well, and live up to their good education, that they may rejoice the hearts of their parents, and not sadden them. Observe, (1.) It adds to the comfort of young people that are pious and discreet, that thereby they do something toward recompensing their parents for all the care and pains they have taken with them, and occasion pleasure to them in the evil days of old age, which they most need it. It is the duty of parents to rejoice in their children's wisdom and well-doing, yes, though it arrive at such an eminency as to eclipse
2. Treasures of wickedness profit nothing; but righteousness delivereth from death.

3. The Lord will not suffer the soul of the righteous to famish: but he casteth away the substance of the wicked.

These two verses speak to the same point, and the latter may be the reason of the former.
1. That wealth which a man unjustly will do them no good, because God will blast it; Treasures of wickedness profit nothing, (v. 2.) the treasures of wicked people; much less the treasure which they have made themselves masters of by any wicked arts, by oppression or fraud; though it be ever so much, as a treasure, and laid up ever so safe, though it be hid treasure, yet it profits nothing; when profit and loss come to be balanced, the profit gained by the treasures will by no means countervail the less sustained by the wickedness. Matth. xvi. 26.  {

2. That which is honestly got will turn to a good account, for God will bless it. Righteousness delivers from death, that is, wealth gained, and kept, and used in a right manner; (righteousness signifies both honesty and charity;) it answers the end of wealth, which is to keep a family, and be a defence to us; and delivers from those judgments which men bring upon themselves by their wickedness; it will profit to that degree, as to deliver, though not from the stroke of death, yet from the sting of it, and consequently from the terror of it. For the Lord will not suffer the soul of the righteous to famish. (v. 3.) and so their righteousness delivers from death, purely by the favour of God to them, which is their life and livelihood, and which will keep them alive in famine. The soul of the righteous shall be kept alive by the word of God, and faith in his promise, when young lions shall lack, and suffer hunger.

We are here told, 1. Who they are, who, though rich, are in a fair way to become poor; those who deal with a slack hand, who are careless and remiss in their business, and never mind which end goes foremost, nor ever set their hands vigorously to their work, or stick to it; who deal with a deceitful hand, so it may be read; those who think to enrich themselves by fraud and tricking, will, in the end, impoverish themselves, not only by the ends of God they have, but by forfeiting their reputation with men; none will care to deal with those who deal with slight of hand, and are honest only with looking to. 2. Who they are, who, though poor, are in a fair way to become rich; those who are diligent, and honest, who are careful about their affairs, and what their hands find to do, do it with all their might, in a fair and honourable way, these are likely to increase what they have. The hand of the acute, so some; of those who are sharp, but not sharpeners; the hand of the active, so others; the stirring hand gets a penny. This is true in the affairs of our souls, as well as in our worldly affairs; slothfulness and hypocrisy lead to spiritual poverty, but those who are fervent in spirit, serving the Lord, are likely to be rich in faith, and rich in good works.

5. He that gathereth in summer is a wise son: but he that sleepeth in harvest is a son that causeth shame.

Here is, 1. The just praise of those who improve the opportunities, who take pains to gather and increase what they have, both for soul and body, who provide for hereafter, while provision is to be made, who gather in summer, which is gathering time; he who does so is a wise son, and it is his honour; he acts wisely for his parents, whom, if there be occasion, he ought to maintain, and he gives reputation to himself, his family, and his education.

2. The just reproach and blame of those who trifle away these opportunities; He who sleepeth, loves sloth, and is not diligent, trivelle away his time, and neglects his work, especially who sleepeth in harvest, when he should be laying in for the winter, who lets slip the season of furnishing himself with that which he will have occasion for, he is a son that causes shame; for he is a foolish son, he prepares shame for himself when winter comes, and reflects shame upon all his friends. He who gets knowledge and wisdom in the days of his youth, gathers in summer, and he will have the comfort and credit of it; but he who idles away the days of his youth, will bear the name of it when he is old.

6. Blessings are upon the head of the just: but violence covereth the mouth of the wicked.

Here is, 1. The head of the just crowned with blessings; with the blessings both of God and man; variety of blessings, abundance of blessings, shall descend from above, and visibly abide on the head of good men; real blessings; they shall not only be spoken well of, but done well to. Blessings shall be on their head as a coronet to adorn and dignify them, as a watchman's helmet to protect and secure.

2. The mouth of the wicked covered with violence; their mouths shall be stopt with shame for the violence which they have done; they shall not have a word to say in excuse for themselves; (Job v. 16.) their breath shall be stopt with the violence that shall be done to them, when their violent dealings shall return on their heads, shall be returned to their teeth.

7. The memory of the just is blessed: but the name of the wicked shall rot.

Both the just and the wicked, when their days are fulfilled, must die; between their bodies, in the grave, there is no visible difference; between the souls of the one and the other, in the world of spirits, there is a vast difference; and so there is, or ought to be, between their memories that survive them.

1. Good men are, and ought to be, well spoken of when they are gone; it is one of the blessings that comes upon the head of the just, even when their head is laid. Blessed men leave behind them blessed memories. (1.) It is part of the dignity of the saints, especially those who excel in virtue, and are eminently useful, that they are remembered with respect when they are dead; their good name, their name with good men, for good things, is then
1. That men's dishonesty will be their shame; He that perverts his way, that turns aside into crooked paths, that dissuades with God and man, turns one way and rows another, though he may for a time disguise himself, and pass current, he shall be known to be what he is; it is a thousand to one but some time or other he betrays himself; however, God will discover him in the great day. He that perverts his ways, document evil—shall be made an example of, for warning to others; so some.

10. He that winketh with the eye causeth sorrow; but a prating fool shall fall.

Mischief is here said to attend,

1. Politic, designing, self-disguising, sinners; He that winketh with the eye, as if he took no notice of you, when, at the same time, he is watching an opportunity to do you an ill turn; that makes signs to his accomplices when to come in to assist him in executing his wicked projects, which are all carried on by trick and artifice; he causes sorrow, both to others and to himself. Ingenuity will be no excuse for iniquity, but the sinner must either repent, or do worse; for, as Solomon saith, the prating fool, or as he is called, the babbling fool, is the dog that bites not always the dog that barks.

11. The mouth of a righteous man is a well of life: but violence covereth the mouth of the wicked.

See here, 1. How industrious a good man is, by communicating his goodness, to do good with it; His mouth, the outlet of his mind, is a well of life, it is a constant spring, whence issues good discourse for the edification of others, like streams that water the ground and make it fruitful, and for their consolation, like streams that quench the thirst of the weary traveller. It is like a well of life that is pure and clean, not only not poisoned, but not muddied, with any corrupt communication.

2. He that is a prating fool, that is, by concealing his badness, to do hurt with it; The mouth of the wicked covers violence; disguises the designed mischief with professions of friendship, that it may be carried on the more securely and effectually; as Joab kissed and killed, Judas kissed and betrayed; this is his sin to which the punishment answers; (v. 6.) Violence covers the mouth of the wicked; what he got by violence, shall by violence be taken from him, Job v. 4, 5.

12. Hatred stirreth up strife; but love covereth all sins.

Here is, 1. The great mischief-maker, and that is malice; Even where there is no manifest occasion of strife, yet hatred seeks occasion, and so stirreth it up, and does the devil's work. Those are the most spiteful, ill-natured people that can be, who take a pleasure in setting their neighbours together by the ears, by tale-bearing, evil surmisings, and misrepresentations; blowing up the sparks of contention, which has lain buried, into a flame, at which, with an unaccountable pleasure, they warm their hands.

2. The great peace-maker, and that is love, which covers all sins, the offences among relations, which occasion discord; Love, instead of proclaiming and aggravating the offence, conceals and extenuates it as far as it is capable of being concealed and extenuated. Love will excuse the offence which we give through mistake, and unadvisedly, when we are able to say that there was no ill intended, but it...
13. In the lips of him that hath understanding wisdom is found: but a rod is for the back of him that is void of understanding.

Observe, 1. Wisdom and grace are the honour of good men; He that has understanding, that good understanding which they have that do the commandments, wisdom is found in his life, it is discovered to be there, and, consequently, that he has within a good treasure of it, and it is derived thence for the benefit of others. It is a man’s honour to have wisdom, but much more to be instrumental to make others wise. 2. Folly and sin are the shame of bad men; A rod is for the back of him that wants a heart; he exposes himself to the lashes of his own conscience, to the scourges of the tongue, to the censures of the magistrate, and to the righteous judgments of God. They that foolishly and wilfully go on in their wicked ways are preparing vials for themselves, the marks of which will be their perpetual disgrace.

14. Wise men lay up knowledge: but the mouth of the foolish is near destruction.

Observe, 1. It is the wisdom of the wise that they treasure up a stock of useful knowledge, which will be their preservation; Wisdom is therefore found in their lives. (v. 13.) because it is laid up in their hearts; out of which store, like the good householder, they bring things new and old. Whatever knowledge may be at any time useful to us, we must lay it up, because we know not but some time or other we may have occasion for it. We must continue laying up as long as we live; and be sure to lay it up safe, that it may not be to seek when we want it.

2. It is the folly of fools that they lay up mischief in their hearts, which is ready to them in all they say, and works terror and destruction both to others and to themselves. They love devouring words, (Ps. lxi. 4.) and these come uppermost; their mouth is near destruction, having the sharp arrows of bitter words always at hand, to throw about.

15. The rich man’s wealth is his strong city; the destruction of the poor is their poverty.

This may be taken two ways: 1. As a reason why we should be diligent in our business, that we may avoid that sinking, dispiriting uneasiness which attends poverty, and may enjoy the benefit and comfort which they have that are beforehand in the world. Taking pains is really the way to make ourselves and our families easy. Or, rather, 2. As a representation of the common mistakes both of rich and poor, concerning their outward condition.

(1.) Rich people think themselves happy because they are rich; but it is their mistake; The rich man’s wealth is, in his own conceit, his strong city, whereas the worst of evils it is too weak and utterly insufficient to protect them from. It will prove that they are not so safe as they imagine; nay, their wealth may perhaps expose them.

(2.) Poor people think themselves undone because they are poor; but it is their mistake; The destruction of the poor is their poverty; it sinks their spirits, and ruins all their comforts; whereas a man may live very comfortably, though he has but a little to live on, if he be but content, and keep a good conscience, and live by faith.

16. The labour of the righteous tending to life: the fruit of the wicked to sin.

Solomon here confirms what his father had said, (Ps. xxxvii. 16.) A little that a righteous man has is better than the riches of many wicked.

1. Perhaps a righteous man has no more than what he works hard for, he eats only the labour of his hands, but that labor is due to him; he aims at nothing but to get an honest livelihood, covets not to be rich and great, but is willing to live and maintain his family. Nor does it tend only to his own life, but he would enable himself to do good to others; he therefore labours, that he may have to give; (Eph. iv. 28.) all his business turns to some good account or other. Or, it may be meant of his labour in religion; he takes most pains in that which has a tendency to eternal life; he seems to the Spirit, that he may reap life everlasting.

2. Perhaps a wicked man’s wealth is fruit which he did not labour for, but came easily by, but it tends to sin; it makes him the food and fuel of his lusts, his pride, and luxury; he does hurt with it, and not good; he gets hurt by it, and is hardened by it in his wicked ways. The things of this world are good or evil, life or death, as they are used, and as they are that have them.

17. He is in the way of life that keepeth instruction: but he that refuseth reproof is errth.

See here, 1. That those are in the right that do not only receive instruction, but retain it; that do not let it slip through carelessness, as most do, nor let it go to those that would rob them of it; that keep instruction safe, keep it pure and entire, keep it for their own use, that they may govern themselves by it, keep it for the benefit of others, that they may instruct them; they that do so are in the way of life; the way that has true comfort in it, and eternal life at the end of it.

2. That those are in the wrong, that do not only not receive instruction, but wilfully and obstinately refuse it when it is offered them; they will not be taught their duty, because it discovers their faults to them; that instruction which carries reproof in it, they have a particular aversion to, and certainly they cry; it is a sign that they err in judgment, and have false notions of good and evil; it is a cause of their erring in conversation. The traveller that has missed his way, and cannot bear to be told of it, and showed the right way, must needs err still, err endlessly: he certainly misses the way of life.

18. He that hideth hatred with lying lips, and that uttereth a slander, is a fool.

Observe here, malice is folly and wickedness. 1. It is so when it is concealed by flattery and dissimulation; He is a fool, though he may think himself a politician, that hides hatred with lying lips, lest, if it break out, he should be ashamed before men, and he should lose the opportunity of gratifying his malice. Lying lips are bad enough, of themselves, but have a peculiar malignity in them, when they are hid under a cloak of malicefulness. But he is a fool who thinks to hide any thing from God.

2. It is no better when it is vented in spiteful and mischievous language; He that uttereth slander is a fool too, for God will, sooner or later, bring forth that righteousness as the light, which he endeavours
22. The blessing of the Lord, it maketh rich, and he addeth no sorrow with it.

Worldly wealth is that which most men have their hearts very much upon, but they generally mistake both in the nature of the thing they desire, and in the way by which they hope to compass it; we are therefore told here,

1. What that wealth is which is indeed desirable; not having abundance only, but having it, and no sorrow with it; no disquieting care to get and keep it; no vexation of spirit in the enjoyment of it; no tormenting grief for the loss of it; no guilt contracted by the abuse of it. To have it, and to have a heart to take the comfort of it; to do good with it, and to serve God with joyfulness and gladness of heart in the use of it.

2. Whence this desirable wealth is to be expected; not by making ourselves drudges to the world, (Ps. cxxxvi. 2.) but by the blessing of God, that is it that makes rich, and adds no sorrow; what comes from the love of God has the grace of God for its companion, to preserve the soul from these turbulent lusts and passions of which, otherwise, the increase of riches is commonly the incentive. He had said, (v. 4.) The hand of the diligent maketh rich, as a heavy man; and he assigns it to the blessing of the Lord; but that blessing is upon the hand of the diligent. It is thus in spiritual riches. Diligence in getting them is our duty, but God's blessing and grace must have all the glory of that which is acquired, Deut. vii. 17, 18.

23. It is a sport to a fool to do mischief: but a man of understanding hath wisdom.

Here is, 1. Sin exceeding sinful; It is as a lover to a fool to do mischief; it is as natural to him, and as pleasant, as it is to a man to laugh. Wickedness is his Isaac, that is the word here; it is his delight, his happiness, and that in which he pleases himself. He makes a laughing matter of sin. When he is warned not to sin, from the consideration of the law of God, and the revelation of his wrath against sin, he makes a jest of the admonition, and laughs at the shaking of the spear; when he has sinned, instead of sorrowing for it, he boasts of it, ridicules reproofs, and laughs away the convictions of his own conscience, ch. xiv. 2.

2. Wisdom exceeding wise; for it carries along with it the evidence of its own excellency; it may be predicated of itself, and it is encomium enough; you need say no more in praise of a man of understanding than this, He is an understanding man, he has wisdom; he is so wise as not to do mischief, or if he has, through oversight, offended, he is so wise as not to make a jest of it. Or, to bespeak wisdom wise indeed, read it thus; As it is a sport to a fool to do mischief, so it is to a man of understanding to have wisdom, and to show it. Beside the future recompense, a good man has as much present pleasure in the restrictions and exercises of religion, as sinners can pretend to in the liberties and enjoyments of sin; and much more and much better.

24. The fear of the wicked, it shall come upon him: but the desire of the righteous shall be granted. 25. As the whirlwind passeth, so is the wicked no more: but the righteous is an everlasting foundation.

It is here said, and said again, to the righteous, that it shall be well with them, and to the wicked, Woe to them; and these are set the one over against the other, for their mutual illustration.

1. It shall be as ill with the wicked as they can be; and as well with the righteous as they can des.

(1) The wicked, it is true, busy themselves up some times in their wickedness with vain hopes which will deceive them, but at other times they cannot but be haunted with just fears, and these fears shall come upon them; the God they provoke will be every whit as terrible as they, when they are in their greatest delights, apprehend him to be. As is thy fear, so is thy wrath; Ps. xx. 11. Wicked men fear the punishment out of sin, but they have not wisdom to improve their fears by making their escape, and so the thing they feared comes upon them, and their present terrors are earnest of their future torments. (2) The righteous, it is true, sometimes have their fears, but their desire is toward the favour of God and a happiness in him, and that desire shall be granted. According to their faith, not according to their fear, it shall be unto them, Ps. xxxiii. 4.

2. The prosperity of the wicked shall quickly end, but the happiness of the righteous shall never end, v. 25. The wicked make a great noise, hurry themselves and others, like a whirlwind which threatens to bear down all before it; but, like a whirlwind, they are presently gone, and they pass irrecoverably, they are no more; all about them are quiet and glad when the storm is over, Ps. xxxvii. 10, 15. Job, xcv. 5. The righteous, on the contrary, make a show; they lie hid, like a foundation which is low and out of sight, but they are fixed in their resolution to cleave to God, established in virtue, and they shall be an everlasting foundation, immoveably good; he that is holy shall be holy still, and immovably happy; his hope is built on a rock, and therefore not shocked by the storm, Matth. vii.

24. The righteous is the pillar of the world, so some read it; the world stands for their sakes; the holy seed is the substance thereof.

26. As vinegar to the teeth, and as smoke to the eyes, so is the sluggard to them that send him. Observe, 1. Those that are of a slothful disposition, that love their ease, and cannot apply their minds to any business, are not fit to be employed, no not so much as to be sent on an errand, for they will neither deliver a message with any care, nor make any haste back. Such therefore are very unmeet to be ministers, Christ's messengers; he will not send forth of sluggards into his harvest. 2. They that are guilty of so great an oversight as to intrust such with any affair, and put confidence in them, will certainly have vexation with them. A slothful servant is to his master as uneasy and troublesome as vinegar to the teeth, and smoke to the eyes; he provokes his passion, as vinegar sets the teeth on edge, and occasions him grief to see his business neglected and undone, as smoke sets the eyes a weeping.

27. The fear of the Lord prolongeth days: but the years of the wicked shall be shortened. 28. The hope of the righteous shall be gladness: but the expectation of the wicked shall perish.

Observe, 1. Religion lengthens men's lives, and crowns them with life. What makes he that loves life? Let him love fear God, and that will secure him from many things that would prejudice his life, and secure to him life enough in this world, and eternal life in the other; the fear of the Lord will add days more than was expected, will add them endlessly, will prolong them to the days of eternity. What man is he that would see good days? Let him be religious, and then his days shall not only be many, but happy, very happy as well as very many, for the hope of the righteous shall be gladness, they shall have what they hope for, to their unspeakable satisfaction. It is a sweeting future and unseen that they place their happiness in; (Rom. viii. 24, 25.) not what they have in hand, but what they have in hope, and their hope will shortly be swallowed up in fruition, and it will be their everlasting gladness. Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.

2. Wickedness shortens men's lives, and frustrates their hopes; The years of the wicked, that are spent in the pleasures of sin and the drudgery of the world, shall be shortened; Cut down the trees that cumber the ground. And whatever comfort or happiness a wicked man promises himself in this world or the other, he will be frustrated; for the expectation of the wicked shall perish; his hope shall be turned into endless despair.

29. The way of the Lord is strength to the upright; but destruction shall be to the workers of iniquity. 30. The righteous shall never be removed: but the wicked shall not inhabit the earth.

These two verses are to the same purport with those next before, intimating the happiness of the godly and the misery of the wicked; it is necessary that this be inculcated upon us, so loath are we to believe and consider it.

2. Strength and stability are entailed upon integrity; The way of the Lord, the providence of God, the way in which he walks towards us, is strength to the upright, confirms him in his uprightness. All God's dealings with him, merciful and affectionate, serve to quicken him to his duty, and animate him against his discouragements. Or, The way of the Lord, the way of godliness, in which he appoints us to walk, is strength to the upright; the easier we keep to that way, and the more our hearts are encouraged to proceed in it, the better fitted we are both for services and sufferings. A good conscience, kept pure from sin, gives a man boldness in a dangerous time; and constant diligence in duty makes a man's work easy in a busy time; the more we do for God, the more we may do, Job xviii. 9. That joy of the Lord, which is to be found only in the way of the Lord, will be our strength, (Neh. viii. 10.) and therefore the righteousness shall never be removed. Those that have an established virtue, have an established peace and happiness which nothing can rob them of, they have an everlasting foundation, v. 25.

2. Ruin and destruction are the certain consequences of wickedness. The wicked shall not only not inherit the earth, though they lay up their treasure in it, but they shall not so much as inhabit the earth; God's judgments will yet them out; Destruction, swift and sure destruction, shall be to the workers of iniquity; destruction from the presence of the Lord and the glory of his power. Nay, that way of the Lord, which is the strength of the upright, is consumption and terror to the workers of iniquity; the same gospel which to the one is a sa-vour of life unto life, to the other is a savour of death unto death; the same providence, like the same sun, softens the one and hardens the other, Hos. xiv. 9.

31. The mouth of the just bringeth forth wisdom: but the froward tongue shall be cut out. 32. The lips of the righteous know what is acceptable; but the mouth of the wicked speaketh frowardness.

Here, as before, men are judged of, and, accordingly, are justified, or condemned, by their words, Matth. xii. 37.
1. It is both the proof and the praise of a man's wisdom and goodness, that he speaks wisely and well. And in his discourse, brings forth wisdom for the benefit of others. God gives him wisdom as a reward of his righteousness; (Eccl. ii. 25.) and he, in gratitude for that gift, and justice to the Giver, does good with it, and with his wise and pious discourses edifies many. He knows what is acceptable, what discourse will be pleasing to God, (for that is it that he studies more than to oblige the company,) and what will be agreeable both to the speaker and to the hearers, what will become him, and benefit them, and that he will speak.

2. It is the sin, and will be the ruin, of a wicked man, that he speaks wickedly like himself. The mouth of the wicked speaks frowardness, that which is displeasing to God, and provoking to those he converses with; and what becomes of it? Why, the froward tongue shall be cut off, as surely as the flattering one, Ps. xii. 3.

CHAP. XI.

1. A FALSE balance is abomination to the Lord: but a just weight is his delight.

As religion toward God is a branch of universal righteousness, (he is not an honest man that is not devout,) so righteousness toward men is a branch of true religion, he is not a godly man that is not honest, nor can he expect that his devotion should be accepted; for,

1. Nothing is more offensive to God than deceit in commerce, A false balance is here put for all manner of unjust and fraudulent practices in dealing with any person, which are all an abomination to the Lord, and render the discourse of those that allow themselves in the use of such cursed arts of thriving. It is an affront to justice, which God is the Patron of, as well as a wrong to our neighbour, whom God is the Protector of. Men make light of such frauds, and think there is no sin in that which there is money to be got by, and, while it passes undiscovered, they cannot blame themselves for it; a blot is no blot till it is hit, Hos. xii. 7, 8. But they are not the less an abomination to God, who will be the Avenger of those that defraud their brethren.

2. Nothing is more pleasing to God than fair and honest dealing, nor more necessary to make us and our devotions acceptable to him; A just weight is his delight. He himself goes by a just weight, and holds the scale of judgment with an even hand, and therefore is pleased with those that are herein followers of him. A balance cheats, under pretence of doing right most exactly, and therefore is the greater abomination to God.

2. When pride cometh, then cometh shame, but with the lowly is wisdom.

Observe, 1. How he that exalts himself is here abased, and contempt put upon him; When pride cometh, then cometh shame. Pride is a sin which men have reason to be themselves ashamed of; it is a shame to a man who springs out of the earth, who lives upon alms, depends upon God, and has forfeited all he has, to be proud. It is a sin which others cry out shame on, and look upon with disdain; be that is haughty makes himself contemptible; it is a sin for which God often brings men down, as he did Nebuchadnezzar and Herod, whose ignominy immediately attended their vainglory; for God resists the proud, contradicts them, and counterworks them, in the thing they are proud of, Isa. ii. 11, &c.

2. How he that humblest himself is here exalted, and a high character is given him; as with the proud there is folly, and will be shame, so with the lowly there is wisdom, and will be honour, for a man's wisdom gains him respect, and makes his face to shine, before men; or if any be so base as to trample upon the humble, God will give them grace, which will be their glory. Considering how safe, and quiet, and easy, they are, that are of a humble spirit, what communion they have with God, and comfort in themselves, we will say, With the lowly is wisdom.

3. The integrity of the upright shall guide them: but the perverseness of transgressors shall destroy them.

It is not only promised that God will guide the upright, and threatened that he will destroy the transgressors, but, that we may be the more fully aware of both, it is here represented as if the nature of the thing were such on both sides, that it would do it itself.

1. The integrity of an honest man will itself be his guide, in the way of duty and the way of safety. His principles are fixed, his rule is certain, and therefore his way is plain; his sincerity keeps him steady, and he needs not talk about every time the wind turns, having no other end to drive at than to keep a good conscience. Integrity and uprightness will find him, Ps. xxx. 21.

2. The iniquity of a bad man will itself be his ruin. As the plainness of a good man will be his protection, though he is ever so much exposed, so the perverseness of sinners will be their destruction, though they think themselves ever so well fortified. They shall fall into pits of their own digging, ch. v. 22.

4. Riches profit not in the day of wrath: but righteousness delivereth from death.

Note, 1. The day of death will be a day of wrath; it is a messenger of God's wrath; therefore, when Moses had meditated on man's mortality, he takes occasion thence to admire the power of God's anger, Ps. x. 11. It is a debt owing, not to nature, but to God's justice. After death, the judgment, and that is a day of wrath, Rev. vi. 17.

2. Riches will stand men in no stead in that day; they will neither put by the stroke, nor case the man, much less take out the sting; what profit will this world's birth-rights be of them? In the day of public judgments, riches often expose men rather than protect them, Ezek. vii. 19.

3. It is righteousness only that will deliver from the evil of death; a good conscience will make death easy, and take off the terror of it; it is the privilege of the righteous only not to be hurt of the second death, and so not much hurt by the first.

5. The righteousness of the perfect shall direct his way: but the wicked shall fall by his own wickedness. 6. The righteous ness of the upright shall deliver them: but transgressors shall be taken in their own naughtiness.

These two verses are, in effect, the same, and both to the same purport, with v. 3. For the truths are here of such certainty and weight, that they cannot be too often inculcated. Let us govern ourselves by these principles.

1. That the ways of religion are plain and safe, and in them we may enjoy a holy security. A living principle of honesty and grace, will be, (1.) Our best direction in the right way, in every doubtful case, to say to us, This is the way, walk in it. He that acts without a guide looks right on, and sees his way before him. (2.) Our best deliverance from every false way; The righteousness of the upright shall be armour of proof to them, to deliver them from the allurements of the devil and the world, and from their menaces.

2. The ways of wickedness are dangerous and destructive; The wicked shall fall into misery and ruin, by their own wickedness, and be taken in their own naughtiness as in a snare; O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself. Their sin will be their punishment, that very thing by which they contrived to shelter themselves will make against them.

7. When a wicked man dieth, his expectation shall perish: and the hope of unjust men perisheth.

Note. 1. Even wicked men, while they live, may keep up a confident expectation of a happiness when they die, or at least a happiness in this world. The hypocrite has his hope, in which he wraps himself as the spider in her web; the worldling expects great matters from his wealth, he calls it goods laid up for many years, and hopes to take his case in it, and to be merry; but in death their expectation will be frustrated, the worldling must leave this world, and his tillage to continue in, and the hypocrite will come short of that world which he expected to remove to, Job xxxvii. 8. 2. It will be the great aggravation of the misery of wicked people, that their hopes will sink into despair then when they expect them to be crowned with fruition. When a godly man dies, his expectations are outdone, and all his fears vanish; but when a wicked man dies, his expectations are dashed, dashed to pieces, in that very day, his thoughts perish, with which he had pleased himself, his hopes vanish.

8. The righteous is delivered out of trouble, and the wicked cometh in his stead. As always in death, so sometimes in life, the righteous are remarkably favoured, and the wicked crossed.

1. Good people are helped out of the distresses which they thought themselves lost in, and their feet are set in a large room, Ps. lxvi. 12.—xxxiv. 19. God has found out a way to deliver his people, when they have despaired, and their enemies have triumphed, as if the wilderness had shut them in.

2. The wicked have fallen into the distresses which they thought themselves far from, nay, which they have been instrumental to bring the righteous into, so that they seem to come in their stead, as a ransom for the just. Mordercas is from the gallows, Daniel from the lion's den, and Peter from the prison; and their persecutors come in their stead. The Israelites are delivered out of the Red Sea, and the Egyptians drowned in it. So precious are the saints in God's eye, that he gives men for them, Isa. xliii. 3, 4.

9. An hypocrite with his mouth destroyeth his neighbour: but through knowledge shall the just be delivered from those that lie in wait to deceive, and so to destroy, Rom. xvi. 18, 19.

10. When it goeth well with the righteous, the city rejoiceth: and when the wicked perish, there is shouting. 11. By the blessing of the upright the city is exalted; but it is overthrown by the mouth of the wicked.

It is here observed,

1. That good men are generally well-beloved by their neighbours, but no body cares for wicked people. (1.) It is true, there are some few that are enemies to the righteous, that are prejudiced against God and godliness, and are therefore vexed to see good men in power and prosperity; but all indifferent persons, even those that have no great stock of religion themselves, have a good word for a good man; and therefore when it goes well with the righteous, when they are advanced, and put into a capacity of doing good according to their desire, it is so much the better for all about them, and the city rejoices. For the honour and encouragement of virtue, and as it is the accomplishment of the promise of God, we should be glad to see virtuous men prosper in the world, and brought into reputation. (2.) Wicked people may, perhaps, have here and there a well-wisher among those who are altogether such in themselves, but among the generality of their neighbours they get ill-will, they may be feared, but they are not loved, and therefore when they perish, there is shouting; every body takes a pleasure in seeing them disgraced, and disarmed, removed out of places of trust and power, chased out of the world, and wishes no greater loss may come to the town, the rather because they hope the righteous may come in their stead, as they into trouble instead of the righteous, v. 8. Let a sense of honour therefore keep us in the paths of virtue, that we may live desired and die lamented, and not be hissed off the stage, Job xxxvii. 23. Ps. ii. 6.

2. That there is good reason for this, because those that are bad do good, but (as saith the pro-verb of the ancients) wickedness proceedeth from the wicked. (1.) Good men are public blessings—Fir bonus est commune bonum. By the blessing of the upright, the blessings with which they are blessed, which only other Israelites shall have, those blessings with which they bless their neighbours, their advice, their example, their prayers, and all the instances of their serviceableness to the public interest; by the blessings with which God blesses others for their sake; by these the city is exalted, and made more comfortable to the inhabitants, and more considerable among its neighbours. (2.) Wicked men are public nuisances; not only the burthens, but the plagues, of their generation; the city is overthrown by the mouth of the wicked, whose evil communications corrupt good manners, are enough to debauch a town, to ruin virtue in it, and bring down the judgment of God upon it.

12. He that is void of wisdom desipeth his neighbour: but a man of understanding holdeth his peace. 13. A tale-bearer revealeth secrets: but he that is of a faithful spirit concealeth the matter.

Silence is here recommended as an instance of true friendship, and a preservative of it, and therefore an evidence, 1. Of wisdom, A man of understanding, that has rule over his own spirit, if he be provoked, holdth his peace, that he neither give vent to his passion, nor kindle the passion of others, by any opprobrious language or peevish reflections. 2. Of sincerity; He that is of a faithful spirit, that is true, not only to his own promise, but to the interest of his friend, he conceals every matter, which, if divulged, may turn to the prejudice of his neighbour. This prudent friendly concealment is here opposed to two very bad vices of the tongue: (1.) Speaking scornfully of a man to his face; He that is void of wisdom discovers his folly by this; he designates his neighbour, calls him Rascal, and Thou fool, upon the least provocation, and tramples upon him as not worthy to be set with the dogs of his flock. He undervalues himself, who thus undervalues one that is made of the same mould. (2.) Speaking spitefully of a man behind his back; A tale-bearer, that carries all the stories he can pick up, true or false, from house to house, to make mischief and sow discord, he reveals secrets which he has been intrusted with, and so breaks the laws, and worketh against all the privileges, of friendship and conversation.

14. Where no counsel is, the people fall: but in the multitude of counsellors there is safety.

Here is, 1. The bad omen of a kingdom's ruin; Where no counsel is, no consultation at all, but every thing done rashly, or no prudent consultation for the common good, but only caballing for parties, and divided interests, the people fall, crumble into factions, fall to pieces, fall together by the ears, and fall an easy prey to the common enemies. Councils of war are necessary to the operations of war; two eyes see more than one; and mutual advice is in order to mutual assistance. 2. The good presage of a kingdom's prosperity; In the multitude of counsellors that see their need one of another, and act in concert, and with concern for the public welfare, there is safety; for what prudent methods one discerns not, another may. In our private affairs we shall often find it to our advantage to advise with many; if they agree in their advice, our way will be the more clear; if they differ, we shall hear what is to be said on all sides, and be the better able to determine.

Here we are taught, 1. In general, that we may not use our estates as we will; he that gave them to us has reserved himself a power to direct us how we shall use them; for they are not our own, we are but stewards; and further, that God in his law consults our interests, and teaches us that charity which begins at home, as well as that which must not end there. There is a good man, He is kind to the poor, and good, and is good divinity, and a discretion in ordering our affairs, which is part of the character of a good man, Ps. cxiii. 5. Every man must be just to his family, else he is not true to his stewardship.

2. In particular, that we must not enter rashly into suretiship; (1.) Because there is danger of bringing ourselves into trouble by it, and our families too, when we are gone; He that is surety for a stranger, for which he is bound, may be sure he must be bound for him another time, for one whose person perhaps he knows, and thinks he knows his circumstances, but is mistaken, he shall smart for it, Contrivium contrectur.—He shall be certainly and sadly crushed and broken by it, and perhaps become a bankrupt. Our Lord Jesus was Surety for us when we were strangers, nay, enemies, and he suffered for it; it pleased the Lord to bruise him. (2) Because he that resolves against all such suretiship keeps upon sure grounds, which a man may do, if he take care not to launch out any further into business than his own credit will carry him, so that he needs not ask others to be bound for him.

Here, 1. It is allowed that strong men retain riches; that those who bustle in the world, who are men of spirit and interest, and are able to make their part good against all who stand in their way, are likely to keep what they have, and to get more; while those who are weak are preyed upon by all about them. 2. It is taken for granted, that a gracious woman is as solicitous to preserve her reputation, for wisdom and modesty, humility and courtesy, and all those other graces that are the true ornaments of her sex, as strong men are to secure their estates; and those women who are truly gracious, will, in like manner, effectually secure their honour by their prudence and good conduct. A gracious woman is as honourable as a valiant man, and her honour is as sure.

17. The merciful man doeth good to his own soul: but he that is cruel troubleth his own flesh.

It is a common principle, Every one for himself, Proximity egonet mihi—None so near to me as myself. Now, if this be rightly understood, it will be a reason for the cherishing of gracious dispositions in ourselves, and the crucifying of corrupt ones. We are friends or enemies to ourselves, even in respect of these members, according as we are, or are not, governed by religious principles. 1. A merciful, tender, good-humoured man, doeth good to his own soul, makes and keeps himself easy; he has the pleasure of doing his duty, and contributing to the comfort of those that are to him as his own soul; for we are members one of another. He that waters others with his temporal good things, God will water him with his spiritual blessings, which he will find to do the best good to his own soul. See Isa. lviii. &c. If thou hide not thine eyes from thine own flesh, but do good to others as to thyself; if thou do good with thine own soul, and draw that out to the hungry, thou doest good to thy own soul; for the Lord shall satisfy thy soul, and make fat thy bones. Some make it part of the character of a merciful man, that he will make much of himself; that disposition which inclines him to be charitable to others, will oblige him to allow of himself a heart to ask it, either for the good of others, or for his own. He is vexatious to his nearest relations, that are, and should be, to him as his own flesh, Eph. v. 29. Envy, and malice, and greediness of the world, are the tenetness of the bones, and the consumption of the flesh.

18. The wicked worketh a deceitful work: but to him that soweth righteousness shall be a sure reward.

Note. 1. Sinners put a most fatal cheat upon themselves; The wicked works a deceitful work, builds himself a house upon the sand, which will deceive him when the storm comes; promises himself that by his sin which he will never gain; nay, it is cutting his throat when it smiles upon him. Sin deceived me, and by it slew me.

2. Saints lay up the best securities for themselves; He that sows righteousness, that is good, and makes it his business to do good, with an eye to a future compensation, he shall have a sure reward; it is made sure to him as eternal truth can make it. If the seediness fail not, the harvest shall not, Gal. vi. 8.

19. As righteousness tendeth to life; so he that pursueth evil, pursueth it to his own death.

It is here showed that righteousness, not only by the divine judgment, will end in life, and wickedness in death, but that righteousness, in its own nature, has a direct tendency to life, and wickedness to death.

1. True holiness is true happiness; it is a preparative for it, a pledge and earnest of it. Righteousness inclines, disposes, and leads, the soul to life.

2. In like manner, they that indulge themselves in sin are fitting themselves for destruction. The more violent a man is in sinful pursuits, the more eagerly he is upon his own destruction; he awakens it when it seemed to slumber, and hastens it when it seemed to linger.

20. They that are of a frivolous heart are abomination to the Lord: but such as are upright in their way are his delight.

It concerns us to know what God hates, and what he loves, that we may govern ourselves accordingly; may avoid his displeasure, and recommend ourselves to his favour. Now here we are told,

1. That nothing is more offensive to God than hypocrisy and double-dealing; for that is signified by the word which we translate frowardness, pretending justice, but intending wrong; walking in crooked ways, to avoid discovery. Those are of a froward heart who act in contradiction to that which is good, under a profession of that which is good; and such are, more than any sinners, an abomination to the Lord, Isa. lxxv. 5.

2. That nothing is more pleasing to God than sincerity and plain dealing; Such are upright in their way, such as aim and act with integrity, such as have their conversation in the world in simplicity and godly sincerity, not with fleshy wisdom, these God delights in, these he has been boast of, (Hast thou considered my servant Job?) and will have us to admire; Behold an Israelite indeed!

21. Though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished: but the seed of the righteous shall be delivered.

1. That confederacies in sin shall certainly be broken, and shall not avail to protect the sinners; Though hand join in hand, though there are many that concur by their practice to keep wickedness in countenance, and engage to stand by one another in defending it against all the attacks of virtue and justice, though they are in league for the support and propagation of it, though wicked children tread in the steps of their wicked parents, and resolve to keep up the trade, in defiance of religion, yet all this will not protect them from the justice of God, they shall not be held guiltless; it will not excuse them to say that they did as the most did, and as their company did, they shall not be unpunished; witness the flood that was brought upon a whole world of ungodly men. Their number, and strength, and unanimity in sin, will stand them in no stead when the day of vengeance comes.

2. That entails of religion shall certainly be blessed; The seed of the righteous, that follow the steps of their righteousness, though they may fall into trouble, shall, in due time, be delivered. Though justice may come slowly to punish the wicked, and mercy may come slowly to save the righteous, yet both will come surely. Sometimes the seed of the righteous, though they are not themselves righteous, are delivered for the sake of their godly ancestors, as Israel often, and the seed of David.

22. As a jewel of gold in a swine's snout, so is a fair woman which is without discretion.

By discretion here we must understand religion and grace, a true taste and relish (so the word signifies) of the honours and pleasures that attend an unspotted virtue; so that a woman without discretion is a woman of a loose and dissolute conversation; and then observe,

It is to be observed here, that beauty and comeliness of body are as a jewel of gold, a thing very valuable, and, where there is wisdom and grace to guard against the temptations of it, it is a great ornament. Gratior est pulchro venienti de cor-fore virtus—Virtue appears peculiarly graceful when associated with beauty. A foolish wanton woman, of a light carriage, is fitly compared to a swine, though she be ever so handsome, wallowing in the mere of filthy lusts, with which the mind and conscience are defiled, and, though washed, returning to them.

2. It is lamented that beauty should be so abused as it is by those that have not modesty with it; it seems ill-bestowed upon them; it is quite misplaced, as a jewel in a swine's snout, with which he rots in the dunghill; if beauty be not guarded by virtue, the virtue is exposed by the beauty. It may be applied to all other bodily endowments and accomplishments that those should have them who have not discretion to use them well.

23. The desire of the righteous is only good: but the expectation of the wicked is wrath.

This tells us what the desire and expectation of the righteous, and of the wicked, are, and how they will prove; what they would have, and what they shall have.

1. The righteous would have good, only good; all they desire, is, that it may go well with all about them; they wish no hurt to any, but happiness to all; as to themselves, their desire is not to gratify any evil lust, but to obtain the favour of a good God, and to preserve the peace of a good conscience; and good they shall have, that good which they desire, Ps. xxxvii. 4.

2. The wicked would have wrath, they desire the woful day, that God's judgments may gratify their passion and revenge, may remove those that stand in their way, and that they may make an advantage to themselves by fishing in troubled waters; and growth they shall have, to satisfy their desire; they expect and desire mischief to others, but it shall return upon themselves; as they loved cursing they shall have enough of it.

24. There is that scattereth, and yet in creaseth: and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty.

Note. 1. A man may grow rich by prudently spending what he has; may scatter in works of piety, charity, and generositas; and yet may live in crease; nay, by that means may increase, as the corn is increased, by being sown. By cheerfully spending what we have, our spirits are exhilarated, and so fitted for the business we have to do; by minding which closely, what we have is increased;
it gains a reputation which contributes to the increase. But it is especially to be ascribed to God; he blesses the giving hand, and so makes it a getting hand, 2 Cor. ix. 10. "Give, and it shall be given you."

2. A man may grow poor by meanly sparing what he has, withholding more than is meet, not paying just debts, not relieving the poor, not providing what is convenient for the family, not allowing necessary expenses for the preservation of the goods; this tends to poverty; it cramps men's ingenuity and industry, weakens their interest, destroys their credit, and forfeits the blessing of God; and let men be ever so saving of what they have, if God blast it, and blow upon it, it comes to nothing; a fire not blown shall consume it, Hag. i. 6, 9.

25. The liberal soul shall be made fat: and he that watereth shall be watered also himself.

So backward we are to works of charity, and so ready to think that giving undoeth us, that we need to have it very much pressed upon us, how much it is for our own advantage to do good to others, as before. v. 17.

1. We shall have the comfort of it in our own bosoms; The liberal soul, the soul of blessing, that prays for the afflicted, and provides for them, that scatters blessings with gracious lips and generous hands, that soul shall be made fat with true pleasure, and enriched with more grace.

2. We shall have the recompense of it both from God and men; He that waters others with the streams of his bounty, shall be also watered himself; God will certainly return it in the dews, in the plentiful showers of his blessing, which he will pour out, till there be not room enough to receive it, Mal. iii. 10. Men that have any sense of gratitude will return it if there be occasion; the merciful shall find mercy, and the kind be kindly dealt with.

3. We shall be enabled still to do yet more good; He that waters, even he shall be as rain, so some read it; he shall be recruited as the clouds are, which return after the rain, and shall be further useful and acceptable, as the rain to the new-mown grass. He that teaches shall learn, so the Chaldee reads it; he that uses his knowledge in teaching others, shall himself be taught of God; to him that has, and uses what he has, more shall be given.

26. He that withholdeth corn, the people shall curse him: but blessing shall be upon the head of him that selleth it.

See here, 1. What use we are to make of the gifts of God's bounty; we must not hoard them up merely for our own advantage, that we may be enriched by them, but we must bring them forth for the benefit of others, that they may be supported and maintained by them. It is a sin, when corn is dear and scarce, to withhold it, in hopes that it will still grow dearer, so to keep up and advance the market, when it is already so high, that the poor suffer by it; and at such a time it is the duty of those that have stocks of corn by them to consider the poor, and to be willing to sell at the market-price, to be content with moderate profit, and not aim to make gain of God's judgments. It is a noble and extensive piece of charity, for those that have stores wherewithal to do it, to help to keep the markets low when the price of our commodities grows excessive.

2. What regard we are to have to the voice of the people; we are not to think it an indifferent thing, and not worth heeding, whether we have the ill will and word, or the good will and word, of our neighbours, their prayers or their curses; for here we are taught to dread their curses, and forego our own profit rather than incur them; and to curt their blessings, and be at some expense to purchase them. Sometimes, Vox populi vox Dei—The voice of the people is the voice of God.

27. He that diligently seeketh good prosperity favour: but he that seeketh mischief, it shall come unto him.

Observe, 1. These that are industrious to do good in the world get themselves beloved both with God and man; He that rises early to that which is good, so the word is; that seeks opportunities of serving his friends, and relieving the poor, and lays cut himself therein, he procures favour; all about him love him, and speak well of him, and will be ready to do him a kindness; and, which is better than that, better than life, he has God's loving-kindness.

2. These that are industrious to do mischief are preparing ruin for themselves; it shall come unto them; some time or other they will be paid in their own coin. And, observe, seeking mischief, is here set in opposition to seeking good; for those that are not doing good, are doing hurt.

28. He that trusteth in his riches shall fall: but the righteous shall flourish as a branch.

Observe, 1. Our riches will fail us when we are in the greatest need; He that trusts in them, as if they would secure him the favour of God, and be his protection and portion, he shall fall, as a man who lays his weight on a broken reed, which will not only disappoint him, but run into his hand, and pierce him.

2. Our righteousness will stand us in no stead when our riches fail us; The righteous shall then flourish as a branch, the branch of righteousness; like a tree whose leaf shall not wither, Ps. i. 3. Even in death, when riches fail men, the bones of the righteous shall flourish as an herb, Isa. lxvi. 14. When those that take root in the world wither, those that are grafted into Christ, and partake of his root and fatness, shall be fruitful and flourishing.

29. He that troubleth his own house shall inherit the wind: and the fool shall be servant to the wise of heart.

Two extremes, in the management of family affairs, are here condemned, and the ill consequences of them foretold.

1. Carefulness and carnal policy, on the one hand. There are these that by their extreme earnestness in pursuit of the world, their anxiety about their business, and fretfulness about their losses, their strictness with their servants, and their niggardliness toward their families, trouble their own houses, and give continual vexation to all about them; while others think, by supporting factions and feuds in their families, which are really a trouble to their houses, to serve some turn for themselves, and either to get, or to save, by it; but they will both be disappointed; they will inherit the wind. All they will get by these arts will not only be empty and worthless as the wind, but noisy and troublesome, vanity and vexation.

2. Carelessness and want of common prudence, on the other hand. He that is a fool in his business, that either minds it not, or goes awkwardly about it, that has no contrivance and consideration, he not only loses his reputation and interest, but becomes a servant to the wise in heart; he is impoverished, and forced to work for his living; while these that manage wisely raise themselves, and come to have dominion over him, and others like him. It is rational, and very fit, that the fool should be servant to
30. The fruit of the righteous is a tree of life; and he that witteth souls is wise.

This shows what great blessings good men are, especially those that are eminently wise, to the places where they live, and therefore how much to be valued.

1. The righteous are as trees of life; the fruits of their piety and charity, their instructions, reproofs, examples, and prayers, their interest in heaven, and their influence upon earth, are like the fruits of that tree, precious and useful, contributing to the support and nourishment of the spiritual life in many; they are the ornaments of paradise, God's church on earth, for whose sake it stands.

2. In the things of this world, which more, they are as trees of knowledge, not forbidden, but commanded, knowledge. He that is wise, by communicating his wisdom, wins souls; wins them upon to bring them to love with God and holiness, and so wins them over into the interests of God's kingdom among men. The wise are said to turn many to righteousness, and that is the same with winning souls here, Dan. xii. 3. Abraham's proselytes are called the souls that he had gotten, Gen. xii. 3. They that would win souls let them know how to deal with them; and they that do win souls show that they are wise.

31. Behold, the righteous shall be compensated in the earth: much more the wicked ed and the sinner.

This, I think, is the only one of Solomon's proverbs that has that note of attention prefixed to it, Behold! which intimates, that it contains not only an evident truth, which may be beheld, but an eminent truth, which must be considered.

1. Some understand both parts of a recompense in displeasure; The righteous, if they do amiss, shall be punished for their offences in this world; much more shall the wicked people be punished for theirs, which are committed, not through infirmity, but with a high hand. If judgment begin at the house of God, what will become of the ungodly? 1 Pet. iv. 17, 18. Luke xxiii. 31.

2. I rather understand it of a recompense of reward to the righteous, and punishment to sinners. Let us behold providential retributions. There are some recompenses in the earth, in this world, and in the last judgment, which, though they do not prove that verily there is a God that judges in the earth, (Ps. lvi. 11.) but they are not universal; many sins go unpunished in the earth, and services unrewarded, which indicates that there is a judgment to come, and that there will be more exact and full retributions in the future state. Many times the righteous are recompensed for their righteousness here in the earth, though that is not the principal, much less the only, reward either intended for them or intended by them; but whatever the word of God has promised them, or the wisdom of God seems good for them, they shall have in the earth. The wicked also, and the sinner, are sometimes remarkably punished in this life; nations, families, particular persons. And if the righteous, who do not deserve the least reward, yet have part of their recompense here on earth, much more shall the wicked, who deserve the greatest punishment, have part of their punishment on earth, as an earnest of worse to come. Therefore stand in awe, and sin not. If those have two heavens that merit none, much more shall they have two hells that merit both.
Note. 1. He that is blessed with a good wife is as happy as if he were upon the throne, for she is no less than a crown to him. A virtuous woman, that is pious and prudent, ingenious and industrious, that is active for the good of her family, and looks well to the ways of her household, that makes conscience of her duty in every relation, a woman of spirit, that can bear crosses without disturbance, such a one shall be a crown to her husband, and therefore she is a crown to him; not only a credit and honour to him, as a crown is an ornament, but supports and keeps up his authority in his family, as a crown is an ensign of power. She is submissive and faithful to him, and therefore teaches his children and servants to be so too.

2. He that is plagued with a bad wife is as miserable as if he were upon the dunghill; for she is no better than retinues in his bones, an incurable disease; moreover, she makes him ashamed. She that is silly and slothful, wasteful and wanton, passionate and ill-tongued, ruins both the credit and comfort of her husband; if he go abroad, his head is hung down, for his wife's faults turn to his reproach; if he retire into himself, his heart is sunk; he is continually uneasy; it is an affliction that preys much upon the spirits.

5. The thoughts of the righteous are right: but the counsels of the wicked are deceit.

Note. 1. The word of God is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart, and judges them. We mistake if we imagine that thoughts are free; no, they are under the divine cognizance, and therefore undo the divine command. 2. We ought to be observers of the thoughts and intents of our own hearts, and to judge of ourselves by them; for they are the first-born of the soul that have most of its image undisguised. Right thoughts are a righteous man's best evidences, as nothing more certainly proves a man wicked than wicked contrivances and designs. A good man may have in his mind bad suggestions, but he does not indulge them and harbour them till they are ripened into bad projects and bad actions; it is an honour to mean honestly, and to have his thoughts right, though a word or action may be misplaced, or mistimed, or, at least, misinterpreted. But it is a man's shame to lie always at catch, to act with deceit, with trick and design; not only with a long reach, but with an overreach.

6. The words of the wicked are to lie in wait for blood: but the mouth of the upright shall deliver them.

In the foregoing verse, the thoughts of the wicked and righteous were compared, here their words, and these are as the abundance of the heart is.

2. Good men speak help to their neighbours; and wicked indeed are those whose words are to lie in wait for blood, their tongues are swords to those that stand in their way, to good men whom they hate and persecute. See an instance, Luke xx. 20, 21.

2. Good men speak help to their neighbours; The mouth of the upright is ready to be opened in the cause of those that are oppressed, (ch. xxxi. 8.) to plead for them, to witness for them, and to deliver them, particularly them whom the wicked lie in wait for. A man may sometimes do a very good work with one good word.

7. The wicked are overthrown, and are not: but the house of the righteous shall stand.

We are here taught, as before, (v. 3. and i. 25, 30.)

1. That the triumphing of the wicked is short; they may be exalted for awhile, but in a little time they are overthrown, and are not; their trouble proves their overthrow, and they who made a great show disappear, and their place knows them no more. Turn the wicked, and they are not; they stand in such a slippery place, that the least touch of trouble brings them down; like the apples of Sodom, which lack fire, but touch them, and they go to dust.

2. That the prosperity of the righteous has a good bottom, and will endure. Death will remove them, but their house shall stand, their families shall be kept up, and the generation of the upright shall be blessed.

8. A man shall be commended according to his wisdom: but he that is of a perverse heart shall be despised.

We are here told whence to expect a good name. Reputation is what most men have a fervent regard to, and stand much upon. Now it is certain,

1. The best reputation is that which attends virtue and serious piety, and the prudent conduct of life; A man shall be commended by all that are wise and good, in conformity to the judgment of God himself, which, we are sure, is according to truth, not according to his riches or preferments, his craft and subtlety, but according to his wisdom, the honesty of his designs, and the prudent choice of means to compass them.

2. The worst reproach is that which follows wickedness, and an opposition to that which is good; He that is of a perverse heart, that turns aside crooked ways, and goes on fraudulently in them, shall be despised. Providence will bring him to poverty and contempt, and all that have a true sense of honour will despise him, as unworthy to be dealt with, and unfit to be trusted, as a blinsh and scandalous to mankind.

9. He that is despised, and hath a servant, is better than he that honoureth himself and lacketh bread.

Note. 1. It is the folly of some, that they covet to make a great figure abroad, take place, and take state, as persons of quality, and yet want necessaries at home, and, if their debts were paid, would not be worth a morsel of bread, nay, perhaps, pinch their bellies to put it on their backs, that they may appear very gay, because fine feathers make fine birds.

2. The condition and character of those is every way better, who content themselves in a lower sphere, where they are despised for the plainness of their dress, and the meanness of their post, that they may be able to afford themselves, not only necessaries, but conveniencies, in their own houses, not only bread, but a servant to attend them, and take some of their work off their hands. They that can trive to live plentifully and comfortably at home, are to be preferred before those that affect nothing so much as to appear splendid abroad, though they have not wherewithal to maintain it, whose hearts are unhumbled when their condition is low.

10. A righteous man regardeth the life of his beast: but the tender mercies of the wicked are cruel.

See here, 1. To how great a degree a good man will be merciful; he has not only a compassion for the human nature under its greatest abasements, but he regards even the life of his beast, not only because it is his servant, but because it is God's creature, and in conformity to Providence, which preserves man and beast. The beasts that are under our care must be provided for, must have convenient food and rest, must in no case be abused or tyrannized over. Balaam was checked for beating his ass. He must take care for oxen. Those therefore are unrighteous men that are not just to the brute-creatures; those that are furious and barbarous to them, evidence, and confirm in themselves, a habit of barbarity, and help to make the creation groan, Rom. viii. 22.

2. To how great a degree a wicked man will be unmerciful; even his tender mercies are cruel, that natural compassion which is in him, as a man, is lost, and by the power of corruption is turned into hard-heartedness; even that which they will have to pass for compassion, is really cruel, as Pilate's resolution concerning Christ the Innocent, I will chastise him, and let him go. Their pretended kindness are only a cover for purposed cruelties.

11. He that tilleth his land shall be satisfied with bread: but he that followeth vain persons is void of understanding.

Note, 1. It is men's wisdom to mind their business, and follow an honest calling, for that is the way, by the blessing of God, to get a livelihood: He that tilleth his land, of which he is either the owner or the occupant, that keeps to his work, and is willing to take pains, if he do not raise an estate by it, (what need is there of that?) yet he shall be satisfied with bread, shall have food convenient for himself and his family, enough to bear his charges comfortably through the world. Even the sentence of wrath has this mercy in it, Thou shalt eat bread, though it be in the sweat of thy face. Cain was denied this, Gen. iv. 12. Be busy, and that is the true way to keep thy shop, and thy shop will keep thee. Thou shalt eat the labour of thine hands.

2. It is men's folly to neglect their business; they are void of understanding that do so, for then they fall in with idle companions, and follow them in their evil courses, and so come to want bread, at least bread of their own, and make themselves burthen-some to others, eating the bread out of other people's mouths.

12. The wicked desireth the net of evil men: but the root of the righteous yieldeth fruit.

See here, 1. What is the care and aim of a wicked man; he would do mischief; He desires the net of evil men; "Oh that I were but as cunning as such a man, to make a hand of those I deal with; that I had but his art of overreaching, that I could but take my revenge on one I have quite to, as effectually as he can!" He desires the strong-hold, or fortress, of evil men, so some read it, to act securely in doing mischief, that it may not turn upon him.

2. What is the care and aim of a good man; his root yields fruit, and is his strength and stability, and that is it that he desires, to do good, and to be fixed and confirmed in doing good. The wicked desires only a net wherewith to fish for himself, the righteous desires to yield fruit for the benefit of others, and God's glory, Rom. xiv. 6.

13. The wicked is snared by the transgression of his lips: but the just shall come out of trouble.

See here, 1. The wicked entangling themselves in trouble by their folly, when God in justice leaves them to themselves; They are often snared by the corruption of their lips, and their throats are cut with their own tongues: by speaking evil of dignities they expose themselves to public justice, by giving ill language they become obnoxious to private resentments, are sued for defamation, and actions on the case for words are brought against them. Many a man has paid dearly in this world for the transgression of his lips, and has felt the lash on his back for want of a bridle upon his tongue, Ps. liv. 8.

2. The righteous extricate themselves out of trouble by their own wisdom, when God in mercy comes in for their succour. The just shall come out of such troubles as the wicked throw themselves headlong into, Ps. xcvii. 20. It is not for all, that, perhaps, come into trouble; but though they fall, they shall not be utterly cast down, Ps. xxxiv. 19.

14. A man shall be satisfied with good by the fruit of his mouth: and the recompense of a man's hands shall be rendered unto him.

We are here assured, for our quickening to every good word and work, 1. That even good words will turn to a good account; (v. 14.) A man shall be satisfied with good, he shall gain present comfort, that inward pleasure which is truly satisfied, by the fruit of his mouth, by the good he does with his pious discourse and prudent advice. While we are teaching others, we may ourselves learn and feed on the bread of life we break to others.

2. That good works, much more, will be abundantly rewarded. The recompense of a man's hands for all his work and labour of love, all he has done for the glory of God, and the good of his generation, shall be rendered unto him, and he shall reap as he has sown. Or it may be understood of the general rule of justice, God will render to every man according to his work, Rom. ii. 6.

15. The way of a fool is right in his own eyes: but he that hearkeneth unto counsel is wise.

See here, 1. What it is that keeps a fool from being wise; His way is right in his own eyes, he thinks he is in the right, in every thing he has an opinion about, before he asks no advice, because he does not apprehend he needs it; he is confident he knows the way, and cannot miss it, and therefore never inquires the way; The rule he goes by, is, to do that which is right in his own eyes, to walk in the way of his heart. Quicquid libet, licet—He makes his will his law. He is a fool that is governed by his eye, and not by his conscience.

2. What it is that keeps a wise man from being a fool: he is willing to be advised, he desires to have counsel given him, and hearkens to counsel, being diffluent of his own judgment, and having a value for the directions of those that are wise and good. He is wise; it is a sign he is so, and he is likely to continue so whose ear is always open to good advice.

16. A fool's wrath is presently known: but a prudent man covereth shame.

Note, 1. Passion is folly; A fool is known by his anger, so some read it; not but that a wise man may be angry when there is just cause for it, but then he hides his anger under check and direction, is lord of his anger, whereas a fool's anger lords it over him. He that, when he is provoked, breaks out into indecent expressions, in words or behaviour, whose passion alters his countenance, makes him outrageous, and forget himself, Nabat certainly is his name, and folly is with him. A fool's indignation
17. He that speaketh truth showeth forth righteousness: but a false witness deceit.

Here is, 1. A faithful witness commended for an honest man. He that makes conscience of speaking truth, and representing every thing truly, to the best of his knowledge, whether in judgment or in common conversation, whether he be upon his oath or no, he shows forth righteousness, he makes it to appear that he is governed and actuated by the principles and laws of righteousness, and he promotes justice by doing honour to it, and serving the administration of it. (2.) A false witness condemned for a cheat; he shows forth deceit, not only how little conscience he makes of deceiving these he deals with, but how much pleasure he takes in it, and that he is possessed by a lying spirit; Jer. ix. 38. We are compelled to possess ourselves with a dread and dexterity of the sin of lying, (Ps. cxxix. 163.) and with a reigning principle of honesty.

18. There is that speaketh like the piercings of a sword; but the tongue of the wise is health.

The tongue is death or life, poison or medicine, as it is used.

1. There are words that are cutting and killing, that are like the piercings of a sword. Opprobrious words grieve the spirits of those to whom they are spoken, and cut them to the heart; sharper than a two-edged sword, wound the reputation of those of whom they are uttered, and perhaps incurable; whisperings and evil surmises, like a sword, divide and cut under the bonds of love and friendship, and separate those that have been dearest to each other.

2. There are words that are curing and healing; The tongue of the wise is health, closing up those wounds which the backbiting tongue had given, making all whole again, restoring peace, and accommodating murrain, peace, and perturbation to reconciliation. Wisdom will find out proper remedies against the mischiefs that are made by destruction and evil-speaking.

19. The lip of truth shall be established for ever: but a lying tongue is but for a moment.

Be it observed, to the honour of truth, that sacred thing.

1. That, if truth be spoken, it will hold good, and, whoever may be disliked by it, and angry at it, yet it will keep its ground; great is the truth, and will prevail; what is true will be always true, we may abide by it, and need not fear being disproved and put to shame.

2. That, if truth be denied, yet in time it will transpire; a lying tongue, that puts false colours upon things, is but for a moment, the lie will be disproved; the liar, when he comes to be examined, will be found in several stories, and not consistent with himself, as he that speaks truth; and when he is found in a lie, he cannot gain his point, nor will he afterward be credited. Truth may be eclipsed, but it will come to light. Those, therefore, that make a lie their refuge, will find it a refuge of lies.

20. Deceit is in the heart of them that imagine evil: but to the councillors of peace is joy.

Note, 1. Those that devise mischief, contrive for the accomplishing of it, how to impose upon others; but it will prove, in the end, that they deceive themselves. They that imagine evil, under colour of friendship, have their hearts full of this and the other advantages and satisfactions in which they shall gain by it, but it is all a cheat. Let them imagine it ever so artfully, deceivers will be deceived.

2. Those that consult the good of their neighbours, that study the things which make for peace, and give peaceable advice, promote healing attempts, and contrive healing methods, and, according as their sphere is, further the public welfare, will have not only the credit, but the comfort of it, joy and success, perhaps beyond their expectation. Blessed are the peace-makers.

21. There shall no evil happen to the just: but the wicked shall be filled with mischief.

Note, 1. Piety is a sure protection. If men be sincerely righteous, the righteous God has engaged that no evil shall happen to them; he will, by the power of his grace in them, that principle of justice, keep them from the evil of sin; so that though they be tempted, yet they shall not be overcome by the temptation. And though they may come into trouble, into that kind of trouble to which these troubles shall have no evil in them, whatever they have to others, (Ps. xci. 10.) for they shall be overruled to work for their good.

2. Wickedness is as sure a destruction. They that live in contempt of God and man, and are set on mischief, with mischief they shall be filled. They shall be more and more miserable, shall be filled with all unrighteousness, Rom. i. 29. Or, they shall be made miserable with the mischiefs that shall come upon them. They that delight in mischief shall have enough of it. Some read the whole verse thus, There shall no evil happen to the just, though the wicked be filled with mischief and spite against them. They shall be safe under the protection of Heaven, though hell itself break loose upon them.

22. Lying lips are abomination to the Lord: but they that deal truly are his delight.

We are here taught, 1. To hate lying, and to keep at the utmost distance from it, because it is an abomination to the Lord, and renders those abominable, in his sight, that allow themselves in it; not only because it is a breach of his law, but because it is destructive to human society.

2. To make conscience of truth, not only in our words, but in all our actions; because those that deal truly and sincerely, in all their dealings, are his delight, and he is well pleased with them. We delight to converse with, and make use of those that are honest, and that we may put a confidence in; such therefore let us be, that we may recommend ourselves to the favour both of God and man.

23. A prudent man concealeth knowledge: but the heart of fools proclaims foolishness.

Note. 1. He that is wise does not affect to proclaim his wisdom, and it is his honour that he does not; he communicates his knowledge when it may turn to the edification of others, but he conceals it when the showing of it would only tend to his own commendation. Knowing men, if they be prudent men, will carefully avoid every thing that savours of ostentation, and not take all precautions to have their learning only serve to hide it, so that little discretion have they in the management of themselves, Eccl. x. 3.

24. The hand of the diligent shall bear rule: but the slothful shall be under tribute.

Note. 1. Industry is the way to preferment. Solomon advanced Jeroboam, because he saw that he was an industrious young man, and minded his business, 1 Kings xi. 28. Men that take pains in study and serviceableness, will thereby gain such an interest and reputation as will give them a dominion over all about them by what means soever they know not how to hide it, so that little discretion have they in the management of themselves.

25. Heaviness in the heart of man maketh it stoop: but a good word maketh it glad.

Here is, 1. The cause and consequence of melancholy. It is heaviness in the heart, it is a load of care, and fear, and sorrow, upon the spirits, depressing them, and disabling to exert themselves with any vigour in what is to be done, or courage in what is to be borne; it makes them stoop, prostrates and sinks them. Those that are thus oppressed can neither do the duty, nor take the comfort, of any relation, conversation, or society. Those therefore that are inclined to it should watch and pray against it.

2. The cure of it; A good word from God, applied by faith, makes it glad; such a word as that, (says one of the rabbins,) Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee; the good word of God, particularly the gospel, is designed to make the hearts glad that are weary and heavy-laden, Matt. xi. 28. Ministers are to be helpers of this joy.

26. The righteous is more excellent than his neighbour: but the way of the wicked seduce them.

See here, 1. That good men do well for them selves; for they have in themselves an excellent character, and they secure to themselves an excellent portion, and it has the force of an inherent good. The righteous is more abundant than his neighbour, so the margin; he is richer, though not in this world's goods, yet in the graces and comforts of the Spirit, which are the true riches. There is a true excellency in religion, it ennobles men, inspires them with generous principles, makes them substantial; it is an excellency which is, in the sight of God, of great price, who is the true Judge of excellency. He that doeth good may make a greater figure in the world, may be more applauded, but the righteous man has the intrinsic worth.

2. That wicked men do ill for themselves; they walk in a way which seduces them. It seems to them to be not only a pleasant way, but the right way; it is so agreeable to flesh and blood, that they therefore flatter themselves with an opinion that it cannot be amiss, but they will not gain the point they aim at, nor enjoy the good they hope for. It is all a cheat to them; the righteous is wiser and happier than his neighbours, that yet despise him, and trample upon him.

27. The slothful man roasteth not that which he took in hunting: but the substance of a diligent man is precious.

Here is, 1. That which may make us hate slothfulness and deceit, for the word here, as before, signifies both; The slothful deceitful man has roasted meat, but that which he roasts is not what he himself took in hunting, no, it is what others took pains for, and he lives upon the fruit of their labours, like the drones in the hive. Or, if slothful men have taken any thing by hunting, (as sportsmen are seldom men of business,) yet they do not roast it, when they have taken it; they have no comfort in the enjoyment of it; perhaps God, in his providence, cuts them short of it.

2. That which may make us love in industry and honesty; that the substance of a diligent man, though it be not great, perhaps is yet precious. It comes from the blessing of God; he has comfort in it; it does him good, and his family. It is his own daily bread, not bred out of other people's mouths, and therefore he sees God gives it him in answer to his prayer.

28. In the way of righteousness is life: and in the path-way thereof there is no death.

The way of religion is here recommended to us,

1. As a straight, plain, easy, way; it is the way of righteousness; God's commands (the rule we are to walk by) are all holy, just, and good; religion has right reason and equity on its side; it is a path-way, a way where God has cast a powerful thyrex, as in Mic. viii. 1. It is a highway, the king's highway, the King of kings' highway; a way which is tracked before us by all the saints; the good old way, full of the footsteps of the flock.

2. As a safe, pleasant, comfortable way. (1.) There is not only life at the end, but there is life in the way; all true comfort and satisfaction. The favour of God, which is better than life; the Spirit, who is life. (2.) There is not only life in it, but so many, that in it, there is no death; none of that sorrow of the world which works death, and is an alay to our present joy and life. There is no end of that life that is in the way of righteousness. Here there is life, but there is death too. In the way of right-
PROVERBS, XIII.

1. A WISE son heareth his father’s instruction: but a scorner heareth not rebuke.

Among the children of the same parents, it is not new thing for some to be hopeful, and others the contrary; now here we are taught to distinguish, 1. There is great hope of those that have a reverence for their parents, and are willing to be advised and admonished by them. He is a wise son, and is in a fair way to be wiser, that hears his father’s instruction, desires to hear it, regards it, and complies with it, and does not only give it the hearing. 2. There is little hope of those that will not so much as hear rebuke with any patience, but scorn to submit to government, and scoff at these that deal faithfully with them. How can those mend a fault who will not be told of it, but count those their enemies who do them that kindness. 2. A man shall eat good by the fruit of his mouth: but the soul of the transgressors shall eat violence.

Note. 1. If that which comes from within, out of the heart, be good, and from a good treasure, it will return with advantage. Inward comfort and satisfaction will be daily bread; nay, it will be a continual feast to those who delight in that communication which is to the use of edifying.

2. Violence done will recoil in the face of him that does it; The soul of the transgressors, that hastens hours and plots mischief, and vents it by word and deed, shall eat violence; they shall have their belly full of it. Reward her as she has rewarded thee, Rev. xviii. 6. Every man shall drink as he brews, cat as he speaks; for by our words we must be justified or condemned; (Matth. xii. 37.) as our fruit is, so will our food be, Rom. vi. 21, 22.

3. He that keepeth his mouth keepeth his life: but he that openeth wide his lips shall have destruction.

Note. 1. A guard upon the lips is a guard to the soul; he that is cautious, that thinks twice before he speaks once, that, if he have thought evil, lays his hand upon his mouth to suppress it, that keeps a strong bridle on his tongue, and a strict hand on that bridle, he keeps his soul from a great deal both of guilt and grief, and saves himself the trouble of many bitter reflections on himself, and others upon him. 2. There is many a one ruined by an ungoverned tongue; He that openeth wide his lips, to let out good in buccan verberi—whatever comes unsulliest, that loves to bow, and bluster, and make a noise, and affected with a liberty of speech as bids defiance both to God and man, he shall have destruction. It will be the destruction of his reputation, his interest, his comfort, and his soul for ever, 1 Sam. iii. 6.

4. The soul of the sluggard desireth, and hath nothing: but the soul of the diligent shall be made fat.

Here is, 1. The misery and shame of the slothful; see how foolish and absurd they are; they desire the gains which the diligent get, but they hate the pains which the diligent take; they covet every thing that is to be coveted, but will do nothing that is to be done; and therefore it follows, they have nothing; for he that will not labour, let him hunger, and let him not eat, 2 Thess. iii. 10. The desire of the slothful, which should be his excitement, is his torment, which should make him busy, makes him always uneasy, and is really a greater toil to him than labour would be. 2. The happiness and honour of the diligent; Their soul shall be made fat; they shall have abundant dance, and shall have the comfortable enjoyment of it; and the more, for its being the fruit of their diligence. This is especially true in spiritual affairs. They that rest in idle wishes, know not what the advantages of religion are; whereas they that take pains in the service of God find both the pleasure and profit of it.

5. A righteous man hateth lying; but a wicked man is loathsome, and cometh to shame.

Note. 1. Where grace reigns, sin is loathsome. It is the ungodly character of every righteous man, that he hates lying, all sin, for every sin is a lie, and particularly all fraud and falsehood in commerce and conversation; not only that he will not tell a lie, but he abhors it, from a rooted reigning principle of love to truth and justice, and conformity to God.

2. Where sin reigns, the man is loathsome. If his eyes were opened, and his conscience awakened, he would be so to himself, he would abhor himself, and repent in dust and ashes; however, he is so to God and all good men; particularly, he makes himself so by lying, than which nothing is more detestable. And though he may think to face it out a while, yet he will come to shame and contempt at last, and will blush to show his face, Dan. xii. 2.

6. Righteousness keepeth him that is upright in the way: but wickedness overthroweth the sinner.

See here, 1. Saints secured from ruin. Those that are upright in their way, that mean honestly in all their actions, adhere conscientiously to the sacred and eternal rules of equity, and deal sincerely both with God and man, their integrity will keep them safe from all the temptations of Satan, which shall not prevail over them, the reproaches and injuries of evil men, which shall not fasten upon them, to do them any real mischief, Ps. xxv. 21.

He manus aequus est, nil conscience sibi—
Be this thy brazen bulwark of defence,
Still to preserve thy conscious innocence.

2. Sinners secured for ruin. Those that are wicked, even their wickedness will be their overthrow at last, and they are held in the cords of it in the mean time. Are they corrected, destroyed? It is their own wickedness that corrects them, that destroys them; they alone shall bear it.

7. There is that maketh himself rich, yet hath nothing; there is that maketh himself poor, yet hath great riches.

* This observation is applicable.

1. To men’s worldly estate. The world is a great cheat; not only the things of the world, but the men of the world; all men are liars. Here is an instance in two sore evils under the sun: (1.) Some that are really poor would be thought to be rich, and are thought to be so; they trade and spend as if they were rich, make a great bustle and a great show as if they had hid treasures, when perhaps, if all their debts were paid, they are not worth a great. This is sin, and will be shame; many a one hereby ruins his family, and brings reproach upon his profession.

They that thus live above what they have, choose to be subject to their own pride rather than to God’s providence, and it will end accord ngly. (2.) Some that are really rich would be thought to be poor, and are thought to be so, because they sordidly and meanly live below what God has given them, and choose rather to bury it than to use it, Eccl. vi. 1, 2. In this there is ingratitude to God, injustice to the family and neighbourhood, and uncharitableness to the poor.

2. To their spiritual state. Grace is the riches of the soul, it is true riches; but men commonly misrepresent it, either designedly, or through mistake, and ignorance of themselves. (1.) There are many presuming hypocrites that are really poor, and empty of grace; and yet either think themselves rich, and will not be convinced of their poverty, or pretend themselves rich, and will not own their poverty. (2.) There are many timorous, trembling, Christians, that are spiritually rich, and full of grace, and yet think themselves poor, and will not be persuaded that they are rich, or at least, will not own it; by their doubts and fears, their complaints and griefs, they make themselves poor. The former mistake is destroying at last, this is disquieting in the mean time.

3. The ransom of a man’s life are his riches: but the poor heareth not rebuke.

We are apt to judge of men’s blessedness, at least, in this world, by their wealth, and that they are more or less happy according as they have more or less of this world’s goods; but Solomon here shows what a gross mistake it is; that we may be reconciled to a poor condition, and may neither covet riches ourselves, nor envy those that have abundance.

1. Those that are rich, if by some they are respected for their riches, yet, to balance that, by others they are envied and struck at, and brought in danger of their lives, which therefore they are forced to ransom with their riches. Stay us not, for we have treasures in the field, Jer. xii. 8. Under some tyrants, it has been crime enough to be rich; and how little is a man beholden to his wealth, when it only serves to redeem that life which otherwise had not been exposed!

2. Those that are poor, if by some, that should be their friends, they are despised and overlooked, yet, to balance that, they are also despised and overlooked by others, that would be their enemics if they had anything to lose; The poor hear not rebuke; are not censured, reproached, accused, nor brought into trouble, as the rich are; for nobody thinks it worth while to take notice of them. When the rich Jews were carried captives to Babylon, the poor of the land were left, 2 Kings xxv. 12. Welcome nothing, once in seven years. Cantab. vacus coram latrone viator—When a traveller is met by a robber, he will rejoice in not having much property about him.

9. The light of the righteous rejoiceth: but the lamp of the wicked shall be put out.

Here is, 1. The comfort of good men flourishing and lasting; The light of the righteous rejoiceth, it increases, and makes them glad. Even their outward prosperity is their joy, and much more those gifts, and grace, and comforts, with which their souls are illuminated; these shine more and more, ch. iv. 18. The Spirit is their Light, and he gives them that brightness, and rejoiceth to do them good.

2. The comfort of bad men withering and dying; The lamp of the wicked burns dim and faint, it looks melancholy, like a taper in an urn, and it shortly be put out in utter darkness, Isa. l. 11. The light of the righteous is as that of the sun, which may be eclipsed and clouded, but will continue; that of the wicked is as a lamp of their own kindling, which presently goes out, and is easily put out.

10. Only by pride cometh contention: but with the well-advised is wisdom.

Note, 1. Foolish pride is the great make bate. Would you know whence comes wars and fightings? They come from this root of bitterness. Whatever hand other lusts may have in contention, (passion, envy, covetousness,) pride has the great hand, it is its pride that it will itself sow discord, and needs no help. Pride makes men impatient of contradiction in either their opinions or their desires, impatient of competition and rivalry, impatient of condescension and receding, from a conceit of certain right and truth on their side; and hence arise quarrels among relations and neighbours, quarrels in states and kingdoms, in churches and Christian societies. Pride will be revenged, will not forgive, because they are proud.

2. Those that are humble and peaceful are wise and well-advised. Those that will ask and take advice, that will consult their own consciences, their Bibles, their ministers, their friends, and will do nothing rashly, they are wise, as in other things, so in this, that they will humble themselves, will stoop and yield, to preserve quietness, and prevent quarrels.

11. Wealth gotten by vanity shall be diminished: but he that gathereth by labour shall increase.

This shows that riches wear as they are won and wrought.

1. That which is won ill will never wear well, for a curse attends it, which will waste it; and the same corrupt dispositions which incline men to the sinful ways of getting, will incline them to the like sinful ways of spending; Wealth gotten by vanity will be bestowed upon vanity, and then it will be diminished. That which is got by such employments as are not lawful, or not becoming Christians, such as only serve to feed pride and luxury; that which is got by gaming, or by the stage, may as truly be said to be gotten by vanity, as that which is got by fraud and lying, and will be diminished. De male questitis vix gaudeat tertius harum—Ill-gotten wealth will scarcely be enjoyed by the third generation.

2. That which is got by industry and honesty will grow more, instead of growing less; it will be a maintenance, it will be an inheritance, it will be an abundance. He that labours, working with his hands, shall so increase, as that he shall have to give to him that needs; (Eph. iv. 28,) and, when it comes to that, it will increase yet more and more.

12. Hope deferred maketh the heart sick: but when the desire cometh, it is a tree of life.

Note, 1. Nothing is more grievous than the disappointment of a raised expectation, though not in the thing itself, by a denial, yet in the time of it by a delay; Hope deferred makes the heart sick and withers, fretful and peevish; but hope quite dashed kills the heart, and the higher the expectation was raised, the more cutting is the frustration of it. It is therefore our wisdom not to promise ourselves any great matters from the creature, nor to feed ourselves with any vain hopes from this world, lest we lay up matter for our own vexation; and what we do hope for let us prepare to be disappointed in, that, if it should prove so, it may prove the easier let us not be heavy.

2. Nothing is more grateful than to enjoy that, at last, which we have long wished and waited for;
When the desire does come, it puts men into a sort of paradise, a garden of pleasure, for it is a tree of life. It will aggravate the eternal misery of the wicked, that their hopes will be frustrated; and it will make the happiness of heaven the more welcome to the saints, that it is what they have earnestly longed for as the crown of their hopes.

13. Whoso despiseth the word shall be destroyed: but he that feareth the commandment shall be rewarded.

Here is, 1. The character of one that is marked for ruin; He that despiseth the word of God, and has no regard to it, no veneration for it, nor will be ruled by it, certainly he shall be destroyed; for he slights that which is the only means of curing a destructive disease, and makes himself obnoxious to that divine wrath which will certainly be his destruction. Those that prefer the rules of carnal policy before divine precepts, and the allurements of the world and the flesh before God’s promises and comforts, despise his word, giving the preference to those things that stand in competition with it; and it is to their own just destruction; they would not take warning.

2. The character of one that is sure to be happy; He that fears the commandment, that stands in awe of God, pays a deference to his authority, has a reverence for his word, is afraid of displeasing God, and incurring the penalties annexed to the commandment, he shall not only escape destruction, but shall be rewarded for his godly fear. In keeping the commandment there is great reward.

14. The law of the wise is a fountain of life, to depart from the snares of death.

By the law of the wise and righteous, here, we may understand, either the principles and rules by which they govern themselves, or (which comes all to one) the instructions which they give to others, which is to be as a law to all about them; and if they be so,

1. They will be constant springs of comfort and satisfaction as a fountain of life, sending forth streams of living water; the closer we keep to those rules, the more effectually we secure our own peace.

2. They will be constant preservatives from the temptations of Satan. They that follow the dictates of this law will keep at a distance from the snares of sin, and so escape the snares of death, which they run themselves into that forsake the law of the wise.

15. Good understanding giveth favour: but the way of transgressors is hard.

If we compare not only the end, but the way, we shall find that religion has the advantages for,

1. The way of saints is pleasant and agreeable; Good understanding gains favour with God and man; our Saviour grew in that favour, when he increased in wisdom. Those that conduct themselves prudently, and order their conversation aright in every thing, that serve Christ in righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost, are accepted of God and approved of men, Rom. xiv. 17, 18. And hence comfortably will that man pass through the world, who is well-understood, and is therefore well-accepted!

2. The way of sinners is rough and uneasy, and, for that reason, unpleasant to themselves, because unacceptable to others. It is hard, hard upon others; who complain of it, hard to the sinner himself, who can have little enjoyment of himself, while he is doing that which is disgusting to all mankind. The service of sin is perfect slavery, and the road to hell is strewed with thorns and thistles that are the products of the curse. Sinners labour in the very fire.

16. Every prudent man dealeth with knowledge: but a fool layeth open his folly.

Note, 1. It is wisdom to be cautious; Every prudent discreet man does all with knowledge, (considering with himself, and consulting with others,) acts with deliberation, and is upon the reserve; is careful not to meddle with that which he has not some knowledge of, nor to launch out into business which he has not acquainted himself with; will not deal with those that he has not some knowledge of, whether they may be confided in. He is still dealing in knowledge, that he may increase the stock he has.

2. It is folly to be rash, as the fool is, who is forward to talk of things he knows nothing of, and undertakes that which he is no way fit for, and so lays open his folly, and makes himself ridiculous. He began to build, and was not able to finish.

17. A wicked messenger falleth into mischief: but a faithful ambassador is health.

Here is, 1. The ill consequences of betraying a trust; A wicked messenger, who, being sent to negotiate any business, is false to him that employed him, divulges his counsels, and so defeats his designs, he cannot expect to prosper, but will certainly fall into some mischief or other, will be discovered and punished; since nothing is more hateful to God and man than the treachery of those that have a confidence reposed in them.

2. The happy effects of fidelity; An ambassador, who faithfully discharges his trust, and serves the interests of those who employ him, he is health, he is health to those by whom, and for whom, he is employed, heals differences that are between them, and preserves a good understanding; he is health to himself, for he secures his own interest. This is applicable to ministers, Christ’s messengers and ambassadors; those that are wicked and false to Christ, and the souls of men, do mischief, and fall into mischief; but those that are faithful will find sound words to be healing words to others and themselves.

18. Poverty and shame shall be to him that refuseth instruction: but he that regardeth reproof shall be honoured.

Note, 1. He that is so proud that he scorns to be taught, will certainly be abused; He that refuseth the good instruction offered him, as if it were a reflection upon his honour, and an abridgment of his liberty, poverty and shame shall be to him; he will become a beggar, and live and die in disgrace; every one will despise him as foolish, and stubborn, and ungodly.

2. He that is so humble that he takes it well to be told of his faults, shall certainly be exalted; He that regards a reproof, whoever gives it him, and will mend what is amiss when it is showed him, he gains respect as wise and candid; he avoids that which would be a disgrace to him, and is in a fair way to make himself considerable.

19. The desire accomplished is sweet to the soul: but it is abomination to fools to depart from evil.

This shows the folly of those that refuse instruction, for they might be happy, and will not.

1. They might be happy. There are in man strong desires of happiness; God has provided for the accomplishment of those desires, and that would be sweet to the soul, whereas the pleasures of sense are grateful only to the carnal appetite. The desire of good men toward the favour of God and spiritual blessings, brings that which is sweet to their souls:
we know those that can say so by experience. Ps. iv. 6, 7.

2. Yet they will not be happy; for it is an abomination to them to depart from evil, which is necessary to their being happy. Never let those expect any thing truly sweet to their souls that will not be persuaded to leave their sins, but that roll them under their tongues as a sweet morsel.

20. He that walketh with wise men shall be wise: but a companion of fools shall be destroyed.

Note, 1. Those that would be good must keep good company, which is an evidence for them that they would be good, (men's character is known by the company they choose,) and will be a means of making them good, of showing them the way, and of quickening and encouraging them in it. He that would be himself wise, must walk with those that are so, must choose such for his intimate acquaintance, and converse with them accordingly; must ask and receive instruction from them, and be pleased and profitable with them; (Ex. viii. 9.) Miss not the discourse of the elders, for they also learned of their fathers. And (ch. vi. 35.) Be willing to hear every godly discourse, and let not the parables of understanding escape thee.

2. Multiudes are brought to ruin by bad company: A companion of fools shall be broken, so some; shall be known, so the Seventy; known to be a fool, wisecurit ex socio—he is known by his company. He shall be like them, so some; will be made wicked, so others; it comes all to one; for all those, and those only, that make themselves wicked, will be destroyed; and those that associate with evil-doers are debauched, and so undone, and at last, ascribe their death to it.

21. Evil pursueth sinners: but to the righteous good shall be repaid.

Here see, 1. How unavoidable the destruction of sinners is; the wrath of God pursues them, and all the terrors of that wrath. Evil pursueth them close wherever they go, as the averger of blood pursued the manslayer, and they have no city of refuge to flee to; they attempt an escape, but in vain. Whom God pursues he is sure to overtake. They may prosper for awhile, and grow very secure, but their damnation slumbers not, though they do.

2. How indefeasible the happiness of the saints is; the God that cannot lie has engaged that to the righteous good shall be repaid; they shall be abundantly recompensed for all the good they have done, and all the ill they have suffered, in this world; so that, though many have been losers for their righteousness, they shall not be losers by it. Though the recompense do not come quickly, it will come in the day of payment, in the world of retribution; and it will be an abundant recompense.

22. A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children: and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just.

See here, 1. How a good man's estate lasts; he leaves an inheritance to his children's children. It is part of his praise that he is thoughtful for posteriety; that he does not lay all out upon himself, but is in care to do well for those that come after him; not by withholding more than is meet, but by a prudent and decent frugality. He trains up his children to this, that they may leave it to their children; and especially he is careful, both by justice and charity, to obtain the blessing of God upon what he has, and to entail that upon his children, without which the greatest industry and frugality will be in vain; A good man, by being good, and doing good, by honouring the Lord with his substance, and spending it in his service, secures it to his posterity; or, if he should not leave them much of this world's goods, his prayers, his instructions, his good example, will be the best entail; and the promises of the covenant will be an inheritance to his children's children, Ps. ciii. 17.

2. How it increases by the accession of the wealth of the sinner: for that is laid up for the just. If it be asked, How should good men grow so rich, who are not so eager upon the world as others are, and who commonly suffer for their well-doing? it is here answered, God, in his providence, often brings into their hands that which wicked people had laid up for themselves. The innocent shall divide the silver, Job xxxvii. 16, 17. The Israelites shall spoil the Egyptians, (Exod. xii. 36.) and eat the riches of the Gentiles, Isa. lx. 6.

23. Much food is in the tillage of the poor: but there is that is destroyed for want of judgment.

See here, 1. How a small estate may be improved by industry, so that a man, by making the best of every thing, may live comfortably upon it; Much food is in the tillage of the poor, the poor farmers, that have but a little, but take pains with that little, and husband it well. Many make it an excuse for their idleness, that they have but a little to work on, a very little to be doing with; but the less compass the field is of, the more let the skill and labour of the owner be employed about it, and it will turn to a very good account. Let him dig, and he needs not beg.

2. How a great estate may be ruined by indiscretion; There is that has a great deal, but it is destroyed and brought to nothing, for want of judgment, prudence in the management of it. Men over-build themselves, or over-buy themselves; keep greater company, or a better table, or more servants, than they can afford; suffer what they have to go to decay, and do not make the most of it; by taking up money themselves, or being bound for others, their estates are sunk, their families reduced, and all for want of judgment.

24. He that spareth his rod hatcheth his son: but he that loveth him chasteneth him betimes.

Note, 1. To the education of children in that which is good, there is necessary a due correction of them for what is amiss; every child of ours is a child of Adam, and therefore has that foolishness bound up in its heart which calls for rebuke, more or less; the rod and reproof which give wisdom. Observe, It is his rod that must be used, the rod of a parent, directed by wisdom and love, and designed for good; not the rod of a servant.

2. It is good to begin betimes with the necessary restraints of children from that which is evil, before vicious habits are confirmed. The branch is easily bent when it is tender.

3. Those really hate their children, though they pretend to love them; if they do not keep them under a strict discipline, and by all proper methods, severe ones when gentle ones will not serve, make them sensible of their faults, and afraid of offending. They abandon them to their worst enemy, to the most dangerous disease, and therefore hate them. Let this reconcile children to the correction their good parents give them; it is from love, and for their good, Heb. xii. 7—9.

25. The righteous eateth to the satisfying of his soul: but the belly of the wicked shall want.
Note, 1. It is the happiness of the righteous that they shall have enough, and that they know when they have enough. They desire not to be surfeited, but, being moderate in their desires, they are soon satisfied. Nature is content with a little, and grace with less; enough is as good as a feast. They that feed on the bread of life, that feast on the promises, meet with abundant satisfaction of soul there, eat, and are filled.

2. It is the misery of the wicked, that, through the insatiableness of their own desires, they are always needy; not only their souls shall not be satisfied with the world and the flesh, but even their belly shall want, their sensual appetite is always craving. In hell they shall be denied a drop of water.

CHAP. XIV.

1. EVERY wise woman buildeth her house: but the foolish plucketh it down with her hands.

Note. 1. A good wife is a great blessing to a family; by a fruitful wife a family is multiplied and replenished with children, and so built up; but by a prudent wife, one that is pious, industrious, and considerate, the affairs of the family are made to prosper, debts are paid, portions raised, provision made, the children well educated and maintained, and the family has comfort within doors and credit without; thus is the house built. She looks upon it as her own to take care of, though she knows it is her husband's to bear rule in, Esth. i. 22.

2. Many a family is brought to ruin by ill housewifery, as well as by ill husbandry: A foolish woman, that has no fear of God, nor regard to her business, that is, wilful, and wasteful, and humour-some; that indulges her ease and appetite, and is all for juasting and feasting, cards and the play-house, though she came to a plentiful estate, and to a family beforehand, she will impoverish and waste it, and all as comes to the ruin of her house as if she flucked it down with her hands; and the husband himself, with all his care, can scarcely prevent it.

2. He that walketh in his uprightness feareth the Lord: but he that is perverse in his ways despiseth him.

Here are, 1. Grace and sin in their true colours. Grace reigning is a reverence of God, and gives honour to him who is infinitely great and high, and to whom all honour is due, than which what is more becoming, or should be more pleasing, to the rational creature? Sin reigning is no less than a contempt of God; in this, more than in any thing, sin appears exceeding sinful, that it desipes God, whom angels adore. They that despise God's precepts, and will not be ruled by them, his promises, and will not accept of them, despise God himself, and all his attributes.

2. Grace and sin in their true light. By this we may know a man that has grace, and the fear of God, reigning in him; he walketh in his uprightness, he makes conscience of his actions, is faithful both to God and man, and every stop he makes, as well as every step he takes, is by rule; here is one that honours God. But, on the contrary, he that is perverse in his ways, that wilfully follows his own appetites and passions, that is unjust and dishonest, and contradicts his profession in his conversation; however he may pretend to devotion, he is a wicked man, and will be reckoned with as a desipser of God himself.

3. In the mouth of the foolish is a rod of pride: but the lips of the wise shall preserve him.

See here, 1. A proud fool exposing himself. Where there is pride in the heart, and no wisdom in the head to suppress it, it commonly shows itself in the words; In the mouth there is pride, proud boasting, proud cursing, proud scolding, proud commanding, and giving law; this is the rod, or breach of pride; the word is used only here and Is. xi. 1. It grows from that root of bitterness which is in the heart; it is a rod from that stem. The root must be plucked up, or we cannot conquer this branch; or it is meant of a smiting, beating rod; a rod of pride, which strikes others. The proud man with his tongue lays about him, and deals blows at pleasure, but it will one day be a rod to himself; the proud man shall one day come under an ignominious correction by the words of his own mouth; not cut as a soldier, but caned as a servant; and herein he will be beaten with his own rod, Ps. lxxv. 8.

2. A humble wise man saving himself, and consulting his own good; The lips of the wise shall preserve them from doing that mischief to others which proud men do with their tongues, and from bringing that mischief on themselves which haughty scorners are often involved in.

4. Where no oxen are, the crib is clean: but much increase is by the strength of the ox.

Note. 1. The neglect of husbandry is the way to poverty; Where no oxen are, to till the ground and tread out the corn, the crib is empty, is clean, there is no straw for the cattle, and consequently no bread for the service of man. Scarcity is represented by clearness of teeth, Amos iv. 6. Where no oxen are, there is nothing to be done at the ground, and therefore nothing to be had out of it; the crib indeed is clean from dung, which pleases the neat and nice, that cannot endure husbandry, because there is so much dirty work in it, and therefore will sell their oxen to keep the crib clean; but then not only the labour, but even the dung, of the ox is wanted. This shows the folly of these who addict themselves to the pleasures of the country, but do not mind the business of it; who (as we say) keep more horses than kine, more dogs than swine; their families must needs suffer by it.

2. Those who take pains about their ground are likely to reap the profit of it; those who keep that about them which is for use and service, not for state and show, more husbands than footmen, they are likely to thrive. Much increase is by the strength of the ox, that is made for our service, and is profitable alive and dead.

5. A faithful witness will not lie: but a false witness will utter lies.

In the administration of justice, much depends upon the witnesses, and therefore it is necessary to the common good that witnesses be principled as they ought to be; for,

1. A witness that is conscientious, will not dare to give in a testimony that is in the least untrue; nor, for good-will or ill-will, represent a thing otherwise than according to the best of his knowledge, whoever is pleased or displeased; and then judgment runs down like a river.

2. But a witness that will be bribed, and bisected, and brow-beat, will utter lies, (and not stick or startle at it,) with as much readiness and assurance as if it were all true.

6. A scorner seeketh wisdom, and findeth it not: but knowledge is easy unto him that understandeth.

Note. 1. The reason why some people seek wisdom, and do not find it, is, because they do not seek it from a right principle, and in a right manner.
They are scorner, and it is in scorn that they ask instruction, that they may ridicule what is told them, and may cavil at it. Many put questions to Christ, tempting him, and that they might have whereof to accuse him, but they were never the wiser. No marvel, if they who seek wisdom, as Simon Magus sought the gifts of the Holy Ghost, to serve their pride and covetousness, do not find it, for they seek anis. Herod desired to see a miracle, but he was a sorer, and therefore it was denied him, Luke xix. 8. Scorner speed not in prayer.

2. To those who understand themselves aright, who depart from evil, for that is understanding, the knowledge of God and of his will is easy. The parables which harden scorner in their scorning, and make divine things more difficult to them, enlighten those who are willing to learn, and make the same things more plain and intelligible and familiar to them, Matt. xiii. 11, 15, 16. The same word which to the scornful is a savour of death unto death, to the humble and serious is a savour of life unto life. He that understands, so as to depart from evil, (for that is understanding,) to quit his prejudices, to lay aside all corrupt dispositions and affections, will easily apprehend instruction, and receive the impressions of it.

7. Go from the presence of a foolish man, when thou perceivest not in him the lips of knowledge.

See here, 1. How we may discern a fool, and discover him; a wicked man, for he is a foolish man, if we desire not in him the lips of knowledge, if we find there is no relish or savour of piety in his discourse, that his communication is all corrupt and corrupting, and nothing in it good and to the use of edifying, we may conclude the treasure is bad.

2. How we must decline such a one, and depart from him; Go from his presence, for thou perceivest there is no good to be gotten by his company, but danger of getting hurt by it. Sometimes the only way we have of proving wicked discourse and witnessing against it, is, by leaving the company and going out of hearing of it.

3. The wisdom of the prudent is to understand his way: but the folly of fools is deceit.

See here, 1. The good conduct of a wise and good man; he manages himself well. It is not the wisdom of the learned, which consists only in speculation, that is here commended, but the wisdom of the prudent, which is practical, and is of use to direct our counsels and actions. Christian prudence consists in right understanding of our way; for we are travellers, whose concern it is, not to spy wonders, but to get forward towards their journey's end. It is to understand our own way, not to be critics and busy-bodies in other men's matters, but to look well to ourselves, and ponder the path of our feet; to understand the directions of our way, that we may observe them; the dangers of our way, that we may avoid them; the difficulties of our way, that we may break through them; and the advantages of our way, that we may improve them: to understand the rules we are to walk by, and the ends we are to walk toward, and walk accordingly.

2. The bad conduct of a bad man; he puts a cheat upon himself, he does not rightly understand his way, he thinks he does, and so misses his way, and goes on in his mistake; The folly of fools is deceit, it cheats them into their own ruin. The folly of him that built on the sand was deceit.

9. Fools make a mock at sin: but among the righteous there is favour.

See here, 1. How wicked people are hardened in their wickedness; they make a laughing matter of the sins of others, making themselves and their companions merry with that for which they should mourn; and they make a light matter of their own sins, both when they are tempted to sin, and when they have committed it; they call evil good, and good evil, (Isa. v. 20.) turn it off with a jest, rush into sin, (Jer. viii. 6.) and say they shall be at peace, though they go on: they care not what mischief they do by their sins, and laugh at those that tell them of it. They are advocates for sin, and are ingenious at framing excuses for it.

Fools make a mock at the sin-offering, so some; that they make light of sin make light of Christ. They are fools that make light of sin, for they make light of that which God complains of, (Amos ii. 13.) which lay heavy upon Christ, and which they themselves will have other thoughts of shortly.

2. How good people are encouraged in their goodness; Among the righteous there is favour; if they in any thing offend, they presently repent, and obtain the favour of God. They have a good-will one to another; and among them, in their societies, there is mutual charity and compassion in cases of offences, and no mocking.

10. The heart knoweth his own bitterness; and a stranger doth not intermeddle with his joy.

This agrees with 1 Cor. ii. 11. What man know\ the things of a man, and the changes of his temper, save the spirit of a man?

1. Every man feels most from his own burthen, especially that which is a burthen upon the spirits, for that is commonly concealed, and the sufferer keeps it to himself. We must not censure the griefs of others, for we know not what they feel, their sorrow perhaps is heavier than their groaning.

2. Many enjoy a secret pleasure, especially in some conditions, which others are not aware of, much less are sharers in. As the sorrows of a penitent, so the joys of a believer, are such as a stranger does not intermeddle with, and therefore is no competent judge of.

11. The house of the wicked shall be overthrown: but the tabernacle of the upright shall flourish.

Note, 1. Sin is the ruin of great families; The house of the wicked, though built ever so strong and high, shall be overthrown, shall be brought to poverty and disgrace, and at length be extinct. His hope for heaven, the house on which he leans, shall not stand, but fail in the storm; the deluge that comes will sweep it away.

2. Righteousness is the rise and stability even of mean families; Even the tabernacle of the upright, though moveable and despicable as a tent, shall flourish in outward prosperity, if Infinite Wisdom see good; at all events, in graces and comfort, which are true riches and honours.

12. There is a way which seemeth right unto a man; but the end thereof are the ways of death.

We have here an account of the way and end of a great many self-deluded souls.

1. Their way is seemingly fair; it seems right to themselves; they please themselves with a fancy that they are as they should be, that their opinions and practices are good, and such as will bear them out. The way of ignorance and carelessness, the way of worldliness and earthly-mindedness, the way of sensuality and flesh-pleasing, seem right to those that walk in them; much more, they imagine, one that will promise payment; those are simple who thus believe every word, forgetting that all men, in some sense, are liars, in comparison with God, all whose words we are to believe with an implicit faith, for he cannot lie.

2. It is wisdom to be cautious; The prudent man will try before he trusts, will weigh both the credibility of the witness, and the probability of the testimony, and then give judgment as the thing appears, or suspend his judgment till it appears.

Prove all things, and believe not every spirit.

16. A wise man feareth, and departeth from evil: but the fool rageth, and is confiderent.

Note. 1. Holy fear is an excellent guard upon every holy thing, and against every thing that is unholy. It is wisdom to depart from evil, from the evil of sin, and thereby from all other evil; and therefore it is wisdom to fear, to be jealous over ourselves with a godly jealousy, to keep up a dread of God's wrath, to be afraid of coming near the borders of sin, or dallying with the beginnings of it.

A wise man, for fear of harm, keeps out of harm's way, and starts back in a fright when he finds himself entering into temptation.

He that is soon angry dealteth foolishly; and a man of wicked devices is hated.

Note. 1. Passionate men are justly laughed at; Men who are peevish and touchy, and are soon angry upon every least provocation, deal foolishly, they say and do that which is ridiculous, and so expose themselves to contempt; they themselves cannot but be ashamed of it when the heat is over. The censure of this way, should engage our first, especially who are in reputation for wisdom and honour, with the utmost care to bridle their passion.

2. Malicious men are justly dreaded and detested, for they are much more dangerous and mischiefful to all societies; A man of wicked devices, who stifles his resentments till he has an opportunity of being avenged, and is secretly plotting how to wrong his neighbour, and to do him an ill turn, as Cain to kill Abel, such a man as this is hated by mankind. The character of an angry man is pitiable; through the surprise of a temptation he disturbs and disgraces himself, but it is soon over, and he is sorry for it; but that of a spiteful revengeful man is odious, there is no fence against him, no care for him.

18. The simple inherit folly: but the prudent are crowned with knowledge.

Note. 1. Sin is the shame of sinners; The simple, who love simplicity, get nothing by it, they inherit folly, they have it by inheritance, so some. The commonwealth of nature is derived from our first parents, and all the calamities that attend it we have by kind; it was the inheritance they transmitted to their degenerate race, an hereditary disease. They are as fond of it as a man of his inheritance, held it as fast, and are as loath to part with it. What they value themselves upon is really foolish; and what will be the issue of their simplicity but folly? They will for ever rue their own foolish choices.
2. Wisdom is the honour of the wise; The prudent crown themselves with knowledge, they look upon it as their brightest ornament, and there is nothing they are so ambitious of; they bind it to their heads as a crown, which they will bear, to mean part with; they press upon the top and perfection of knowledge, which will crown their beginnings and progress. They shall have the praise of it; wise heads shall be respected as if they were crowned heads. They crown knowledge, (so some read it,) they are a credit to their profession; wisdom is not only justified, but glorified, of all her children.

19. The evil bow before the good; and the wicked at the gates of the righteous.

That is, 1. The wicked are oftentimes impoverished and brought low, so that they are forced to beg, their wickedness having reduced them to straits, while good men, by the blessing of God, are enriched, and enabled to give, and do give, even to the evil, for where God grants life, we must not deny a livelihood.

2. Sometimes God extorts, even from bad men, an acknowledgment of the excellency of God’s people. The evil ought always to bow before the good, and so some are made to do, that God has loved them, Rev. iii. 9. They desire their favour, (Esth. vii. 7.) their prayers, 2 Kings, ii. 12.

3. There is a day coming when the upright shall have the dominion; (Ps. xliv. 14.) when the foolish virgins shall come begging to the wise for oil, and shall knock in vain at that gate of the Lord at which the righteous entered.

20. The poor is hated even of his own neighbour: but the rich hath many friends.

This shows not what should be, but what is, the common way of the world—to be shy of the poor, and fond of the rich.

1. Few will give countenance to those whom the world frowns upon, though otherwise worthy of respect; The poor, who should be pitied, and encouraged, and relieved, is hated, looked strange upon, and kept at a distance, even by his own neighbour, with mean grace, not only to himself, but with him, and pretended to have a kindness for him. Most are swallow-friends that are gone in winter. It is good having God our Friend, for he will not desert us when we are poor.

2. Every one will make court to those whom the world smiles upon, though otherwise unworthy; The rich have many friends, friends to their riches, in hope to get something out of them. There is little friendship in the world but what is governed by self interest, which is no true friendship at all, nor what a wise man will either value himself on, or put any confidence in. Those that make the world their god, idolize them that have most of its good things, and seek their favour, as if indeed they were Heaven’s favourites.

21. He that despiseth his neighbour sinneth: but he that hath mercy on the poor, happy is he.

See here how men’s character and condition are measured and judged of, by their conduct toward their poor neighbours.

1. Those that look upon them with contempt, have here assigned them a bad character, and their condition will be accordingly. He that despises his neighbour because he is low in the world, because he is of a mean extraction, rustie education, and makes but a mean figure, that thinks it below him to take notice of him, converse with him, or concern himself about him, and sets him with the dogs of his flock, he is a sinner, is guilty of a sin, is in the way to worse, shall be dealt with as a sinner, unhappy is he.

2. Those that look upon them with compassion are here said to be in a good condition, according to their character. He that has mercy on the poor, is ready to do all the good offices he can to him, and thereby puts an honour upon him, happy is he; he does that which is pleasing to God, which he himself will afterward reflect upon with great satisfaction, for which the losses of the poor will bless him, and which will be abundantly recompensed in the resurrection of the just.

22. Do they not err that devise evil? but mercy and truth shall be to them that devise good.

See here, 1. How miserably mistaken they are, they not only do evil, but devise it: Do they not err? Yes, certainly they do, every one knows it. They think that by sinning with craft and contrivance, and carrying on their intrigues with more plot and artifice than others, they shall make a better hand of their sins than others do, and come off better; but they are mistaken. God’s justice cannot be out witted. They that devise evil against their neighbours greatly err, for it will certainly turn upon themselves, and end in their own ruin; a fatal error!

2. How willingly they consult their own interest, that not only do good, but devise it; Mercy and truth shall be to them; not a reward of debt, (they will own that they merit nothing,) but a reward of mercy, mere mercy, according to the promise, mercy and truth, to which God is pleased to make himself a Debtor. Those that are so liberal as to devise liberal things, that seek opportunities of doing good, and contrive how to make their charity most extensive, and most acceptable to those that need it, by liberal things they shall stand, Isa. xxxii. 8.

23. In all labour there is profit: but the talk of the lips lendeth only to penury.

Note, 1. Working without talking, will make men rich; In all labour of the head, or of the hand, there is profit, it will turn to some good account or other. Industrious people are generally thriving people, and where there is something done, there is something to be had. The stirring hand gets wealth. It is good therefore to keep in business, and to keep in action, and what our hand finds to do, to do it with all our might.

2. Talking, without working, will make men poor. Those that love to boast of their business, and make a noise about it, and that waste their time in tittle-tattle, in telling and hearing new things, like the Athenians, and, under the pretence of improving themselves by conversation, neglect the work of their place and day, they waste what they have, and the course they take, tends to penury, and will end in it. It is true in the affairs of our souls; those that take pains in the service of God, that strive earnestly in prayer, will find profit in it. But if men’s religion runs all out in talk and noise, and their praying is only the labour of the lips, they will be spiritually poor, and come to nothing.

24. The crown of the wise is their riches: but the foolishness of fools is folly.

Observe, 1. If men be wise and good, riches make them so much the more honourable and useful, The crown of the wise is their riches; their riches make them to be so much the more respected, and give them the more authority and influence upon others. They that have wealth, and wisdom to use it, will have a great opportunity of honouring God and doing good in the world. Wisdom is good without an inheritance, but better with it.

2. If men be wicked and corrupt, their wealth will but the more expose them; The foolishness of fools, put them in what condition you will, is folly, and will show itself, and shame them; if they have riches, they do mischief with them, and are the more hardened in their foolish practices.

25. A true witness delivereth souls: but a deceitful witness speaketh lies.

See here, 1. How much praise is due to a faithful witness; He delivers the souls of the innocent who are falsely accused, and their good names, which are as dear to them as their lives. A man of integrity will venture the displeasure of the greatest, to bring truth to light, and rescue those who are injured by falsehood. A faithful minister, who truly witnesses for God against sin, is thereby instrumental to deliver souls from eternal death.

2. How little regard is to be had to a false witness; he forges lies, and yet pours them out with the greatest assurance imaginable for the destruction of the innocent. It is therefore the interest of a nation, by all means possible, to detect and punish false witness-bearing; yea, and lying in common conversation; for truth is the cement of society.

26. In the fear of the Lord is strong confidence; and his children shall have a place of refuge. 27. The fear of the Lord is a fountain of life, to depart from the snares of death.

In these two verses, we are invited and encouraged to live in the fear of God, by the advantages which attend a religious life; the fear of the Lord is here put for all gracious principles, producing gracious practices.

1. Where this reigns it produces a holy security and serenity of mind; there is in it a strong confidence, it enables a man still to hold fast both his purity and his peace, whatever happens, and gives him boldness before God and the world. I know that I shall be justified; None of these things move me; such is the language of this confidence.

2. It entails a blessing upon posterity. The children of them that by faith make God their Confidence, shall be encouraged, by the promise that God will be a God to believers, and to their seed, to fly to him as their Refuge, and they shall find shelter in him. The children of religious parents often do the better for their parents’ instructions and example, and fare the better for their faith and prayers. Our fathers trusted in thee, therefore we will.

3. It is an overflowing, overflowing, spring of comfort and joy; it is a fountain of life, yielding constant streams of blessing to the soul; joy, peace, and grace are pure and fresh are life to the soul, and quench that thirst, and can never be drawn dry; it is a well of living water that is springing up to, and is the earnest of, eternal life.

4. It is a sovereign antidote against sin and temptation. Those that have a true relish of the pleasures of serious godliness, will not be allure by the baits of sin to swallow its hook; they have better things than any it can pretend to offer; and therefore it is easy to them to depart from the snares of death, and to keep their feet from being taken in them.

28. In the multitude of people is the king’s honour: but in the want of people is the destruction of the prince.

Here are two maxims in politics, which carry their own evidence with them.

1. That it is much for the honour of a king to have a populous kingdom; it is a sign that he rules well, since strangers are hereby invited to come and settle under his protection, and his own subjects live comfortably; it is a sign that he and his kingdom are under the blessing of God, the effect of which is, being fruitful and multiplying. It is his strength, and makes him considered and formidable; happily the king, the father of his country, who has his quiver full of arrows, he shall not be ashamed, but shall speak with his enemy in the gate, Ps. cxvii. 4. 5. It is therefore the wisdom of princes, by a mild and gentle government, by encouraging trade and husbandry, and by making all easy under them, to promote the increase of their people. And let all that wish well to the kingdom of Christ, and to his honour, do what they can in their places, that many be added to his church.

2. That when the people are lessened, the prince is weakened; In the want of people is the leanness of the prince; so some read it; trade lies dead, the ground lies unsettled, the army wants to be recruited, the navy to be manned, and all because there are not hands sufficient. See how much the honour and safety of kings depend upon their people, which is a reason why they should rule by love, and not with fear.

Princes are corrected by those judgments which abate the number of the people, as we find, 2 Sam. xxiv. 13.

29. He that is slow to wrath is of great understanding: but he that is hasty of spirit exalteth folly.

Note. 1. Meekness is wisdom. He rightly understands himself, and his duty and interest, the infinitudes of human nature, and the constitution of human society, who is slow to anger, and knows how to excuse the faults of others as well as his own, how to adjourn his resentments, and moderate them, so as by no provocation to be out of the possession of his own soul. A mild patient man is really to be accounted an intelligent man, one that learns of Christ, who is Wisdom itself.

2. Unbridled passion is folly proclaimed; He that is hasty of spirit, whose heart is tender to every spark of provocation, that is all fire and tow, as we say, he thinks hereby to magnify himself, and make himself welcome and in love of him, whereas really he exalts his own folly, he makes it known, as that which is lifted up is visible to all, and he submits himself to it, as to the government of one that is exalted.

30. A sound heart is the life of the flesh: but envy the rottenness of the bones.

The foregoing verses showed how much our reputation, this, how much our health, depends on the good government of our passions, and the preserving of the temper of the mind.

1. A healing spirit, made up of love and meekness, a hearty, friendly, cheerful disposition, is the life of the flesh; it contributes to a good constitution of health, and is the safeguard of the soul.

2. A fruitsful, envious, discontented spirit, is its own punishment; it consumes the flesh, preys upon the animal spirits, makes the countenance pale, and is the rottenness of the bones; they that see the prosperity of others and are grieved, let them gnash with their teeth, and melt away, Ps. cxvi. 10.

31. He that oppresseth the poor reproacheth the Lord; whoever bursts for envy, let him burst.

Proverbs.

1st his Maker: but he that honourth him hath mercy on the poor.

God is here pleased to interest himself more than one would imagine in the treatment of the poor.

1. He reckons himself affronted in the injuries that are done them. Whosoever he be that wrongs a poor man, taking advantage against him, because he is poor and cannot help himself, let him know that he puts an affront upon his Maker. God made him, and gave him his being, the same that is the Author of our being; we have all one Father, one Maker; see how Job considered this, Job xxxi. 15. God made him poor, and appointed him his lot, so that if we deal hardly with any because they are poor, we reflect upon God as dealing hardly with them, in laying them low, that they might be trampled upon.

2. He reckons himself honoured in the kindnesses that are done them; he takes them as done to himself, and will show himself accordingly pleased with them; I was hungry, and ye gave me meat. Those therefore that have any true honour for God, will show it by compassion to the poor, whom he has undertaken in a special manner to protect and preserve.

32. The wicked is driven away in his wickedness: but the righteous hath hope in his death.

Here is, 1. The desperate condition of a wicked man when he goes out of the world; he is driven away in his wickedness; he cleaves so close to the world, that he cannot find in his heart to leave it, but is driven away out of it; his soul is required, is forced from him, and sin cleaveth so close to him, that it is inseparable, it goes with him into another world; he is driven away in his wickedness, dies in his sins, under the guilt and power of them, unjustified, unsanctified; his wickedness is the storm in which he is hurried away, as chaff before the wind, closed out of the world.

2. The comfortable condition of a godly man when he finishes his course; He has hope in his death, of a happiness on the other side death, of better things in another world than ever he had in this. They have the grace of hope in them, though they have pain, and some dread of death; they have before them the good hoped for, even the blessed hope, which God, who cannot lie, has promised.

33. Wisdom resteth in the heart of him that hath understanding: but that which is in the midst of fools is made known.

Observe, 1. Modesty is the badge of wisdom. He that is truly wise hides his treasure, so as not to boast of it, (Matth. xiii. 44.) though he does not hide his talent, so as not to trade with it. His wisdom rests in his heart, he digests what he knows, and has it ready to him, but does not unseasonably talk of it, and make a noise with it. The heart is the seat of the affection, and there wisdom must rest in the practical love of it, and not swim in the head.

2. Openness and ostentation are a mark of folly. If fools have a little smattering of knowledge, they take all occasions, though very foreign, to produce it, and bring it in by head and shoulders. Or, the folly that is in the midst of fools is made known by their forwardness to talk. Many a foolish man takes more pains to show his folly than a wise man thinks it worth his while to take to show his wisdom.

34. Righteousness exalteth a nation: but sin is a reproach to any people.

Note, 1. Justice, reigning in a nation, puts an honour upon it; A righteous administration of the government, impartial equity between man and man, public countenance given to religion, the general practice and profession of virtue, the protecting and preserving of virtuous men, charity and compassion to strangers, (alms are sometimes called righteousness,) these exalt a nation, they uphold the throne, elevate the people's minds, and qualify a nation for the favour of God, which will make them high, as a holy nation, Deut. xxvi. 19.

2. Vice, reigning in a nation, puts disgrace upon it. Sin is a reproach to any city or kingdom, and renders them despicable among their neighbours. The people of Israel were often instances of both parts of this observation; they were great when they were good, but when they forsook God, all about them insulted them, and trampled on them. It is therefore the interest and duty of princes to use their power for the suppression of vice and support of virtue.

35. The king's favour is toward a wise servant: but his wrath is against him that causeth shame.

This shows, that in a well-ordered court and government, smiles and favours are dispens'd among those that are employed in public trusts, according to their merits; Solomon lets them know he will go by that rule; 1. That those who behave themselves wisely shall be respected and preferred, whatever enemies they may have, that seek to undermine them. No man's services shall be neglected to please a party or favourer. 2. That those who are selfish and false, who betray their country, oppress the poor, and sow discord, and thus cause shame, they shall be displaced, and banished the court, whatever friends they may make to speak for them.

1. A SOFT answer turneth away wrath: but grievous words stir up anger.

Solomon, as conservator of the public peace, here tells us, 1. How the peace may be kept, that we may know how in our places to keep it; it is by soft words. If wrath be risen like a threatening cloud, pregnant with storms and thunder, a soft answer will dispense it and turn it away. When men are provoked, speak gently to them, and give them good words, and they will be pacified; as the Ephraimites were by Gideon's mildness, (Judg. viii. 1. 3.) whereas, upon a like occasion, by Jephthah's roughness, they were exasperated, and the consequences were bad, Judg. xii. 1. 3. Reason will be better spoken, and a righteous cause better pleaded, with meekness than with passion; hard arguments do best with soft words.

2. How the peace will be broken, that we, for our parts, may do nothing toward the breaking of it. Nothing stirs up anger and sows discord, like grievous words, calling foul names, as Raca, and Thou fool, upbraiding men with their infirmities and infelicities, their extraction or education, or any thing that lessens them, and makes them mean; scornful, spiteful, reflections, by which men affect to show their wit and malice, and stir up the anger of others, which does but increase and inflame their own anger. Rather than lose a jest, some will lose a friend and make an enemy.

2. The tongue of the wise useth knowledge aright: but the mouth of fools poureth out foolishness.

Note, 1. A good heart, by the tongue, becomes very useful. He that has knowledge is not only to enjoy it for his own entertainment, but to use it, to use it aright, for the edification of others; and it is the tongue that must make use of it in pious, profitable discourse, in giving suitable and seasonable instructions, counsels, and comforts, with all possible expressions of humility and love, and then knowledge is used aright; and to him that has, and thus uses what he has, more shall be given.

2. A wicked heart, by the tongue, becomes very hurtful; for the mouth of fools pours out foolishness, which is very offensive; and the corrupt communication which proceeds from an evil treasure within, (the filthiness, and foolish talking, and jesting,) corrupts the good manners of some, and debauches them, and grieves the good hearts of others, and disturbs them.

3. The eyes of the Lord are in every place, beholding the evil and the good.

The great truths of divinity are of great use to enforce the precepts of morality, and none more than this—That the eye of God is always upon the children of men.

1. An eye to discern all; not only from which nothing can be concealed, but by which every thing is actually inspected, and nothing overlooked, or looked slightly upon; The eyes of the Lord are in every place; for he not only sees all from on high, (Ps. xxxii. 9,) but he is everywhere present. Any where are full of eyes, (Rev. iv. 8.) but God is all eye. It denotes not only his omniscience, that he sees all, but his universal providence, that he upholds and governs all. Secret sins, services, and sorrows, are under his eye.

2. An eye to distinguish both persons and actions; he beholds the evil and the good: is displeased with the evil, and approves of the good, and will judge men according to the sight of his eyes, Ps. i. 6.—xi. 4. The wicked shall not go unpunished, nor the righteous unrewarded, for God has his eye upon both, and knows their true character; this speaks as much comfort to saints as terror to sinners.

4. A wholesome tongue is a tree of life: but perverseness therein is a breath in the spirit.

Note, 1. A good tongue is healing; healing to wounded consciences, by comforting them; to sick souls, by convincing them; to peace and love when it is broken, by accommodating differences, compromising matters in variance, and reconciling parties at variance; this is the healing of the tongue, which is the tree of life, with which he has endowed his creatures, a sanctifying virtue, Rev. xxii. 2. He that knows how to discourse, will make the place he lives in a paradise.

2. An evil tongue is wounding; (perverseness, passion, falsehood, and filthiness there, are a breach in the spirit;) it wounds the conscience of the evil speaker, and occasions either guilt or grief to the hearers, and both are to be reckoned breaches in the spirit. Hard words indeed break no bones, but many a heart is wounded by them.

5. A fool despiseth his father’s instruction: but he that regardeth reproof is prudent.

Hence, 1. Let superiors be admonished to give instruction and reproof to those that are under their charge, as they will answer it in the day of account. They must not only instruct with the light of knowledge, but reprove with the heat of zeal; and both these must be done with the authority and affection of a father, and must be continued, though the descendent of grace be in immediately perceived. If the instruction be despised, give reproof, and rebuke sharply. It is indeed against the grain with good-humoured men to find fault, and make those about them uneasy; but better so, than to suffer them to go on undisputed in the way to ruin.

2. Let inferiors be admonished, not only to submit to instruction and reproof, (even hardships must be submitted to,) but to value them as favours, and not despise them; to make use of them for their comfort, and always to have a regard to them; this will be an evidence that they are wise, and a means of making them so; whereas he that slight his good education is a fool, and is likely to live and die one.

6. In the house of the rightous is much treasure: but in the revenues of the wicked is trouble.

Note, 1. Where righteousness is, riches are, and the comforts of them; In the house of the righteous is much treasure. Religion teaches men to be diligent, temperate, and just, and by these means, ordinarily, the estate is increased; but that is not all, God blesses the habituation of the just, and that blessing makes rich without trouble. Or, if there be not much of this world’s goods, yet, where there is grace, there is true treasure; and those who have but little, if they have a heart to be therewith content, and to enjoy the comfort of that little, it is enough; it is all riches. The righteous, perhaps, are not themselves enriched, but there is treasure in their house, a blessing in store, which their children after them may reap the benefit of. A wicked worldly man is only for having his belly filled with these treasures, his own sensual appetite gratified; (Ps. xvii. 14.) but a righteous man’s first care is for his soul, and then for his seed; to have treasure in his heart, and then in his house, which his relations and those about him may have the benefit of.

2. Where wickedness is, though there may be riches, yet there is vexation of spirit with them; In the revenues of the wicked, the great incomes they have, there is trouble; for there is guilt and a curse; there is pride and passion, and envy and contention, and those are troublesome lusts, which rob them of the joy of their revenues, and make them troublesome to their neighbours.

7. The lips of the wise disperse knowledge: but the heart of the foolish doeth not so.

This is to the same purport with v. 2, and shows what a blessing a wise man is, and what a burthen a fool is, to those about him. Only here observe further,

1. That we then use knowledge aright when we disperse it; not confine it to a few of our intimates, and grudge it to others who would make as good use of it, but give a portion of this spiritual alms to seven, and also to eight; not only be communicative, but communicate of this good, with humility and prudence. We must take pains to spread and propagate useful knowledge; must teach some, that they may teach others; and so it is dispersed.

2. That it is not only a fault to pour out foolishness, but it is a shame not to disperse knowledge; not to drop some wise word or other; The heart of the foolish doeth not so; it has nothing to disperse that is good; or, if it had, has neither skill nor will to do good with it, and therefore is little worth.

8. The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord: but the prayer of the upright is his delight.

Note, 1. God so hates wicked people, whose hearts are malicious, and their lives mischievous, that even their sacrifices are an abomination to him. God has sacrificed him even by wicked men, to stop the mouth of conscience, and to keep up their reputation in the world; as malefactors come to a sanctuary, not because it is a holy place, but because it shelters them from justice: but their sacrifices, though ever so costly, are not accepted of God, because they are offered in sincerity, nor from a good principle; they resemble with God, and in their conversations give the lie to their devotions, and, for that reason, they are an abomination to him, because they are made a cloak for sin, ch. vii. 14. See Isa. i. 11.

2. God has such a love for upright good people, that, though they are not at the expense of a sacrifice, (he himself has provided that,) their prayer is a delight to him. Praying garments are his own gift, and the work of his own Spirit in them, with which he is well pleased. He not only answers their prayers, but delights in their addresses to him, and in doing them good.

9. The way of the wicked is an abomination unto the Lord; but he loveth him that followeth after righteousness.

This is a reason of what was said in the foregoing verse. 1. The sacrifices of the wicked are an abomination to God; not for want of some nice points of ceremony, but because their way, the whole course and tenour of their conversations, is wicked, and consequently an abomination to him. Sacrifices for sin were not accepted of those that resolved to go on in sin; and were to the highest degree abominable, if intended to obtain a connivance at sin, and a permission to go on in it.

2. Therefore the prayer of the upright is his delight, because he is a friend of God, and he loves him who, though he have not yet attained, is following after, righteousness, aiming at it, and pressing towards it, as St. Paul, Phil. iii. 13.

10. Correction is grievous unto him that forsaketh the way: and he that hateth reproach shall die.

This shows, that those who cannot bear to be corrected, must expect to be destroyed.

1. It is common for those who have known the way of righteousness, but have forsaken it, to reckon a great affront to be reproved and admonished; they are very uneasy at it, they cannot, they will not, bear it; nay, because they hate to be reformed, they hate to be reproved, and hate those who deal faithfully and kindly with them. Of all sinners, reproofs are worst resented by apostates.

2. It is certain that those who will not be reproved will be ruined; He that hateth reproach, and hardens his heart against it, is joined to his idols, let him alone; he shall die, and perish for ever, in his sins, since he would not be parted from his sins; (2 Chron. xxvi. 16.) I know that God has determined to destroy thee, because thou couldst not bear to be reproved; see also ch. xxix. 1.

11. Hell and destruction are before the Lord; how much more then the hearts of the children of men?

This confirms what was said (v. 3.) concerning God's omniscience, in order to his judging of evil and good.

1. God knows all things, even those things that are hid from the eyes of all living; Hell and destruction are before the Lord; not only the centre of the earth, and its subterraneous caverns, but the grave, and all the dead bodies which are there buried out of our sight, they are all before the Lord, all under his eye, so that none of them can be lost, or be to seek when they are to be raised again. He knows where every man lies buried, even Moses, even those that are buried in the greatest obscurity, nor needs he any monument with a His base—Here he lies, to direct him. The place of the dammed in particular, and all their tombs, which are inexhaustible, the state of separate souls in general, and all their circumstances, are under God's eye. The word here used for destruction is Abaddon, which is one of the devil's names, Rev. ix. 11. That destroyer, though he deceive us, cannot evade or elude the divine cognizance. God examines him whence he comes, (Job i. 7.) and sees through all his disguises, though he is sly, and subtle, and swift, Job xxxvi. 6.

2. He knows particularly the hearts of the children of men. If he sees through the depths and wiles of Satan himself, much more can he search men's hearts, though they be deceitful, since they learned all their fraudulent arts of Satan. God is greater than our hearts, and knows them better than we know ourselves, and therefore is an infallible Judge of every man's character, Heb. iv. 13.

12. A scorner loveth not one that reproveth him; neither will he go unto the wise.

A scorner is one that not only makes a jest of God and religion, but bids defiance to the methods of his conviction and reformation; and, as an evidence of that,

1. He cannot endure the checks of his own conscience, nor will he suffer it to deal plainly with him; He loves not to reprovet; some read it. He cannot endure to retire into his own heart, and commune seriously with the soul; he will not admit of any frank thought or fair reasoning with himself, nor let his own heart smite him, if he can help it. That man's case is sad who is afraid of being acquainted, and of arguing, with himself.

2. He cannot endure the advice and admonitions of his friends; He will not go unto the wise, lest they should give him wise counsel. We ought not only to bid the wise welcome when they come to us, but to go to them, as beggars to the rich man's door for an alms; but this the scorner will not do, for fear of being told of his faults, and prevailed with to reform.

13. A merry heart maketh a cheerful countenance: but by sorrow of heart the spirit is broken.

Here, 1. Harmless mirth is recommended to us, as that which contributes to the health of the body, making men lively, and fit for business, and to the acceptableness of the conversation, making the face to shine, and rendering us pleasant to one another. A cheerful spirit, under the government of wisdom and grace, is a great ornament to religion, puts a further lustre upon the beauty of holiness, and makes men the more capable of doing good.

2. Hurtful melancholy is what we are cautioned against, as a great enemy to us, both in our devotion and in our conversation; By sorrow of the heart, when it has got dominion, and plays the tyrant, as it will be apt to do, if it be indulged awhile, the spirit is broken, it grows heavy and sunk, and becomes unfit for the service of God. The sorrow of the world works death. Let us therefore weep as though we wept not, in justice to ourselves, as well as in conformity to God and his providence.

14. The heart of him that hath understanding seeketh knowledge: but the mouth of fools feedeth on foolishness.

Here are two things to be wondered at,

1. A wise man not satisfied with his wisdom, but still seeking the increase of it; the more he has, the more he would have; The heart of him that has understand- ing rejoices so in the knowledge it has attained to, that it is still coveting more; and in the use of the means of knowledge is still labouring for more; growing in grace, and in the knowledge of Christ. Si dixisti, Sufficiat, peristit—If you say, I have enough, you are undone.

2. A God well satisfied with his folly, and not seeking further more of it. While a good man hungers after the solid satisfactions of grace, a carnal mind feasts on the gratifications of appetite and fancy. Vain mirth and sensual pleasures are its delight, and with these it can rest contented, flattering itself in these foolish ways.

15. All the days of the afflicted are evil: but he that is of a merry heart hath a continual feast.

See here what a great difference there is between the condition and temper of some and others of the children of men.

1. Some are much in affliction, and of a sorrowful spirit, and all their days are evil days, like those of old age, and days of which they say they have no pleasure in them. They eat in darkness, (Eccl. v. 17.) and never eat with pleasure, Job xxi. 25. How many are the afflictions of the afflicted in this world! Such are not to be censured or despised, but pitied and prayed for, succoured and comforted. It might have been our own lot, or may be yet, merry as we are at present.

2. Others enjoy great prosperity, and are of a cheerful spirit; and they have not only good days, but have a continual feast; and if in the abundance of all things, they serve God with gladness of heart, and it is off to the wheels of their obedience, (all this, and heaven too,) then they serve a good Master. But let not such feast without fear, a sudden change may come; therefore rejoice with trembling.

16. Better is little with the fear of the Lord, than great treasure and trouble therewith.

Better is a dinner of herbs where love is, than a stalled ox and hatred therewith.

Solomon had said in the foregoing verse, that he who has not a large estate, nor a great income, but a cheerful spirit, has a continual feast; Christian contentment, and joy in God, make the life easy and pleasant; now here he tells us what that is which is necessary to that cheerfulness of spirit, which will furnish a man with a continual feast, though he has but little in the world; holiness and love.

1. Holiness: A little, if we manage it, and enjoy it, in the fear of the Lord, if we keep a good conscience, and go on in the way of duty, and serve God faithfully with the little we have, will be more comfortable, and turn to a better account, than great treasure, and trouble therewith. Observe here, (1.) It is often the lot of those that fear God to have but a little of this world; the poor receive the gospel, and poor they still are, Jer. ii. 5. (2.) Those that have great treasure have often trouble therewith: it is so far from making them easy, that it increases their care and hurry. The abundance of the rich will not suffer them to sleep. (3.) If great treasure bring trouble with it, it is for want of the fear of God. If those that have great estates would do their duty with them, and then trust God with them, their treasure would not have so much trouble attending it. (4.) It is therefore far better, and more desirable, to have but little of the world, and to have it with a good conscience; to keep up communion with God, and enjoy him in it, and live by faith, than to have the greatest plenty, and live without God in the world.

2. Love; next to the fear of God, peace with all men is necessary to the comfort of this life. (1.) If brethren dwell together in unity, if they are friendly, and hearty, and pleasant, both in their daily meals and in more solemn entertainments, that will make a dinner of herbs a feast sufficient; though the fare be coarse, and the estate so small, that they may not afford, no better, yet love will sweeten it, and they may be as merry over it as if they had all dignities. (2.) If there be mutual charity and strife, though there be a whole ox for dinner, a fat ox, there can be no comfort in it; the leaven of malice, of hating and being hated, is enough to sour it all. Some refer it to him that makes the entertainment; better have a slender dinner, and be heartily welcome, than a table richly spread with a grudging evil eye.

The most sumptuous entertainment, presented with a sullen brow, would offend me; while the plainest repast, presented kindly, would delight me.

18. A wrathful man stirreth up strife: but he that is slow to anger appeaseth strife

Here is, 1. Passion the great makebate; thence come wars and fightings; anger strikes the fire which sets cities and churches into a flame; A wrathful man, with his peevish passion-tee reflections, stirs up strife, and sets people together by the ears; he gives occasion to others to quarrel, and takes the occasion that others give, though ever so trifling. When men carry their resentment too far, one evil still produces another.

2. Meekness the great peace-maker; He that is slow to anger, not only prevents strife, that it be not kindled, but appeaseth it, if it be already kindled, brings water to the flame, unites these again that were fallen out, and by gentle methods brings them to mutual concessions, for peace sake.

19. The way of the slothful man is as an hedge of thorns: but the way of the righte-ous is made plain.

See here, 1. Whence those difficulties arise, which men proceed to meet with in the way of their duty, and to be insuperable; they arise, not from any thing in the nature of the duty, but from the slothfulness of those that have really no mind to it. Those that have no heart to their work, pretend that their way is hedged up with thorns, and they cannot do their work at all; as if God were a hard Master, reaping where he had not sown; at least, that their way is strewed with thorns, that they cannot do their work without a great deal of hardship and danger; and therefore they go about it with as much reluctance as if they were to go barefoot through a thorny hedge.

2. How these imaginary difficulties may be conquered; an honest desire and endeavour to do our duty, will, by the grace of God, make it easy, and we shall find it strewed with roses; The way of the righteous is made plain; it is easy to tread, and not rough; easy to be hit, and not intricate.

20. A wise son maketh a glad father: but a foolish man despiseth his mother.

Observe here, 1. To the praise of good children, that they are the joy of their parents, who ought to have joy of them, having taken so much care and pains about them. And it adds much to the satisfaction of those that are good, if they have reason to think that they have been a comfort to their parents in their declining years, when evil days come.

2. To the shame of wicked children, that, by their wickedness, they put contempt upon their parents, slight their authority, and make an ill re quittal for their kindness; A foolish son despoils his mother, that had most sorrow with him, and perhaps had too much indulged him, which makes his sin, in despising her, the more sinful, and her sorrow the more sorrowful.

21. Folly is joy to him that is destitute of wisdom: but a man of understanding walketh uprightly.

Note. 1. It is the character of a wicked man, that he takes pleasure in sin; he has an appetite to the bait, and swallows it greedily, and has no dread of the hook, nor feels from it when he has swallowed it; Folly is joy to him, the folly of others is so, and his own folly, he sins, not only without regret, but with delight; not only repents not of it, but makes his boast of it: this is a certain sign of one that is graceless.

2. It is the character of a wise and good man, that he makes conscience of his duty. A fool lives at large, walks at all adventures, by no rule, acts with no sincerity or steadiness; but a man of understanding, the eyes of whose understanding are enlightened by the gospel, that have not a good understanding, have no understanding,) he walks uprightly, lives a sober, orderly, regular life, and studies in every thing to conform himself to the will of God; and this is a constant pleasure and joy to him. But what foolishness remains in him, or proceeds from him, at any time, it is a grief to him, and he is ashamed of it. By these characters we may try ourselves.

22. Without counsel purposes are disappointed: but in the multitude of counsellors they are established. See here, 1. Of what ill consequence it is to be precipitate and rash, and to act without advice; Men's purposes are disappointed, their measures broken, and they come short of their point, gain not their end, because they would not ask counsel about the way. If men will not take time and pains to deliberate with themselves, or are so confident of their own judgment, that they scorn to consult with others, they are not likely to bring any thing considerable to pass; circumstances defeat them, which, with a little consultation, might have been foreseen and obviated. It is a good rule, both in public and domestic affairs, to do nothing rashly, and of one's own head. Plus vident occi quam occidet—Many eyes see more than one. That often proves best which was least our own doing.

2. How much it will be for our advantage to ask the advice of our friends; In the multitude of counsellors, (provided they be discreet and honest, and will not give counsel with a spirit of contradiction,) purposes are established. Solomon's son made no use of this proverb, when he acquiesced not in the counsel of the old men, but, because he would have a multitude of counsellors, regarding number more than weight, advised with the young men.

23. A man hath joy by the answer of his mouth: and a word spoken in due season, how good is it!

Note. 1. Then we speak wisely, when we speak seasonably; The answer of the mouth will then be our credit and joy, when it is pertinent, and to the purpose, and is spoken in due season, when it is needed, and will be regarded, and, as we say, hits the joint. Many a good word comes short of doing the good it is designed to do, because, for want of being well-timed. Nor is any thing more the beauty of discourse than to have a proper answer ready off-hand, just when there is occasion for it, and it comes on well.

VOL. III.—4 U

2. If we speak wisely and well, it will redound to our own comfort, and to the advantage of others; A man has joy by the answer of his mouth; he may take a pleasure, but may by no means take a pride, in having spoken so acceptably and well, that the hearers admire him, and say, "How good is it, and how much good does it do?"

24. The way of life is above to the wise, that he may depart from hell beneath.

The way of wisdom and holiness is here recommended to us, 1. As very safe and comfortable; It is the way of life, the way that leads up to heaven, in which we shall find the joy and satisfaction which will be the life of the soul, and at the end of which we shall find the perfection of blessedness; be wise and live. It is the way to escape that misery which we cannot but see ourselves exposed to, and in danger of. It is to depart from hell beneath, from the snares of hell, the temptations of Satan, and all his wiles; from the pains of hell, that everlasting destruction which our sins have deserved.

2. As very sublime and honorable; it is above. A good man sets his affections on things above, and deals in those things; his conversation is in heaven, his way leads directly thither; there his treasure is, above, out of the reach of enemies, above the changes of this lower world. A good man is truly noble and great, his desires and designs are high, and he lives above the common rate of other men. It is above the capacity, and out of the sight, of foolish men.

25. The Lord will destroy the house of the proud: but he will establish the border of the widow.

Note. 1. Those that are elevated, God delights to abase, and commonly does it in the course of his providence; The proud, that magnify themselves, bid defiance to the God above them, and trample on all about them, they are such as God resists, and will destroy; not them only, but their houses, which they are proud of, and are confident of the continuance and perpetuity of. Pride is the ruin of multitudes.

2. Those that are dejected, God delights to support, and often does it remarkably; He will establish the border of the poor widows, which proud injurious men break in upon, and which the poor widow is not herself able to defend and make good. It is the honour of God to protect the weak, and appear for those that are oppressed.

26. The thoughts of the wicked are an abomination to the Lord: but the words of the pure are pleasant words.

The former part of this verse speaks of thoughts, the latter of words, but they come all to one; for thoughts are words to God, and words are judged of by the thoughts from which they proceed; so that, 1. The thoughts and words of the wicked, which are, like themselves, wicked, which aim at mischief, and have some ill tendency or other, they are an abomination to the Lord, he is displeased at them, and will reckon for them. The thoughts of wicked men, for the most part, are such as God hates, and are an offence to him, who not only knows the heart, and all that passes and repasses there, but requires the innermost and uppermost place in it.

2. The thoughts and words of the pure, being pure like themselves, clean, honest, and sincere, are pleasant words, and pleasant thoughts, well-pleasing to the holy God, who delights in purity.
It may be understood, both of their devotions to God, (the words of their mouth, the meditations of their heart, in prayer and praise, are acceptable to God, Ps. xix. 14.—lix. 13.) and of their discourses with men, tending to edification. Both are pleasant, when they come from a pure, a purified heart.

27. He that is greedy of gain troubleth his own house; but he that hateth gifts shall live.

Note, 1. Those that are covetous entail trouble upon their families; He that is greedy of gain, and therefore makes himself a slave to the world, rises up early, sits up late, and eats the bread of carefulness, in pursuit of it; he that hurries, and puts himself and all about him upon the stretch, in business, frets and vexes at every loss and disappointment, and quarrels with every body that stands in the way of his profit, he troubleth his own house, is a burthen and vexation to his children and servants. He that, in his greediness of gain, takes bribes, and uses unlawful ways of getting money, leaves a curse, with what he gets, to those that come after him, which, sooner or later, will bring trouble into the house, Hab. ii. 9, 10.

2. Those that are generous as well as righteous entail a blessing upon their families; He that hates gifts, that shakes his hands from holding the bribes that are thrust into his hand to pervert justice, and abhors all sinful indirect ways of getting money, that hates to be paltry and mercenary, and is willing, if there be occasion, to do good gratis, he shall live, he shall have the comfort of it, shall live in prosperity and reputation, his name and family shall live and continue.

28. The heart of the righteous studieth to answer; but the mouth of the wicked poureth out evil things.

Here is, 1. A good man proved to be a wise man, by this, that he governs his tongue well; he that does so, the same is a perfect man, Jam. iii. 2. It is part of the character of a righteous man, that, being convinced of the account he must give of his words, and of the good and bad influence of them upon others, he makes conscience of speaking truly, (it is his heart that answers, he speaks as he thinks, and dares not do otherwise, he speaks the truth in his heart, Ps. xxv. 2.) and of speaking pertinently and profitably, and therefore he studieth to answer, that his speech may be with grace, Neh. ii. 4.—v. 7.

2. A wicked man is proved to be a fool, by this, that he never heeds what he says, but his mouth poureth out evil things, to the dishonour of God and religion, his own reproach, and the hurt of others. Doubtless that is an evil heart which thus overflows with evil.

29. The Lord is far from the wicked; but he heareth the prayer of the righteous.

Note, 1. God sets himself at a distance from those that set him at defiance; The wicked say to the Almighty, Depart from us, and he is, accordingly, far from them; he does not manifest himself to them, has no communion with them, will not hear them, will not help them, no not in time of their need. They shall be for ever banished from his presence, and he will behold them afar off. Depart from me, ye cursed.

2. He will draw nigh to those in a way of mercy who draw nigh to him in a way of duty; He hears the prayer of the righteous, accepts it, is well-pleased with it, and will grant an answer of peace to it. It is the prayer of a righteous man that availeth much,
33. The fear of the Lord is the instruction of wisdom; and before honour is humility.

See here, how much it is our interest, as well as duty, to...

1. To submit to our God, and keep up a reverence for him; The fear of the Lord, as it is the beginning of wisdom, so is the instruction and correction of wisdom; the principles of religion, closely adhered to, will improve our knowledge, rectify our mistakes, and be the best and surest guide of our way. An awe of God upon our spirits will put us upon the wisest counsels, and chastise us when we say or do unwise things.

2. To stoop to our brethren, and keep up a respect for them. Where there is humility, there is a happy presage of honour, and preparative for it. Those that humble themselves shall be exalted here and hereafter.

CHAP. XVI.

1. THE preparations of the heart in man, and the answer of the tongue, is from the Lord.

As we read this, it teaches us a great truth, that we are not sufficient of ourselves to think or speak anything, of ourselves, that is wise and good, but that all our sufficiency is of God, who is with the heart and with the mouth, and works in us both to will and to do, Phil. ii. 13. Ps. x. 17. But most read it otherwise; The preparation of the heart is in man, he may contrive and design this and the other; but the answer of the tongue, not only the delivering of what he designed to speak, but the issue and success of what he designed to do, is of the Lord. That is, in short,

1. Man purposes; he has a freedom of thought, and a freedom of will, permitted him; let him form his projects, and lay his schemes, as he thinks best: but, after all,

2. God disposes; man cannot go on with his business without the assistance and blessing of God, who made man's mouth, and teaches us what we shall say. Nay, God easily can, and often does, cross men's purposes, and break their measures. It was a curse that was prepared in Balak's heart, but the answer of the tongue was a blessing.

2. All the ways of a man are clean in his own eyes; but the Lord weigheth the spirits.

Note. 1. We are all apt to be partial in judging of ourselves; All the ways of a man, all his designs, all his doings, are clean in his own eyes, and he sees nothing amiss in them, nothing for which to condemn himself, or which should make his projects prove otherwise than well; and therefore he is confident of success, and that the answer of the tongue shall be according to the expectations of the heart; but there is a great deal of pollution cleaving to our ways, which we are not aware of, or do not think so ill of as we ought.

2. The judgment of God concerning us, we are sure, is according to truth; He weigheth the spirits in a just and unerring balance, knows what is in us, and passes a judgment upon us accordingly, writing Tekel upon that which passed our scale with approbation, weighed in the balance, and found wanting; and by his judgment we must stand or fall. He not only sees men's ways, but tries their spirits, and we are as our spirits are.

3. Commit thy works unto the Lord, and thy thoughts shall be established.

Note. 1. It is a very desirable thing to have our thoughts established, and not tossed, and put into a hurry, by disquieting cares and fears; to go on in an even steady course of honesty and piety, not disturbed, or put out of frame, by any event or change; to be satisfied that all shall work for good, and issue well at last, and therefore to be always easy and sedate.

2. The only way to have our thoughts established, is, to commit our works to the Lord. The great concerns of our souls must be committed to the grace of God, with a dependence upon, and submission to, the conduct of that grace; (2 Tim. i. 12.) all our outward concerns must be committed to the providence of God, and to the sovereign, wise, and gracious purposes, designed by God, thy works upon the Lord, so the word is, roll the burden of thy care from thyself upon God, lay the matter before him by prayer, make known thy works unto the Lord, so some read it; not only the works of thy hand, but the workings of thy heart; and then leave it with him, by faith and dependence upon him, submission and resignation to him; the will of the Lord be done. We may then be easy, when we resolve, that whatever pleases God shall please us.

4. The Lord hath made all things for himself; yea, even the wicked for the day of evil.

Note. 1. That God is the first Cause, he is the Former of all things and all persons, the Fountain of being; he gave every creature the being it has, and appointed it its place. Even the wicked are his creatures, though they are rebels; he gave them those powers with which they fight against him, which aggravates their wickedness, that they will not let him that made them rule them, and therefore, though he made them, he will not save them.

2. That God is the last End. All is of him and from him, and therefore all is to him and for him. He made all according to his will, and for his praise; he designed to serve his own purposes by all his creatures, and he will not fail of his design: all are his servants. The wicked he is not glorified by, but he will be glorified upon. He makes no man wicked, but he made those who he foresaw would be wicked, yet he made them, (Gen. vi. 6.) because he knew how to get him honour upon them. See Rom. ix. 22. Or, as some understand it, he made the wicked to be employed by him as the instruments of his wrath in the day of evil, when he brings judgments on the world. He makes some use even of wicked men, as of other things, to be his sword, his hand, (Ps. xvi. 13, 14.) flagellum Dei—the scourge of God. The King of Babylon is called his servant.

5. Every one that is proud in heart is an abomination to the Lord: though hand join in hand, he shall not be unpunished.

Note. 1. The pride of sinners sets God against them. He that, being high in estate, is proud in heart, whose spirit is elevated with his condition, so that he becomes insolent in his conduct toward God and man, let him know, that though he adores himself, and others cares him, yet he is an abomination to the Lord; the great God despises him, the holy God detests him.

2. The power of sinners cannot secure them against God, though they strengthen themselves with both hands; though they may strengthen one another with their confederacies and combinations, joining forces against God, they shall not escape his righteous judgment; wo unto him that strives with his Maker, ch. xi. 21. Isa. xlv. 9.

6. By mercy and truth iniquity is purged: and by the fear of the Lord men depart from evil.
PROVERBS, XVI.

1. How the guilt of sin is taken away from us; by the mercy and truth of God, mercy in promising, truth in performing; the mercy and truth which kiss each other in Jesus Christ the Mediator; by the covenant of grace, in which mercy and truth shine so bright; by our mercy and truth, as the condition of the pardon, and a necessary qualification for it; by these, and not by the legal sacrifices, Mic. vi. 7, 8.

2. How the power of sin is broken in us; by the principles of mercy and truth commanding in us, the corrupt inclinations are purged out; so we may take the former part: however, by the fear of the Lord, and the influence of that fear, men depart from evil; they will not dare to sin against God, who keep up in their minds a holy dread and reverence of him.

7. When a man's ways please the Lord, he maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him.

Note, 1. God can turn foes into friends, when he pleases; he that has all hearts in his hand has access to men's spirits, and power over them, working insensibly, but irresistibly, upon them, can make a man's enemies to be at peace with him, change their minds, or force them into a feigned submission. He can slay all enmities, and bring those together that were at the greatest distance from each other.

2. He will do it for us, when we please him; if we make all our cares to be reconciled to God, and to keep ourselves in his love, he will incline those that had been envious towards us, and vexatious to us, to entertain a good opinion of us, and to become our friends. God made Esau to be at peace with Jacob, Abimelech with Isaac, and David's enemies to court his favour, and desire a league with Israel. The image of God appearing upon the righteous, and his particular loving kindness to them, are enough to recommend them to the respects of all, even of those that had been most prejudiced against them.

8. Better is a little with righteousness, than great revenues without right.

Here, 1. It is supposed that an honest good man may have but a little of the wealth of this world, all the righteous are not rich; that a man may have but little, and yet may be honest; though poverty is a temptation to dishonesty, (ch. xxx. 9.) yet not an invincible one. A man may grow rich, for a while, by fraud and oppression, may have great revenues, and those got, and kept, without right, may have no good title to them, nor make any good use of them.

2. It is maintained that a small estate, honestly come by, which a man is content with, enjoys comfortably, serves God with cheerfully, and puts to a right use, is much better, and more valuable, than a great estate ill got, and then ill kept, or ill spent. It carries with it more inward satisfaction, a better reputation with all that are wise and good, it will last longer; and will turn to a better account in the great day, when men will be judged, not according to what they had, but what they did.

9. A man's heart deviseth his way: but the Lord directeth his steps.

Man is here represented to us,

1. As a reasonable creature, that has the faculty of contriving for himself; His heart devises his way, designs an end, and projects ways and means leading to that end, which the inferior creatures, who are governed by sense and natural instinct, cannot do. The more shame for him, if he do not devise the way how to please God, and provide for his everlasting state.

2. As a depending creature, that is subject to the direction and dominion of his Maker; if men devise their way, so as to make God's glory their end, and his will their rule, they may expect that he will direct their steps by his Spirit and grace, so that they shall not miss their way, nor come short of their end. But, let men devise their worldly affairs after so politicly, and with ever so great a probability of success, yet God has the ordering of the event, and sometimes directs their steps to that which they least intended. The design of this is to teach us to say, If the Lord will, we shall live and do this or that, (Jam. iv. 14, 15.) and to have our eye to God, not only in the great turns of our lives, but in every step we take; Lord, direct my way, 1 Thess. iii. 11.

10. A divine sentence is in the lips of the king: his mouth transgresseth not in judgment.

We wish this were always true as a proposition, and we ought to make it our prayer for kings, and all in authority, that a divine sentence may be in their lips, both in giving orders, that they may do that in wisdom, and in giving sentence, that they may do that in equity, both which are included in judgment, and that in neither their mouth may transgress, 1 Tim. ii. 1. But it is often otherwise; and therefore,

1. It may be read as a precept to the kings and judges of the earth, to be wise and instructed; let them be just, and rule in the fear of God; let them act with such wisdom and conscience, that there may appear a holy divination in all they say or do, and that they are guided by principles supernatural; let not their mouths transgress in judgment, for the judgment is God's.

2. It may be taken as a promise to all good kings, that, if they sincerely aim at God's glory, and seek direction from him, he will qualify them with wisdom and grace above others, in proportion to the eminency of their station, and the trusts lodged in their hands. When Saul himself was made king, God gave him another spirit.

3. It was true concerning Solomon, who wrote this, he had extraordinary wisdom, pursuant to the promise God made him. See 1 Kings iii. 28.

11. A just weight and balance are the Lord's; all the weights of the bag are his work.

Note, 1. The administration of public justice by the magistrate is an ordinance of God; in it the scales are held, and ought to be held, by a steady and impartial hand; and we ought to submit to it, for the Lord's sake, and to see his authority in that of the magistrate, Rom. xiii. 1. 1 Pet. ii. 13.

2. The observation of justice in commerce between man and man is likewise a divine appointment. He taught men discretion to make scales and weights for the adjusting of right exactly between buyer and seller, that neither may be wronged; and all other useful inventions for the preserving of right are from him; He has also appointed by his law that they be just; it is therefore a great affront to him, and to his government, to falsify, and so to do wrong, under colour and pretence of doing right, which is wickedness in the place of judgment.

12. It is an abomination to kings to commit wickedness; for the throne is established by righteousness.

Here is, 1. The character of a good king, which Solomon intended not for his own praise, but for instruction to his successors, his neighbours, and the vice-roys under him. A good king not only does justice, but it is an abomination to him to do otherwise; he hates the thought of doing wrong, and preserving justice; he not only abhors the wickedness done by others, but abhors to do any himself, though, having power, he might easily and safely do it.

2. The comfort of a good king; his throne is established by righteousness. He that makes conscience of using his power aright, shall find that to be the best security of his government; both as it will oblige people, make them easy, and keep them in the interests of others, and as it will obtain the blessing of God, which will be a firm basis to the throne, and a strong guard about it.

13. Righteous lips are the delight of kings; and they love him that speaketh right.

Here is a further character of good kings, that they love and delight in those that speak right.

1. They hate parasites and those that flatter them, and are very willing that all about them should deal faithfully with them, and tell them that which is true, whether it be pleasing or displeasing, both concerning persons and things; that every thing should be set in a true light, and nothing disguised, ch. xxix. 12.

2. They not only do righteousness themselves, but take care to employ those under them that do righteousness too; which is of great consequence to the people, who must be subject not only to the king as supreme, but to the governors sent by him, 1 Pet. ii. 14. A good king will therefore put those in power who are conscientious, and will say that which is righteous and discreet, and know how to speak right, and to the purpose.

These two verses show the power of kings, which is everywhere great, but was especially so in those eastern countries, where they were absolute and arbitrary; whom they would they slay, and whom they would they keep alive; their will was a law. We have reason to bless God for the happy constitution of the government we live under, which maintains the prerogative of the prince without any injury to the liberty of the subject. But here it is intimated,

1. How formidable the wrath of a king is; it is as messengers of death; the wrath of Ahasuerus was so to Haman. An angry word from an incensed prince has been to many a messenger of death, and has struck as great a terror upon some, as if a sentence of death had been pronounced upon them. He must be a very wise man, that knows how to pacify the wrath of a king with a word fitly spoken; as Jonathan once pacified his father’s rage against David, 1 Sam. xix. 6. A prudent subject may sometimes suggest that to an angry prince, which will cool his resentments.

2. How valuable and desirable the king’s favour is to those that have incurred his displeasure; it is life from the dead, if the king be reconciled to them. To be in favour with a court is a rare, very refreshing to the ground. Solomon put his subjects in mind of this, that they might not do any thing to incur his wrath, but be careful to recommend themselves to his favour. We ought by it to be put in mind how much we are concerned to escape the wrath, and obtain the favour, of the King of kings. His frowns are worse than death, and his favour better than light; and therefore they are fools, who, to escape the wrath, and obtain the favour, of an earthly prince, will throw themselves out of God’s favour, and make themselves obnoxious to his wrath.

16. How much better is it to get wisdom than gold, and to get understanding rather to be chosen than silver?

Solomon here not only asserts that it is better to get wisdom than gold, (ch. iii. 14.—iii. 19.) but he speaks it, with assurance, that it is much better, beyond expression; with admiration, How much better! amazed at the disproportion; with an appeal to men’s consciences, “Judge in yourselves how much better it is;” and with an addition to the same purport, that understanding is rather to be chosen than silver, and all the treasures of kings and their favourites.

Note. 1. Heavenly wisdom is better than worldly wealth, and to be preferred before it. Grace is more valuable than gold. Grace is the gift of God’s peculiar favour; gold only of common providence. Grace is for ourselves; gold for others. Grace is for the soul and eternity; gold only for the body and time. Grace will stand us in stead in a dying hour, when gold will do us no good.

2. The getting of this heavenly wisdom is better than the getting of worldly wealth. Many take care and pains to get wealth, and yet come short of it; but grace was never denied to any that sincerely sought it. There is vanity and vexation of spirit in getting wealth, but joy and satisfaction of spirit in getting wisdom; great peace have they that love it.

17. The highway of the upright is to depart from evil: he that keepeth his way preserveth his soul.

Note. 1. It is the way of the upright to avoid sin, and everything that looks like it, and leads towards it; and this is a highway marked out by authority, tracked by many that have gone before us, and in which we meet with many that keep company with us; it is easy to hit, and safe to be travelled in, like a highway, Isa. xxxv. 8. To depart from evil is understanding.

2. It is the care of the upright to preserve their own souls, that they be not polluted with sin, and that by the troubles of the world they may not be purged out of the possession of them; especially that they may not perish for ever, Matth. xvi. 26. And it is therefore their care to keep their way, and not to turn aside out of it, on either hand, but to press toward perfection. They that adhere to their duty, secure their felicity. Keep thy way, and God will keep thee.

18. Pride goeth before destruction, and an haughty spirit before a fall.

Note. 1. Pride will have a fall. Those that are of a haughty spirit, that think of themselves above what is meet, and look with contempt upon others, that with their pride affront God and disquiet others, they will be brought down, either by repentance or by ruin. It is the honour of God to humble the proud, Job xi. 11, 12. It is the act of justice, that those who have lifted up themselves should be laid low. Pharaoh, Sennacherib, Nebuchadnezzar, were instances of this. Men cannot punish pride, but power adverseth the possession of them, and therefore God will take the punishing of it in his own hands. Let him alone to deal with proud men.

2. Proud men are often most proud, and insolent, and haughty, just before their destruction, so that it is a certain presage: that they are upon the brink of it. When proud men set God’s judgments at defiance, and think themselves at the greatest distance from them, it is a sign that they are at the door, witness the case of Benhadad and Herod. While the word was in the king's mouth, Dan. iv. 31. Therefore let us not fear the pride of others, but greatly fear it in ourselves.

19. Better it is to be of a humble spirit with the lowly, than to divide the spoil with the proud.

This is a paradox which the children of this world cannot understand, and will not subscribe to; that it is better to be poor and humble, than to be rich and proud.

1. They that divide the spoil are commonly proud; they value themselves and despise others, and their mind rises with their condition; those, therefore, that are rich in this world, have need to be charged that they be not high-minded, 1 Tim. vi. 17. Those that are proud, and will put forth themselves, that thrust, and show in his own name, for upreignment, are the men that commonly divide the spoil, and share it among them; they have the world at will, and the ball at their foot.

2. It is upon all accounts better to take our lot with those whose condition is low, and their minds brought to it, than to covet and aim to make a figure and a bustle in the world. Humility, though it should expose us to contempt in the world, yet, while it recommends us to the favour of God, qualifies us for his gracious visits, prepares us for his glory, secures us from many temptations, and preserves the quiet and repose of our own souls, is much better than that high-spiritedness, which, though it carry away the honour and wealth of the world, makes God a man’s enemy, and the devil his master.

20. He that handleth a matter wisely shall find good; and whoso trusteth in the Lord, happy is he.

Note, 1. Prudence gains men respect and success; He that handles a matter wisely, that is master of his trade, and makes it to appear he understands what he undertakes, that is considerable in his affairs, and, when he speaks or writes of any subject, does it pertinently, he shall find good, shall come into good repute, and perhaps may make a good hand of it.

2. But it is piety only that will secure men’s true happiness; They that handle a matter wisely, if they are proud, and lean to their own understanding, though they may find some good, yet they will have no great satisfaction in it; but he that trusts in the Lord, and not in his own wisdom, happy is he, and shall speed better at last. Some read the former part of the verse, so as to expound it of piety, which is indeed true wisdom; he that attends to the word, the word of God, (ch. xiii. 13.) he shall find good in it, and good by it. And whoso trusts in the Lord, in his word which he attends to, is happy.

21. The wise in heart shall be called prudent; and the sweetness of the lips increaseth learning.

Note, 1. Those that have solid wisdom will have the credit of it; it will gain them reputation, and they shall be called prudent, grave, men, and a difference will be paid to their judgement. Do that which is wise and good, and thou shalt have praise of the same.

2. Those that with their wisdom have a good eloquence, that deliver themselves easily and with a good grace, are communicative of their wisdom, and have words at will, and good language as well as good sense, they increase learning, they diffuse and propagate knowledge to others, and do good with it, and by that means increase their own stock. They add doctrine, improve sciences, and do service to the commonwealth of learning. To him that has, and uses what he has, more shall be given.

22. Understanding is a well-spring of life unto him that hath it: but the instruction of fools is folly.

Note, 1. There is always some good to be gotten by a wise and good man; his understanding is a well-spring of life to him, which always flows, and can never be drawn dry; he has something to say upon all occasions, that is instructive, and of use to those that will make use of it, things new and old, to bring out of his treasure; at least, it is a spring of life, to himself, yielding him abundant satisfaction; within his own thoughts he entertains and edifies himself, if not others.

2. There is nothing that is good to be gotten by a fool; even his instruction, his set and solemn discourses, are but folly, like himself, and tending to make others like him. When he does his best, it is but folly, in comparison even with the common talk of a wise man, who speaks better at table than a fool in Moses’s seat.

23. The heart of the wise teacheth his mouth, and addeth learning to his lips.

Solomon had commended eloquence, and the sweetness of the lips, (v. 21.) and seemed to prefer it before wisdom; but here he corrects himself, as it were, and shows that unless there be a good treasure within to support the eloquence, it is worth but little. Wisdom in the heart is the main matter.

1. That is it that directs us in speaking; that teaches the mouth what to speak, and when, and how, so that what is spoken may be proper, and pertinent, and seasonable; otherwise, though the language be ever so fine, it had better be unsaid.

2. That is it that gives weight to what we speak, and adds learning to it; strength of reason and force of argument; without which, let a thing be ever so well worded, it will be rejected, when it comes to be considered, as trifling; quaint expressions please the ear, and honour the fancy, but it is learning in the lips that must convince the judgment, and sway that; to which wisdom in the heart is necessary.

24. Pleasant words are as a honey-comb, sweet to the soul, and health to the bones.

The pleasant words here commended must be those which the heart of the wise teaches, and adds learning to; (v. 23.) words of seasonable advice, instruction, and comfort; words taken from God’s word, for that is it which Solomon had learned from his father to account sweeter than honey and the honey-comb, Ps. xix. 10. These words, to those that know how to relish them, 1. Are pleasant; they are like the honey-comb, sweet to the soul, which tastes in them that the Lord is gracious; nothing more grateful and agreeable to the new man than the word of God, and those words which are borrowed from it, Ps. cxix. 103.

2. They are wholesome; many things are pleasant that are not profitable; but these pleasant words and health to the bones, to the inward man, as well as sweet to the soul; they make the bones, which sin has broken and put out of joint, to rejoice. The bones are the strength of the body; and the good word of God is a means of spiritual strength, curing the diseases that weaken us.

25. There is a way that seemeth right unto a man; but the end thereof are the ways of death.
This we had before, (ch. xiv. 12.) but here it is repeated, as that which is very necessary to be thought of:
1. By way of caution to us all to take heed of deceiving ourselves in the great concerns of our souls, by resting in that which seems right, and is not really so; and, for the preventing of a self-delusion, to be impartial in our examination, and keep up a jealousy over ourselves.
2. By way of terror to those whose way is not right, is not as it should be, however it may seem to themselves or others, the end of it will certainly be death; to that it has a direct and certain tendency.

26. He that laboureth, laboureth for himself; for his mouth craveth it of him.

This is designed to engage us to diligence, and quicken us; what our hand finds to do, to do it with all our might, both in our worldly business, and in the work of religion; for in the original it is, The soul that labours, labours for itself. It is heart-work which is here intended, the labour of the soul, which is here recommended to us,
1. As that which will be absolutely needful; our mouth is continually craving it of us; the necessities both of soul and body are pressing, and require constant relief, so that we must either work or starve. Both call for daily bread, and therefore there must be daily labour; for in the sweat of our face we must eat, 2 Thess. iii. 10.
2. As that which will be unexpectedly gainful; we know on whose errand we go; He that labours shall reap the fruit of his labour, it shall be for himself, he shall rejoice in his own work, and eat the labour of his hands. If we make religion our business, God will make it our blessedness.

27. An ungodly man diggeth up evil; and in his lips there is as a burning fire. 28. A forward man soweth strife; and a whisperer separateth chief friends.

There are those that are not only vicious themselves, but spiteful and mischievous to others, and they are the worst of men; two sorts of such are here described.
1. Such as envy a man the honour of his good name, and do all they can to blast that by calumnies and misrepresentations; They dig up evil, they take a great deal of pains to find out something or other on which to ground a slander, or which may give some colour to it. If none appear above ground, rather than want it, they will dig for it, by diving into what is secret, or looking a great way back, or by evil suspicions and surmises, and forced inferences. In the lips of a slanderer and backbiter there is as a fire, not only to brand his neighbour's reputation, to smoke and sulky it, but as a burning fire to consume it. And how great a matter does a little of this fire kindle, and how hardly is it extinguished: Jer. iii. 5, 6.
2. Such as envy a man the comfort of his friendship, and do all they can to break that, by suggesting that, on both sides, which will set those at variance that are most nearly related, and have been long intimate, or, at least, cool and alienate their affections one from another; A forward man, that cannot find in his heart to love any body but himself, is vexed to see others live in love, and therefore makes it his business to sow strife, by giving men base characters one of another, telling lies, and carrying ill-natured stories between chief friends, so as to separate them one from another, and make them angry at, or at least suspicious of, one another. Those are bad men, and bad women too, that do such ill offices; they are doing the devil's work, and his will their wages be.

29. A violent man enticeth his neighbour, and leadeth him into the way that is not good. 30. He shuddeth his eyes to devise forward things; moving his lips, he bringeth evil to pass.

Here is another sort of evil men described to us, that we may neither do like them, nor have any thing to do with them.
1. Such as (like Satan) do all the mischief they can by force and violence, as roaring lions, and not only by fraud and insinuation, as subtle serpents; They are violent men, that do all by rapine and oppression, that shut their eyes, meditating with the closest intention and application of mind to devise forward things, to centwre how they may do the greatest mischief to their neighbour, to do it effectually, and yet securely to themselves; and then, moving their lips, giving the word of command to their agents, they bring the evil to pass, and accomplish the wicked device; biting his lips, so some read it, for vexation. When the wicked plot against the just, he gnasheth upon him with his teeth.
2. Such as (like Satan still) do all they can to entice and draw in others to join with them in doing mischief, leading them in a way that is not good, neither honest, nor honourable, nor safe, but offensive to God, and which will be the end pernicious to the sinner. Thus he aims to ruin some in this world by bringing them into trouble, and others in the other world by bringing them into sin.

31. The hoary head is a crown of glory, if it be found in the way of righteousness.

Note. 1. It ought to be the great care of old people to be found in the way of righteousness, the easily put a falter and serious goodness. Both God and man will look for them in that way; it will be expected that those that are old should be good, that the multitude of their years should teach them the best wisdom; let them therefore be found in that way. Death will come, the Judge is coming, the Lord is at hand; that they may be found of him in peace, let them be found in the way of righteousness, (2 Pet. iii. 14.) found so doing, Matth. xxiv. 36.

Let all people be old disciples, let them persevere to the end in the way of righteousness, which they long since set out in, that they may then be found in it.

2. If old people be found in the way of righteousness, their age will be their honour. Old age, as such, is honourable, and commands respect; Thou shalt rise up before the hoary head, (Lev. xix. 32.) but if he be found in the way of wickedness, its honour is forfeited, its crown profaned, and laid in the dust, Isa. lxv. 20. Old people, therefore, if they would preserve their honour, must still hold fast their integrity, and then their gray hairs are indeed a crown to them; they are worthy of double honour. Grace is the glory of old age.

32. He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city.

This recommends the grace of meekness to us, which will well become us all, particularly the hoary head, v. 31. Observe,
1. The nature of it; it is to be slow to anger, not easily put into a passion, nor apt to resent provocation; taking time to consider, before we suffer our passion to break out, that it may not transgress due bounds; so slow in our motions towards anger, that we may be quickly stopped and pacified. It is to have the rule of our own spirits, our appetites and affections, and all our inclinations, but particularly our passions, our anger, keeping that under direction and check, and the strict government of religion and right reason. We must be lords of our anger, as God is, Nah. i. 3. Asolus sins, affectuum tuorum Rule your passions, as Asolus rules the winds.

2. The honour of it: He that gets, and keeps, the mastery of his passions, he is better than the mighty, better than he that by a long siege takes a city, or by a long war subdues a country. Behold, a greater than Alexander or Caesar is here! The conquest of ourselves, and our own unruly passions, requires more true conduct, and a more steady, constant, and regular, management, than the obtaining of a victory over the forces of an enemy. A rational conquest is more honourable to a rational creature, than a brutal one.

It is a victory that does no body any harm; no lives or treasures are sacrificed to it, but only some base lusts. It is harder, and therefore more glorious, to quash an insurrection at home, than to resist an invasion from abroad; nay, such are the gains of meekness, that by it we are more than conquerors.

33. The lot is cast into the lap; but the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord.

Note, 1. The Divine Providence orders and directs those things which to us are perfectly casual and fortuitous. Nothing comes to pass by chance, nor is any event determined by a blind fortune, but everything by the will and counsel of God. What man has neither eye nor hand in, God is intimately concerned in.

2. When solemn appeals are made to Providence by the casting of lots, for the deciding of that matter of moment, which could not otherwise be at all, or not so well, decided, God must be eyed in it, by prayer, that it may be disposed aright, (Give a perfect lot, 1 Sam. xiv. 41. Acts i. 24.) and by acquiescing in it when it is disposed; being satisfied that the hand of God is in it, and that hand directed by infinite wisdom. All the disposals of Providence concern the great ends of our life, we must look up to be the directing of our lot, the determining of what we referred to God, and must be reconciled to them accordingly.

CHAP. XVII.

1. BETTER is a dry morsel, and quietness therewith, than an house full of sacrifices with strife.

These words recommend family-love and peace, as conducing very much to the comfort of human life.

1. Those that live in unity and quietness, not only free from jealousies and animosities, but vying in mutual endearments, and that study to make themselves easy and obliging to one another, live very comfortably though they are low in the world, work hard, and fare hard; though they have but a meal a day, yet it is a dry morsel, and that a dry morsel. There may be peace and quietness where there are not three meals a day, provided there be a joint satisfaction in God's providence, and a mutual satisfaction in each other's prudence. Holy love may be found in a cottage.

2. Those that live in contention, that are always jarring and brawling, and reflecting upon one another, though they have plenty of dainties, a house full of sacrifices, live uncomfortably; they cannot expect the blessing of God upon them and what they have, nor can they have any true relish of their enjoyments, much less have any peace in their own consciences. Love will sweeten a dry morsel, but strife will sour and imbid a house full of sacrifices.

A little of the leaven of malice will leaven all the enjoyments.

2. A wise servant shall have rule over a son that causeth shame, and shall have part of the inheritance among the brethren.

Note, 1. True merit does not go by dignity. All agree, that the son in the family is more worthy of the servant; (John viii. 35.) and yet sometimes it so happens that the servant is wise, and a blessing and credit to the family, when the son is a fool, and a burthen and a shame to the family. Eliezer of Damascus, though Abram could not bear to think that he should be his heir, was a stay to the family, when he was sent to get a wife for Isaac; whereas Ishmael, a son, was a shame to it, when he mocked Isaac.

2. True dignity will go by merit. If a servant be wise, and manage things well, he shall be further trusted, and not only have rule with, but rule over, a son that causes shame; for God and nature have designed that the fool shall be servant to the wise in heart. Nay, a prudent servant may perhaps come to have such an interest in his master, as to be taken in for a child's share of the estate, and to have part of the inheritance among the brethren.

3. The fining-pot is for silver, and the furnace for gold; but the Lord trieth the hearts.

Note, 1. The hearts of the children of men are subject, not only to God's view, but to his judgment; As the fining-pot is for silver, both to prove it, and to improve it, so the Lord tries the hearts; he searches whether they are standard or no, and those that are he refines and makes purer, Jer. xvii. 10. God tries the heart by affliction, (Ps. lxvi. 10, 11.) and often chooses his people in that furnace, (Isa. xlvii. 16.) and makes them choice.

2. It is God only that tries the hearts; men may try their silver and gold with the fining-pot and the furnace, but they have no such way of trying one another's hearts; God only does that, who is both the Searcher and the Sovereign, of the heart.

4. A wicked doer giveth heed to false lips; and a liar giveth ear to a naughty tongue.

Note, 1. Those that design to do ill, support themselves by falsehood and lying; A wicked doer giveth ear, with a great deal of pleasure; to false lips, that will justify him in the ill he does, to those that aim to make public disturbances, catch greedily at libels, and false stories, that defame the government and the administration.

2. Those that take the liberty to tell lies, take a pleasure in hearing them told; A liar gives heed to a malicious, backbiting, tongue, that he may have something to graft his lies upon, and with which to give them some colour of truth, and so to support them. Sinners will strengthen one another's hands; and those show they are bad themselves who court the acquaintance, and need the assistance, of those that are bad.

5. Whoso mocketh the poor reproacheth his Maker; and he that is glad at calamities shall not be unpunished.

See here, 1. What a great sin they are guilty of who trample upon the poor, who ridicule their wants, and the meanness of their appearance, upbraid them with it, and take advantage from their weakness to be abusive and injurious to them; they reproach their Maker, put a great contempt and affront upon him, who allotted the poor to the con dation they are in, owns them, and takes care of them, and can, when he pleases, reduce us to that condition. Let those, that thus reproach their Maker, know they shall be called to an account for it, Matth. xxxv. 40, 41. Prov. xiv. 31.

2. What great danger they are in of falling into incapable themselves, who are pleased to see and hear of the troubles of others; He that is glad at calamities, that he may be built upon the ruins of others, and regales himself with the judgments of God when they are abroad, let him know that he shall not go unpunished; the cup shall be put into his hand, Ezek. xxv. 6, 7.

6. Children’s children are the crown of old men; and the glory of children are their fathers.

They are so, that is, they should be so; if they conduct themselves worthily, they are so.

1. It is an honour to parents, when they are old, to leave children, and children’s children, growing up, that tread in the steps of their virtues, and are likely to maintain and advance the reputation of their families. It is an honour to a man to live so long as to see his children’s children; (Ps. cxviii. 6. Gen. l. 23.) to see his house built up in them, and to see them likely to serve their generation according to the will of God; this crowns and completes their concern in this world. It is an honour to children to have wise and godly parents, and to have them continued to them, even after they are themselves grown up and settled in the world. Those are unnatural children who reckon their aged parents a burthen to them, and think they live too long; whereas, if the children be wise and good, it is as much their honour as can be, that thereby they are comforts to their parents in the unpleasant days of their old age.

7. Excellent speech becometh not a fool: much less do lying lips a prince.

Two things are here represented as very absurd; 1. That men of no repute should be dictators. What can be more unbecoming than for fools, who are known to have little sense and discretion, to pretend to that which is above them, and which they never were cut out for? A fool, in Solomon’s proverbs, signifies a wicked man, whom excellent speech does not become, because his conversation gives the lie to his excellent speech. What have they to do to declare God’s statutes, who hate instruction? Ps. I. 16. Christ would not suffer the unclean spirits to say that they knew him to be the Son of God. See Acts xvi. 17, 18.

2. That men of great repute should be deceivers.

If it is unbecoming a despicable man to presume to speak as a philosopher or politician, and nobody needs him, being prejudiced against his character, much more unbecoming it is for a prince, for a man of honour, to take advantage, from his character and the confidence that is put in him, to lie, and dissemble, and make no conscience of breaking his word. Lying ill becomes any man, but worst a prince; so corrupt is the modern policy, which insinuates that princes ought not to make themselves slaves to their words further than is for their interest, and Qui nescit dissimulare, nescit regnare. He who does not know how to dissemble, knows not how to reign.

8. A gift is as a precious stone in the eyes of him that hath it; whithersoever it turneth, it prospereth.

The design of this observation is to show,

1. Those who have money in their hand think they can do any thing with it. Rich men value a little money as if it were a precious stone, and value themselves on it, as if it gave them not only ornament, but power, and every one were bound to be at their beck, even justice itself. Whithersoever they turn this sparkling diamond, they expect it should dazzle the eyes of all, and make them do just what they would have them do, in hopes of it. The deepest bag will carry the cause; fee high, and you may have what you will.

2. That those who have money in their eye, and set their hearts upon it, will do any thing for it; A bribe is as a precious stone in the eyes of him that takes it; it has a great influence upon him, and he will be sure to go the way that it leads him, either and which, though contrary to justice, and not consistent with himself.

9. He that covereth a transgression seeketh love; but he that repeateth a matter separateth very friends.

Note. 1. The way to preserve peace among relations and neighbours, is, to make the best of every thing; not to tell others what has been said or done against them, when it is not at all necessary to their safety; nor to take notice of what has been said or done against ourselves, but to excuse both, and put the best constructions upon them. It was an oversight, therefore, to overlook it; it was done through forgetfulness, therefore forget it; it perhaps made nothing of you, therefore do you make nothing of it.

2. The ripping up of faults is the ripping out of love, and nothing tends more to the separating of friends, and setting them at variance, than the repeating of matters that have been in variance; for they commonly lose nothing in the repetition, but the things themselves are aggravated, and the passions about them revived and exasperated. The best method of peace is by an amnesty or act of oblivion.

10. A reproach entereth more into a wise man than an hundred stripes into a fool.

Note. 1. A word is enough to the wise. A gentle reproof will enter not only into the head, but into the heart, of a wise man, so as to have a strong influence upon him; for if but a hint be given to conscience, let it alone to carry it on and prosecute it.

2. Strangers will not endure it for a fool, to make him sensible of his errors, that he may repent of them, and be more cautious for the future. He that is sottish and wilful is very rarely benefited by severity. David is softened with, Thou art the man; but Pharaoh remains hard under all the plagues of Egypt.

11. An evil man seeketh only rebellion: therefore a cruel messenger shall be sent against him.

Here is the sin and punishment of an evil man.

1. His sin; he is an evil man indeed that seeks all occasions to rebel against God, and the government God has set over him, and to contradict and quarrel with those about him. Quart jurtgia—He picks quarrels; so some. There are some that are actuated by a spirit of opposition, that will contradict for contradiction’s sake, that will go on frowardly in their wicked ways, in spite of all restraint and check. A rebellious man seeks mischief; so some read it, watches all opportunities to disturb the public peace.

2. His punishment; Because he will not be reclaimed by mild and gentle methods, a cruel messenger shall be sent against him; some dreadful judgment or other, as a messenger from God; Angels, God’s messengers, shall be employed as ministers of his justice against him, Ps. lxviii. 49. Satan, the angel of death, shall be let loose upon him, and the messengers of Satan. His prince shall send a sergeant to arrest him, an executioner to cut him off. He that kicks against the pricks, is waited for of the sword.

12. Let a bear robbed of her whelps, meet a man, rather than a fool in his folly.

Note. 1. A passionate man is a brutish man. However at other times he may have some wisdom, take him in his passion unguarded, and he is a fool in his folly. They are fools in whose bosom anger rests, and in whose countenance anger rages. He has put off man, and is become like a bear, a raging bear, a bear robbed of her whelps; he is as fond of the gratifications of his lusts and passions as a bear of her whelps. (which, though ugly, are her own, as eager in the pursuit of them, as she is in quest of her whelps when they are missing, and as full of indignation if crossed in the pursuit.

2. He is a dangerous man, falls foul on every one that stands in his way, though innocent, though his friend, as a bear robbed of her whelps sets upon the first man she meets as a robber. Ira furor brevis est—Anger is madness while it lasts. One may more easily stop, escape, or guard against, an enraged bull than a raging bear. Let us therefore watch over our own passions, (lest they head and do mischief,) and so consult our own honour; and let us avoid the company of furious men, and get out of their way when they are in their fury, and so consult our own safety. Currenti eoque furori—Give place unto wrath.

13. Whoso rewardeth evil for good, evil shall not depart from his house.

A malignant, mischievous man, is here represented.

1. As ungrateful to his friends; he oftentimes is so absurd and insensible of kindness done him, that he renders evil for good. David met with those that were his adversaries for his love, Ps. cix.

4. To render evil for evil is brutish, but to render evil for good is devilish. He is an ill-natured man, who, because he is resolved not to return a kindness, will revenge it.

2. As therein unkind to his family, for he entails a curse upon it; this is a crime so heinous, that it shall be punished, not only in his person, but in his posterity, for whom he thus treasures up wrath. The sword shall not depart from David's house, because he rewarded Uriah with evil for his good services. The Jews stoned Christ for his good works, therefore is his blood upon them and upon their children.

14. The beginning of strife is as when one leteth out water; therefore leave off contention before it be meddled with.

Here is, 1. The danger that there is in the beginning of strife; one hot word, one peevish reflection, one angry word, and, one petty contradiction, begets another; and that a third, and so on, till it proves like the cutting of a dam; when the water has got a little passage, it does itself widen the breach, bears down all before it, and there is then no stopping it, no reducing it.

2. A good caution inferred thence, to take heed of the first spark of contention, and to put it out as soon as ever it appears. Dread the breaking of the ice; for, if once broken, it will break further; therefore leave it off, not only when you see the worst of it, for then it may be too late, but when you see the first of it; *Obsta proniculis—Resist at the earliest display; leave it off even before it be meddled with; leave it off, if it were possible, before you begin.

15. He that justifieth the wicked, and he that condemneth the just, even they both are abomination to the Lord.

This shows what an offence it is to God,

1. When those that are intrusted with the administration of public justice, judges, juries, witnesses, prosecutors, counsel, do either acquit the guilty, or condemn those that are not guilty, or in the least contribute to either; this defeats the end of government, which is to protect the good and punish the bad, Rom. xiii. 3. 4. It is equally provoking to God to justify the wicked, though it be in pity, and in favorem vitae—to save life, as to condemine the just.

2. When any private persons plead for sin and sinners, palliate and excuse wickedness, or argue against virtue and piety, and so pervert the right ways of the Lord, and confound the eternal distinctions between good and evil.

16. Wherefore there is a price in the hand of a fool to get wisdom, seeing he hath no heart to it!

Two things are here spoken of with admiration:

1. God's great goodness to foolish man, in putting a price into his hand to get wisdom, to get knowledge and grace to fit him for both works. We have rational souls, the means of grace, the strivings of the Spirit, access to God by prayer, we have time and opportunity; he that has a good estate, (so some understand it,) has advantages thereby of getting wisdom by purchasing instruction. Good parents, relations, ministers, friends, are helps to get wisdom. It is a price therefore of value, a talent it is a price in the hand, in possession, the word is nigh thee; it is a price for getting; it is for our own advantage, it is for getting wisdom, the very thing which, being fools, we have most need of. We have reason to wonder that God should so consider our necessity, and should intrust us with such advantages, though he foresaw we should not make a right improvement of them.

2. Man's great wickedness, his neglect of God's favour, and his own interest, which is very absurd and unaccountable; *he has no heart to it, not to the wisdom that is to be got, nor to the price in the use of which it may be got. He has no heart, no skill, nor will, nor courage, to improve his advantages. He has set his heart upon other things, so that he has no heart to his duty, or the great concerns of his soul. Wherefore should a price be thrown away and lost upon one so undeserving of it?

17. A friend loveth at all times, and a brother is born for adversity.

This bespeaks the strength of these bonds by which we are bound to each other, and which we ought to be sensible of.

1. Friends must be constant to each other at all times; that is not true friendship which is not constant, it will be so, if it be sincere, and actuated by a good principle. They that are fainciful or selfish in their friendship, will love no longer than their humour is pleased, and their interest served, and therefore their affections turn with the wind, and change with the weather; swallow-friends, that fly to you in summer, but are gone in winter; such friends are more to be pitied than despised, for if a friendship be brudent, generous, and cordial, if I love my friend because he is wise, and virtuous, and good, as long as he continues so, though he fall into poverty and disgrace, still I shall love him. Christ is a Friend that loves at all times; (John xiii. 1.) and we must so love him, Rom. viii. 35.

2. Relations must in a special manner be careful and tender of one another in affliction; *A brother is born to succour a brother or sister in distress, to whom he is joined so closely by nature, that he may the more sensibly feel from their burtneous, and be the more strongly inclined and engaged, as it were by instinct, to help them. We must often consider what we were born for, not only as men, but as in such a station and relation. Who knows but we came into such a family, for such a time as this? We do not play a part in the management of our own lives, if we do not the duty of the some. Some take it thus; A friend that loves at all times, is born, becomes a brother in adversity, and is so to be valued.

18. A man void of understanding striketh hands, and becometh surety in the presence of his friend.

Though he had commended friendship in adversity, (v. 17.) yet let not any, under pretence of being generous to their friends, be unjust to their families, and wrong them; one part of our duty must be made to consist with another.

Note, 1. It is a piece of wisdom to keep out of debt as much as may be, especially to dread sure- tiship. There may be a just occasion for a man to pass his word for his friend in his absence, till he come to engage himself; but to be surety in the presence of his friend, when he is upon the spot, supposes that his own word will not be taken, he being deemed insolvent, or dishonest; and then who can with safety pass his word for him?

2. Those that are void of understanding are com- monly taken in this snare, to the prejudice of their families, and therefore ought not to be trusted too far with their affairs, but to be under direction.

19. He loveth transgression that loveth strife: and he that exalgeth his gate seeketh destruction.

Note, 1. Those that are quarrelsome, involve themselves in a great deal of guilt; He that loves strife, that in his wordly business loves to go to law, in religion loves controversies, and in common conversation loves to thwart and fall out, that is never well but when he is in the five, he loves transgres- sions; for a great deal of sin attends that sin, and the way of it is down hill. He pretends to stand up for truth, and for his honour and right, but really he loves sin, which God hates.

2. Those that are ambitious and aspiring, expose themselves to a great deal of trouble, such as often ends in their ruin. He that exalgeth his gate, builds a stately house, at least a fine frontispiece, that he may overtop and outshine his neighbours, seeks his own destruction, and takes a deal of pains to ruin himself; he makes his gate so large, that his house and estate go out at it.

20. He that hath a froward heart findeth no good; and he that hath a perverse tongue falleth into mischief.

Note, 1. Framing ill designs will be of no advantage to us, there is nothing got by them; He that has a froward heart, that sows discord, and is full of resentment, cannot promise himself to get by it, sufficient to balance the loss of his repose and reputation, nor can he take any rational satisfaction in it; he is not good for.

2. Giving ill language will be a great disadvantage to us; He that has a perverse tongue, spiteful and abusive, scurrilous or backbiting, falls into one mischief or other, loses his friends, provokes his enemies, and pulls trouble upon his own head; many a one has paid dear for an unbridled tongue.

21. He that begetteth a fool doeth it to his sorrow; and the father of a fool hath no joy.

This speaks that very emphatically, which many wise and good men feel very sensibly, what a griev- ous vexations thing it is to have a foolish wicked child. See here,

1. How uncertain all our creature-comforts are, so that we are often not only disappointed in them, but that you prove greatest crosses in which we promised ourselves most satisfaction. The father joy when a man-child was born into the world, and yet, if he prove vicious, his own father wishes he had never been born. The name of Absalom signifies his father's peace, but he was his greatest trouble. It should moderate the desire of having children, and the delight of their parents in them, that they may prove a grief to them; yet it should silence the murmuring of the afflicted father in that case, that, if his son be a fool, he is a foil of his own will, and therefore he must make the best of him, and take it up as his cross, the rather, because Adam begetts a son in his own likeness.

2. How unwise we are in suffering one affliction (and that of an untoward child as likely as any other) to drown the sense of a thousand mercies; The father of a fool lays that so much to heart, that he has no joy of any thing else; for this he may think himself; there are joys sufficient to balance even that sorrow.

22. A merry heart doeth good like a medicine: but a broken spirit drieth the bones.

Note, 1. It is healthful to be cheerful. The Lord is for the body, and has provided for it, not only meat, but medicine, and has here told us that the best medicine is a merry heart; not a heart addicted to pain, carnal, sensual, mirth; Solomon himself said of that mirth, It is not medicine, but madness. It is not food, but poison; What doth it? But he means a heart rejoicing in God, and serving him with gladness, and then taking the comfort of outward enjoyments, and particularly that of pleasant conversation. It is a great mercy, that God gives us leave to be cheerful, and cause to be cheerful; especially if by his grace he gives us hearts to be cheerful. This does good to a medicine, (so some read it,) it makes physic agreeable to the body, or makes it so that it is not good, but wine; What doth it? But he means a heart rejoicing in God, and serving him with gladness, and then taking the comfort of outward enjoyments, and particularly that of pleasant conversation. It is a great mercy, that God gives us leave to be cheerful, and cause to be cheerful; especially if by his grace he gives us hearts to be cheerful. This does good to a medicine, (so some read it,) it makes physic agreeable to the body, or makes it so that it is not good, but wine; What doth it?

2. The sorrows of the mind often contribute very much to the sickness of the body; A broken spirit, sunk by the burthen of afflictions, and especially a conscience wounded with the sense of guilt and fear of wrath, dries the bones, wastes the radical moisture, exhausts the very marrow, and makes the body a mere skeleton. We should therefore watch and pray against all melancholy indispositions, for they lead us into trouble as well as into temptation.

23. A wicked man taketh a gift out of the bosom to pervert the ways of judgment.

See here, 1. What an evil thing bribery is: He is a wicked man that will take a gift to engage him to give a false testimony, verdict, or judgment; when he does not, he is a wicked man. He is a wicked man, who against all the secrecy imaginable, out of the bosom where he knows it is laid ready for him; it is industriously concealed, and so slyly, that if he could, he would hide it from his own conscience. A gift is taken out of the bosom of a wicked man, so some read it; for he is a bad man that gives bribes, as well as he that takes them.

2. What a powerful thing it is. It is of such force, that it perverts the ways of judgment. The course of justice is not only obstructed, but turned into it.
justice; and the greatest wrongs are done, under colour of doing right.

24. Wisdom is before him that hath understanding; but the eyes of a fool are in the ends of the earth.

Note. 1. He is to be reckoned an intelligent man, that not only has wisdom, but has it ready when he has occasion for it. He lays his wisdom before him, as his card and compass which he steers by, has his eye always upon it, as he that writes has on his copy; and then he has it before him, it is not to seek, but still at hand.

2. He that has a giddy head, a roving, rambling fancy, will never be fit for any solid business. He is a fool, and good for nothing; whose eyes are in the ends of the earth, here, and there, and every where; any where but where they should be; who cannot fix his thoughts on one subject, nor pursue any one purpose with any thing of steadiness. When his mind should be applied to his study and business, it is filled with a thousand things, foreign and impertinent.

25. A foolish son is a grief to his father, and bitterness to her that bare him.

Observe, 1. Wicked children are an affliction to both their parents. They are an occasion of anger to the father, (so the word signifies,) because they contemn his authority; but of sorrow and bitterness to the mother, because they abuse her tenderness. The parents, being joint-sufferers, should therefore bring mutual comfort to bear them up under it, and strive to make it as easy as they can, the mother to mollify the father’s anger, the father to alleviate the mother’s grief.

That Solomon often repeats this remark, probably, because it was his own case; however, it is a common case.

26. Also to punish the just is not good, nor to strike princes for equity.

In differences that happen between magistrates and subjects, (and such differences often arise,) 1. Let magistrates see to it that they never punish the just, that they be in no case a terror to good works, for that is to abuse their power; and betray that great trust which is reposed in them. It is not good, it is a very evil thing, and will end ill, whatever end they may aim at in it. When princes become tyrants and persecutors, their thrones will be neither easy nor firm.

2. Let subjects see to it that they do not find fault with the government for doing its duty, for it is wrong to strike princes for equity; by defining their administration, or secretly attempting to strike at them; as the ten tribes that revolted reflected upon Solomon for imposing necessary taxes. Some read it, nor to strike the ingenious for equity; magistrates must take heed that noone suffer under them for well-doing; nor must parents provoke their children to wrath by unjust rebukes.

27. He that hath knowledge spareth his words; and a man of understanding is of an excellent spirit. 28. Even a fool when he holdeth his peace is counted wise; and he that shutteth his lips is esteemed a man of understanding.

Two ways a man may show himself to be a wise man.

1. By the good temper, the sweetness, and the sedateness, of his mind; A man of understanding is of an excellent spirit, a precious spirit, so the word is; he is one that looks well to his spirit, that it be as it should be, and so keeps it in an even frame, easy to himself, and pleasant to others. A gracious spirit is a precious spirit, and renders a man amiable, and more excellent than his neighbour. He is of a cool spirit, so some read it, not heated with passion, nor put into any tumult or disorder by the impetus of any corrupt affectation, but even and stayed. A cool head with a warm heart is an admirable composition.

2. By the good government of his tongue.

(1.) A wise man will be of few words, as being afraid of speaking amiss; He that has knowledge, and aims to do good with it, is careful, when he does speak, to speak to the purpose, and therefore says little, that he may take time to deliberate upon it. He spares his words, because they are better spared than ill-spent.

(2.) This is generally taken for such a sure indication of wisdom, that a fool may gain the reputation of being a wise man, if he have but wit enough to hold his tongue, to hear, and see, and say little. If a fool hold his peace, men of candour will think him wise, because nothing appears to the contrary, it will be said. But because it will be thought that he is making observations on what others say, that others may gain experience, and is consulting with himself what he shall say, that he may speak pertinently. See how easy it is to gain men’s good opinion, and to impose upon them. But when a fool holds his peace, God knows his heart, and the folly that is bound there; thoughts are words to him, and therefore he cannot be deceived in his judgment of men.

CHAP. XVIII.

1. THROUGH desire a man, having separated himself, seeketh and intermeddles with all wisdom.

The original here is difficult, and differently understood.

1. Some take it as a rebuke to an affected singularity; when men take a pride in separating themselves from the sentiments and society of others, in contradicting all that has been said before them, and advancing new notions of their own, which, though ever so absurd, are wedded to it, to gratify a desire or lust of vainglory, and they are seekers and meddlers with that which does not belong to them; he seeks according to his desire, and intermeddles with every business, pretends to pass a judgment upon every man’s matter; he is morose and supercilious; those generally are so that are opinionative and conceited, and they thus make themselves ridiculous, and are vexatious to others.

2. Our translation seems to take it as an excitements to diligence in the pursuit of wisdom. If we would get knowledge and grace, we must desire it, as that which we need, and which will be of great advantage to us, 1 Cor. xii. 31. We must separate ourselves from all those things which would divert us from, or retard us in, the pursuit, retire out of the noise of the world’s vanities, and then seek and intermeddle with all the means and instructions of wisdom; be willing to take pains, and try all the methods of improving ourselves; be acquainted with a variety of opinions, that we may prove all things, and hold fast that which is good.

2. A fool hath no delight in understanding, but that his heart may discover itself. A fool may pretend to understanding, and to seek an intermeddlery with the means of it; but,

1. He has a true delight in it; it is only to please his friends, or save his credit, he does not love his book, or his business, or his Bible, or his prayers, he would rather be playing the fool with his sports; those that take no pleasure in learning or religion will make nothing to purpose of either. No progress is made in them, if they are a task and a drudgery.

2. He hath no good design in it, only that his heart may discover itself, that he may have something to make a show with, something wherewith to varnish his folly, that he may pass off the better, because he loves to hear himself talk.

3. When the wicked cometh, then cometh also contempt, and with ignominy reproach. This may include a double sense;

1. That wicked people are scornful people, and put contempt upon others; When the wicked comes into any company, comes into the schools of wisdom, or into the assemblies for religious worship, then cometh contempt of God, of his people and ministers, and of there things which is said and done. You can expect no other from those that are profane than that they will be scoffers; they will be an ignominy and reproach; they will float and jeer every thing that is serious and grave; but let not wise and good men regard it, for the proverb of the ancients says, Such wickedness proceed from the wicked.

2. That wicked people are shameful people, and bring contempt upon themselves, for God has said, There shall be no shame in despising him, shall be lightly esteemed. As soon as ever sin entered, shame followed it, and sinners make themselves desppicable. Nor do they only draw contempt upon themselves, but they bring ignominy and reproach upon their families, their friends, their ministers, and all that are any way related to them. Those therefore who secure their honour must retaill their virtue.

4. The words of a man's mouth are as deep waters, and the well-spring of wisdom as a flowing brook. The similitudes here seem to be elegantly transposed.

1. The well-spring of wisdom is as deep waters; an intelligent knowing man has in him a good treasure of useful things, which furnishes him with something to say upon all occasions, that is pertinent and profitable. This is as deep waters which make no noise, but never run dry.

2. The words of such a man's mouth are as a flowing brook; what he says can speak; flows naturally from him, and with a great deal of ease, and freedom, and natural fluency; it is clean and fresh, it is cleansing and refreshing; from his deep wells flows what there is occasion for, to water those about him, as the brooks do the low grounds.

5. It is not good to accept the person of the wicked, to overthrow the righteous in judgment. This justly condemns those who, being employed in the administration of justice, pervert judgment.

1. By conniving at men's crimes, and protecting and countenancing them in oppression and violence, because of their dignity and wealth, or some personal kindness they have for them; Whatever excuses men may make for it, certainly it is not good that to accept the person of the wicked, it is an offence to God, an affront to justice, a wrong to mankind, and a real service done to the kingdom of sin and Satan. The merits of the cause must be regarded, not the person.

2. By giving a cause against justice and equity, because the person is poor, and low in the world, or not of the same party or persuasion, or a stranger of another country; this is overthrowing the righteous in judgment, who ought to be supported, and whom God will make to stand.

6. A fool's lips enter into contention, and his mouth calleth for strokes. 7. A fool's mouth is his destruction, and his lips are the snare of his soul.

Solomon has often showed what mischief bad men do to others with their ungoverned tongues; here he shows what mischief they do to themselves.

The first part, their lips, is a quarrel, A fool's lips, without any cause or call, enter into contention, by advancing foolish notions, which others find themselves obliged to oppose, and so a quarrel is begun; or by giving provoking language, which will be resented, and satisfaction demanded; or by setting men at defiance, and bidding them do if they dare. Proud and passionate men, and drunkards, are fools, whose lips enter into contention. A wise man may, against his will, be drawn into a quarrel, but he is a fool that of choice enters into it when he might avoid it, and he will repent it when it is too late.

2. They expose themselves to correction; The fool's mouth does, in effect, call for strokes; he has said that which deserves to be punished with strokes, and is still saying that which needs to be checked, and restrained with strokes, as Ananias unjustly commanded that Paul should be smitten on the mouth.

3. They involve themselves in ruin; A fool's mouth, which has been, or would have been, the destruction of others, proves at length his own destruction, perhaps from men; Shimei's mouth was his own destruction, and Adonijah's, who spake against his own head; and when a fool, by his foolish speaking, has run himself into a premunire, and thinks to bring himself off by justifying or excusing what he has said, he only aggravates his defence, for his defence is his sin, and his lips are still the snare of his soul, entangling him yet more and more. However, when men by their evil words shall be condemned at God's bar, their mouths will be their destruction, and it will be such an aggravation of their ruin, as will not admit one drop of water, one drop of comfort, to cool their tongue, which is their snare, and will be their tormentor.

3. The words of a tale-bearer are as wounds, and they go down into the innermost parts of the belly.

Tale-bearers are those who secretly carry stories from house to house, which perhaps have some truth in them, but are secrets not fit to be told, or are basely misrepresented, and false colours put upon them, and are all told with design to blast men's reputation, to break their friendship, to make mischief between relations and neighbours, and set them at variance: now the words of such are here said to be,

1. Like as when men are wounded, so the margin reads it; they take on them to be very much affected with the miscarriages of such and such, and to be in pain for them, and pretend that it is with the greatest grief and reluctance imaginable that they speak of them, they look as if they themselves were wounded by it; whereas really they rejoice in iniquity, are fond of the story, and tell it with pride and pleasure. Thus their words seem; but they go down as poison into the innermost parts of the belly, the pill being thus gilded, thus sugared.

2. As wounds, so the text reads it; as deep wounds, deadly wounds, wounds in the innermost parts of the belly; the venter medius vel infimus—The middle or lower belly, the thorax, or the abdomen, in either of which wounds are mortal. The words of the tale-bearer and him of whom they are spoken, his credit and interest, and him to whom they are spoken, his love and charity; they occasion so him, which is a wound to the conscience; perhaps he seems to slight them, but they wound insensibly, by alienating his affections from one he ought to love.

9. He also that is slothful in his work is brother to him that is a great waster.

Note. 1. Prodigality is very bad husbandry. Those are not only justly branded as fools among men, but will give an uncomfortable account to God of the talents they are intrusted with, who are wasters of their estates, who live above what they have, spend and give more than they can afford, and so, in effect, throw away what they have, and suffer it to run to waste.

2. Idleness is no better. He that is remiss in his work, whose hands hang down, (so the word signifies,) that stands, as we say, with his thumbs in his mouth, that neglects his business, does it not at all, or as if he did it not, he is own brother to him that is a prodigal; he is as much a fool, and in as sure and ready a way to poverty; one scatters what he has, the other lets it run through his fingers. The observation is too true, in the affairs of religion; he that is trifling and careless in praying and hearing, is brother to him that does not pray or hear at all; and omissions of duty and in duty, are as fatal to the soul as commissions of sin.

10. The name of the Lord is a strong tower; the righteous runneth into it, and is safe.

Here is, 1. God's sufficiency for the saints; His name is a strong tower for them, in which they may take rest where they are weary, and take sanctuary when they are pursued, where they may be lifted up above their enemies, and fortified against them. There is enough in God, and in the discoveries which he has made of himself to us, to make us easy at all times; the wealth laid up in this tower is enough to enrich them, to be a continual feast, and a continuing treasure, to them; the strength of this tower is enough to protect them; the name of the Lord is all that whereby he has made himself known as God, and our God, not only his titles and attributes, but his covenant and all the promises of it; these make up a tower, a strong tower, impenetrable, impregnable, for all God's people.

2. The saints' security in God. It is a strong tower; how he knows how to make use of it as such; the righteous, by faith and prayer, devotion toward God, and dependence on him, run into it as their city of refuge; having made sure their interest in God's name, they take the comfort and benefit of it; they go out of themselves, retire from the world, live above, dwell in God, and God in them, and so they are safe, they think themselves so, and they shall find themselves so.

11. The rich man's wealth is his strong city, and as a high wall in his own conceit.

Having described the firm and faithful defence of the righteous man, (v. 10,) he here shows what is the false and deceitful defence of the rich man, that has his portion and treasure in the things of this world, and sets his heart upon them; his wealth is as much his confidence, and he expects as much from it as from his God, and from his own power.

See, 1. How he supports himself; he makes his wealth his city, where he dwells, where he rules, with a great deal of self-complacency, as if he had a whole city under his command. It is his strong city, in which he intrenches himself, and then sets danger at defiance, as if nothing could hurt him. His scales are his pride; his wealth is his wall in which he incloses himself, and he thinks it a high wall which cannot be scaled or get over, Job xxxi. 14. Rev. xviii. 7.

2. How herein he cheats himself; it is a strong city, and a high wall, but it is so only in his own conceit, it will not prove to be really so, but, like the house built on the sand, it will fall the builder when he most needs it.

12. Before destruction the heart of man is haughty, and before honour is humility.

Note. 1. Pride is the presage of ruin, and ruin will, at last be the punishment of pride; for before destruction men are commonly so infatuated by the just judgment of God, that they are more haughty than ever; that their ruin may be the sorer, and the more surprising. Or, if that do not always hold, yet, after the heart has been lifted up with pride, a fall comes, ch. xvi. 18.

2. Humility is the presage of honour, and prepares men for it, and honour shall at length be the reward of humility, as he had said before, ch. xv. 33. That has need to be often said which men are so loath to believe.

See here how men often expose themselves by that very thing by which they hope to gain applause.

1. Some take a pride in being quick; they answer a matter before they hear it, hear it cut, nay, as soon as they but hear of it. They think it is their honour to take up a cause suddenly; and when they have heard one side, they think the matter so plain, that they need not trouble themselves to hear the other, they are already apprized of it, and masters and all the merits of the cause. Whereas, though a ready wit is an agreeable thing to play with, it is solid judgment and sound wisdom that do business.

2. Those that take a pride in being quick, commonly fall under the just reproach of being impertinent. It is folly for a man to go about to speak to a thing which he does not understand, or to pass sentence upon a matter which he is not truly and fully informed of, and has not patience to make a strict inquiry into; and if it be folly, it is, and will be, shame.

14. The spirit of a man will sustain his infirmity; but a wounded spirit who can bear?

Note. 1. Outward grievances are tolerable as long as the mind enjoys itself, and is at ease. Many infirmities, many calamities, we are liable to in this world, in body, name, and estate, which a man may bear, and bear up under, if he have but good conduct and courage, and be able to act with reason and resolution, especially if he have a good conscience, and the testimony of that be for him; and if the spirit of a man will sustain the infirmity, much more will the spirit of a Christian, or rather the Spirit of God, witnessing and working with our spirits in a day of trouble.

2. The grievances of the spirit are of all others most heavy and hardly to be borne; these make sore the shoulders which should sustain the other infirmities. If the spirit be wounded by the disturbance of the reason, defection under the trouble, whatever it is, and despair of relief; if the spirit be wounded by the amazing apprehensions of God's wrath for sin, and the fearful expectations of judgment and fiery indignation, who can bear this? Wounded spirits cannot help themselves, nor do others know how to help them. It is therefore wisdom to keep conscience void of offence.

15. The heart of the prudent getteth knowledge; and the ear of the wise seeketh knowledge.
Not, 1. Those that are prudent will seek knowledge, and apply their ear and heart to the pursuit of it; their ear to attend to the means of knowledge, and their heart to mix faith with what they hear, and make a good improvement of it. Those that are prudent do not think they have prudence enough, but still see they have need of more; and the more prudent a man is, the more inquisitive will he be after knowledge, the knowledge of God and his duty, and the way to heaven, for that is the best knowledge.

2. Those that prudently seek knowledge, shall certainly get knowledge, for God never said to such, Seek, in vain. Seek, and ye shall find. If the ear seeketh, and the heart meteth it, and keeps it, and is enriched by it. We must get knowledge, not only into our heads, but into our hearts, get the savour and relish of it, apply what we know to ourselves, and experience the power and influence of it.

Of what great force gifts, bribes, are, he had intimated before, ch. xvii. 8, 25. Here he shows the power of gifts, presents, made even by inferiors to those that are above them, and have much more than they have. A good present will go far,

1. Towards a man's liberty; a man's gift, if he be in prison, may procure his enlargement; there are courtiers, who, if they use their interest even for oppressed innocency, expect to be gratified for it. Or, if a mean man know not how to get access to a great man, he may do it by a fee to his servants, or a present to himself; those will make room for his gift.

2. Toward his preferment. It will bring him to sit among great men in honour and power. See how corrupt this world is, when men's gifts will do that for them which their merits will not do, though ever so great; nay, will gain that for them which they are unworthy of, and unfit for; and no wonder that those take bribes in their offices, who gave bribes for them. Vendi puro potens, emarat ille fru.—He that bought law, can sell it.

17. He that is first in his own cause seemeth just; but his neighbour cometh and searcheth him.

This shows that one tale is good till another is told.

1. He that speaks first will be sure to tell a straight story, and relate that only which makes for him, and put the best colour he can upon it, so that his cause shall appear good, whether it really be so or no.

2. The plaintiff having done his evidence, it is fit that the defendant should be heard, should have leave to confront the witnesses, and cross-examine them, and show the falsehood and fallacy of what has been alleged, which, perhaps, may make the matter appear quite otherwise than it did. We must therefore remember that we have ears to hear each side before we give judgment.

18. The lot causeth contentions to cease, and parteth between the mighty.

Note, 1. Contentions commonly happen among the mighty, that are jealous for their honour and right, and stand upon the punctilios of both, and are confident of their being able to make their part good. Their hearts are hardly condescend to the necessary terms of an accommodation; whereas those that are poor are forced to be peaceable, and sit down losers.

2. Even the contentions of the mighty may be ended by lot, if they cannot otherwise be compromised, and sometimes better so than by arguments which are endless, or concessions which they are loath to stoop to, whereas it is no dispensation to a man to acquiesce in the determination of the lot, when once it is referred to that. To prevent quarrels, Canaan was divided by lot; and, if usury laws had not the usual way of appeal to Providence, perhaps it might be very well used now for the deciding of many controversies, both to the honour of God, and the satisfaction of the parties, provided it be done with prayer and due solemnity, this, and some other scriptures, seeming to direct to it, especially Acts i. 26. If the law is a lottery (as some have called it,) it were as well that a lottery were the law.

19. A brother offended is harder to be won than a strong city; and their contentions are like the bars of a castle.

Note, 1. Great care must be taken to prevent quarrels among relations, and those that are under special obligation to each other, not only because they are most unnatural and unbecoming, but because such things are commonly taken most unkindly, and resentments are apt to be carried too far. Wisdom and grace would indeed make it most easy to us to forgive our relations and friends. If they offend us, and the corruption makes it most difficult to forgive them; let us therefore take heed of disobliging a brother, or one that has been as a brother; ingratitude is very provoking.

2. Great pains must be taken to compromise matters in variance between relations, with all speed, because it is a work of so much difficulty, and, consequently, the more honourable if it be done. Esau was a brother offended, and seemed harder to be won than a strong city, yet, by a work of God upon his heart, in answer to Jacob's prayer, he was won.

20. A man's belly shall be satisfied with the fruit of his mouth; and with the increase of his lips shall he be filled.

Note, 1. Our comfort depends very much upon the testimony of our own consciences, for us, or against us. The belly is here put for the conscience, as ch. xx. 27. Now it is of great consequence to us whether that be satisfied, and what that is filled with, for, accordingly, will our satisfaction be, and our inward peace.

2. The testimony of our consciences will be for us, or against us, according as we have, or have not, governed our tongues well. According as the fruit of the mouth is, good or bad, unto piety or unto righteousness, accordingly the character of the man is, and, consequently, the testimony of his conscience concerning him. "We ought to take as great care about the words we speak, as we do about the fruit of our trees, or the increase of the earth, which we are to eat; for, according as they are wholesome or unwholesome, so will the pleasure or the pain be, wherewith we shall be filled." See Bishop Patrick.

21. Death and life are in the power of the tongue; and they that love it shall eat the fruit thereof.

Note, 1. A man may do a great deal of good, or a great deal of hurt, both to others and to himself, according to the use he makes of his tongue. Many a one has been his own death by a foul tongue, or the death of others by a false tongue; and, on the contrary, many a one has saved his own life, or procured the comfort of it, by a prudent gentle tongue, and saved the lives of others by a seasonable intercession or intercession for them. And if by our words we must be justified or condemned, death and life are, no doubt, in the power of the tongue. Tongues were Esop's best meat, and his worst.

2. Men's words will be judged of by the affections with which they speak; he that not only speaks angry, (which a bad man may do to save his credit, or please his company,) but loves to speak so, speaks well of choice, and with delight, to him it will be life; and he that not only speaks amiss, (which a good man may do through inadvertency,) but loves to speak so, (Ps. lii. 4.) to him it will be death. As men love it, they shall eat the fruit of it.

22. Whoso findeth a wife, findeth a good thing, and obtaineth favour of the Lord.

Note. 1. A good wife is a great blessing to a man. He that finds a wife, that is, a wife indeed, (a bad wife does not deserve to be called by a name fit so much honour,) that finds a help meet for him, that is a wife in the original acceptance of the word, that sought such a one with care and prayer, and has found what he sought, he has found a good thing, a jewel of great value, a rare jewel, he has found that which will not only contribute more than anything to his comfort in this life, but will forward him in the way to heaven.

2. God is to be admired lodged in it with thankfully, a token of his favour, and a happy pledge of further favours; it is a sign that God delights in a man to do him good, and has mercy in store for him; for this, therefore, God must be sought unto.

23. The poor useth entreaties; but the rich answereth roughly.

Note. 1. Poverty, though many inconveniences to the body attend it, has often a good effect upon the spirit, for it makes men humble and submissive, and makes their pride; it teaches them to use entreaties; it teaches them to watch for favours; it tells them they must not prescribe or demand, but take what is given them, and be thankful. At the throne of God's grace we are all poor, and must use entreaties, not answer, but make application, must sue sub forma piauferis—as a piaufer.

2. A prosperous condition, though it has many advantages, has often this mischief attending it, that it makes men proud, haughty, and imperious; The rich amuse the poor of the poor roughly, as Nabul answered David's messengers with railing. It is a very foolish humour of some rich men, especially those who have risen from little, that they think their riches will warrant them to give hard words, and, even where they do not design any rough dealing, that it becomes them to answer roughly, whereas gentlemen ought to be gentle, Jam. iii. 17.

24. A man that hath friends must show himself friendly; and there is a friend that sticketh closer than a brother.

Solomon here recommends friendship to us, and shows,

1. What we must do, that we may contract and cultivate friendship; we must show ourselves friendly. Would we have friends and keep them, we must not only befriend them, or quarrel with them, but we must love them, and make it appear that we do so, by all expressions that are endearing; by being free with them, pleasing to them, visiting them, and bidding them welcome, and especially by doing all the good offices we can, and serving them in every thing that lies in our power; that is showing ourselves friendly.

Si vis amari, amas—
If you wish to gain affection, bestow it. Sen.

Ut ameris, amabilis esto—
The way to be beloved, is to be lovely. Ovid

2. That it is worth while to do so, for we may promise ourselves a great deal of comfort in a true friend; A brother indeed is born for adversity, as he had said, ch. xvii. 17. In our troubles, we expect comfort and relief from our relations, but sometimes these things are friens, and that is nothing akin to us, the bonds of whose name he and love prove stronger than those of nature, and therefore he sticks closer than a brother, and, when it comes to the trial, will do more for us than a brother will. Christ is a Friend to all believers, that sticks closer than a brother; to him therefore let them show themselves friendly.

CHAP. XIX.

1. BETTER is the poor that walketh in his integrity, than he that is perverse in his lips, and is a fool.

Here see, 1. What will be the credit and comfort of a poor man, and make him more excellent than his neighbour, though his poverty may expose him to contempt, and may dispirit him. Let him be honest, and walk in integrity, let him keep a good conscience, and make it appear that he does so, let him always speak and act with sincerity, when he is under the greatest temptations to dissemble, and break his word, and then let him value himself upon that, for all wise and good men will value him. He is better, has a better character, is in a better condition, is better beloved, and lives to better purpose, than many a one that mocks great, and makes a figure.

2. What will be the shame of a rich man, notwithstanding all his pomp. If he have a shal low head, and an evil tongue, if he is perverse in his lips, and is a fool, if he is a wicked man, and gets what he has by fraud and oppression, he is a fool, and an honest poor man is to be preferred far before him.

2. Also, that the soul be without knowledge, it is not good; and he that hasteth with his feet sinneth.

Two things are here showed to be of bad consequence; 1. Ignorance; To be without the knowledge of the soul is not good, so some read it. Know not our own selves, our own hearts? A soul without knowledge is not good; it is a great privilege that we have souls, but if these souls have not knowledge, what the better are we? If man have not understanding, he is as the beast, Ps. xlix. 20. An ignorant soul cannot be a good soul. That the soul be without knowledge, is not safe, nor pleasant; what good can they do, or what is it good for, if it be without knowledge?

2. Rashness; He that hasteth with his feet, that does things incomodiously, and with precipitation, and will not take time to ponder the path of his feet, sins; he cannot but miss it often, and take many a false step, which these prevent that consider their ways. As well not know, as not consider.

3. The foolishness of man perverteth his way; and his heart fretteth against the Lord.

We have here two instances of men's folly. 1. That they bring themselves into straits and troubles, and run themselves aground, and embarras themselves; The foolishness of man perverteth his way. Men meet with crosses and disappointments in their affairs, and things do not succeed as they expected and wished, and it is their own fault, and their own folly; it is their own iniquity that corrects them.
2. That, when they have done so, they lay the blame upon God, and their hearts fret against him, as if he had done them wrong, when this they would condemn. In fretting, we are enemies to our own peace, and become self-tormentors; in fretting against the Lord, we affront him, his justice, goodness, and sovereignty; but it is very absurd to take occasion, from the trouble which we pull upon our own heads by our wilfulness, or neglect, to quarrel with him, when we ought to blame ourselves, for it is our own doing. See Isa. 1. 1.

4. Wealth maketh many friends; but the poor is separated from his neighbour.

Here, 1. We may see how strong is men’s love of money, that they will love any man, how undeserving soever he be otherwise, if he has but a deal of money, and is free with it, so that they may hope to be the better for it. Wealth enables a man to send many presents, make many entertainments, and do many good offices, and so gains him many friends, who pretend to love him, for they flatter him, and make their court to him, but really love what he has; or rather love themselves, hoping to get by him.

2. We may see how weak is men’s love of one another; He who, while he prospered, was loved and respected, if he fall into poverty, is separated from his neighbour, is not owned or looked upon, not visited or regarded, is bid to keep his distance, and told he is troublesome; even one that has been his neighbour and acquaintance, shall turn his face from him; and pass by on the other side; because men’s consciences tell them they ought to relieve and succour such, they are willing to have this excuse, that they did not see them.

5. A false witness shall not be unpunished; and he that speaketh lies shall not escape.

Here we have, 1. The sins threatened; bearing false witness in judgment, and speaking lies in common conversation. Men could not arrive at such a pitch of impetu as to bear false witness, (where to the very person of a lie, and to the injury,) if they had not advanced to it by allowing themselves to speak untruths in jest and banter, or under pretence of doing good. Thus men teach their tongues to speak lies, Jer. ix. 5. Those that will take a liberty to tell lies in discourse are in a fair way to be guilty of the greater wickedness of false-witnes-bearing; whenever they are tempted to it, though they had seemed to deter it. They that can swallow a false word debauch their consciences, so that a false oath will not choketh them.

2. The threatening itself; they shall not go unpunished, they shall not escape. This intimates, that that which imboldens them in the sin, is, hope of impunity, and that is a sin which commonly escapes punishment from men, though the law was strict, Deut. xix. 18, 19. But it shall not escape the righteous judgment of God, who is jealous, and will not suffer his name to be profaned; we know where all liars will have their everlasting portion.

6. Many will entreat the favour of the prince; and every man is a friend to him that giveth gifts. 7. All the brethren of the poor do hate him; how much more do his friends go far from him? he pursueth them with words, yet they are wanting to him.

These two verses are a comment upon v. 4, and show,

1. How those that are rich and great are courted and caressed, and have suitors, and servants, in abundance. The prince that has power in his hand, and precepts at his disposal, has his gate and his anti-chamber thronged with petitioners, that are willing to wait upon him, that they may get what they will entertain his favour, and think themselves happy in it. Even great men are humble suppliants to the prince. How earnest then should we be for the favour of God, which is far beyond that of any earthly prince! But, it should seem, liberality will go further than majesty itself to gain respect, for they are many that court the prince, but every man is a friend to him that gives gifts; not only that he is received, or do respect, gifts from him, will, as friends, be ready to serve him, but others also will, as friends, give him their good word. Prodigals, who are foolishly free of what they have, will have many hangers-on, who will cry them up as long as it lasts, but will leave them when it is done. Those that are prudently generous make an interest by it, which may stand them in good stead; they are accounted benefactors, erect another which may give them an opportunity of doing good, Luke xxii. 23.

2. How those that are poor and low are slighted and despised. It should not be so, we must honour all men, even under their greatest abasement; men may, if they please, court the prince, and the princely, but they may not trample upon the poor, and look at them with disdain; yet so it often is, All the brethren of the poor do hate him, even his own relations are shy of him, because he is needy and craving, and expects something from them, and because they look upon him as a blemish to their family; and then, no marvel if others of his friends, that were nothing akin to him, go far from him, to get out of his way; he pursueth them with words, hoping to prevail with them, by his importunity, to be kind to him, but all in vain, they have nothing for him. They pursue him with words, so some understand it, to excuse themselves from giving him anything; they tell him that he is idle and impertinent, that he has brought himself into poverty, and therefore ought not to be relieved; as Nabal said to David’s messengers, “There are many servants now-a-days, that run away from their masters; and how do I know but that David may be one of them?” Let poor people therefore make God their Friend, pursue him with their prayers, and he will not be wanting to them.

8. He that getteth wisdom loveth his own soul; he that keepeth understanding shall find good.

They are here encouraged,

1. That take pains to get wisdom, to get knowledge and peace, and acquaintance with God; they that do so, show that they love their own souls, and will be found to have done themselves the greatest kindness imaginable. No man ever hated his own flesh, but loves that; yet many are wanting in love to their own souls, for those only love their souls, and, consequently, love themselves aright, that get wisdom, true wisdom.

2. That take care to keep it when they have got it; it is health, and wealth, and honour, and all to the soul, and therefore he that keeps understanding, as he shows that he loves his own soul, so he shall certainly find good, all good. He that retains the good lessons he has learnt, and orders his conversation according to them, shall find the benefit and comfort of it in his own soul, and shall be happy here and for ever.

9. A false witness shall not be unpunished; and he that speaketh lies shall perish.

Here is, 1. A repetition of what was said before,
(v. 5.) for we have need to be again and again warned of the danger of the sin of lying and false-wit ness bearing, since nothing is of more fatal consequence.

2. An addition to it in one word; there it was said, He that speaks lies shall not escape, and implied that he shall be punished. Here it is said, His punishment shall be as will be his destruction, he shall perish; the lie he forged against others will be his own ruin. It is a damming, destroying, sin.

10. Delight is not seemly for a fool; much less for a servant to have rule over princes.

Note. 1. Pleasure and liberty ill become a fool; Delight is not seemly for such a one. A man that has not wisdom and grace has no right or title to true joy, and therefore it is given to none. It ill be comes those, that do not delight in God, to delight in any thing else. They know not how to use any thing, nor how to manage themselves, and therefore they do but expose themselves. It becomes ungracious fools to be afflicted, and mourne, and weep, not to laugh and be merry; rebukes are more proper for them than delights. Delight is seemly for a man of business, to refresh him when he is fatigued, but not for a fool that lives an idle life, and abuses his reasonings. The proximity of fools discourses their folly, and destroys them.

2. Power and honour ill become a man of a servile spirit; nothing is more unseemly than for a servant to have rule over princes; it is absurd in itself, and very preposterous; for none are so insolent and intolerable as a beggar on horseback, a servant when he reigns, ch. xxx. 22. It is very unseemly for one, that is a servant to sin and his lusts, to rule over and oppress those that are God's freemen, and made kings and priests to him.

11. The discretion of a man deterreth his anger; and it is his glory to pass over a transgression.

A wise man will observe these two rules about his anger;

1. Not to be over-hasty in his resentments; Discretion teaches us to defer our anger; to defer the admission of it, till we have thoroughly considered all the merits of the provocation, seen them in a true light, and weighed them in a just balance; and then to defer the prosecution of it, till there be no danger of running into any indecencies. Plato said to his servant, "I would beat thee, but that I am angry." Give it time, and it will cool.

2. Not to be over-critical in his resentments. Whereas it is commonly looked upon as a piece of ingenuity to apprehend an affront quickly, it is here made a man's glory to pass over a transgression, to appear as if he did not see it; (Ps. xxxviii. 13.) or, if he sees fit to take notice of it, yet to forgive it, and mediate no revenge.

12. The king's wrath is as the roaring of a lion; but his favour is as dew upon the grass.

This is to the same purport with what we had, ch. xvi. 14, 15. and the design of it is,

1. To make kings wise and considerate in dispensing their favours and smiles; they are not like those of common persons, their favours are very terrible, and their smiles very comfortable, and therefore it concerns them to be very careful that they never frighten a good man from doing well, with their favours, nor ever give contentance to a wicked man in doing ill, with their smiles, for then they abuse their influence, Rom. xii. 3.

2. To make subjects faithful and dutiful to their princes. Let them be restrained from all disloyalty, by the consideration of the dreadful consequence of having the government against them; and let them be encouraged in all good services to the public, by the hopes of the favour of the prince. Cost a King, whose wrath against his enemies will be as the roaring of a lion, (Rev. x. 3.) and his favour to his own people as the refreshing dew, Ps. lxx. 3.

13. A foolish son is the calamity of his father; and the contentions of a wife are a continual dropping.

It is an instance of the vanity of the world, that we are liable to the greatest griefs in those things wherein we promise ourselves the greatest comfort. It is as it proves. What greater temporal comfort can a man have than a good wife, and good children? Yet,

1. A foolish son is a great affliction, and may make a man wish a thousand times he had been written childless. A son that will apply himself to no study or business, that will take no advice, that lives a lewd, loose, rakish, life, and spends what he has extravagantly, games it away, and wastes it in the excess of riot, or that is proud, foppish, and conceited, such a one is the grief of his father, because he is the disgrace, and is likely to be the ruin, of his family. He hates all his labour, when he sees to whom he must leave the fruit of it.

2. A provoking wife is as great an affliction; Her contentions are continual; every day and every hour in the day, she finds some occasion to make herself, and those about her, uneasy. Those that are accustomed to chide, never want something or other to chide at; but it is a continual dropping, that is, a continual vexation, as it is to have a house so much out of repair that it rains in, and a man cannot lie dry in it. That man has an uncomfortable life, and has need of a great deal of wisdom and grace to enable him to bear his affliction, and do his duty, that has a set to his son, and a scold to his wife.

14. House and riches are the inheritance of fathers; and a prudent wife is from the Lord.

Note. 1. A discreet and virtuous wife is a choice gift of God's providence to a man; a wife that is prudent, in opposition to one that is contentions, v. 15. For though a wife, that is continually finding fault, may think it is her wit and wisdom to be so, it is really her folly; a prudent wife is meek and quiet, and makes the best of every thing. If a man has such a wife, let him not ascribe it to the wisdom of his own choice, or his own management, (for the wisest have been deceived both in and by a woman,) but let him ascribe it to the goodness of God, who made him a help meet for him, and, perhaps, by some hits and turns of providence, that seemed casual, brought her to him. Every creature is what he makes it. Happy marriages, we are sure, are made in heaven; Abraham's servant prayed in the belief of this, Gen. xxiv. 12.

2. It is a more valuable gift than house and riches, contributes more to the comfort and credit of a man's life, and the welfare of his family, is a greater token of God's favour, and about which the Divine Providence is in a more especial manner conversant. A good estate may be the inheritance of fathers, which, by the common direction of Providence, comes in course to a man; but no man has a good wife by descent or entail. Parents that are worldly, in disposing of their children, look no further than to match them to house and riches, but it was to a prudent wife, let God have the glory.
15. Slothfulness casteth into a deep sleep; and an idle soul shall suffer hunger.

See here the evil of a sluggish, slothful, disposition: 1. It stupefies men, and makes them senseless, and mindless of their own affairs, as if they were cast into a deep sleep, dreaming much, but doing nothing. 2. It doth not only slumber, but also destroy their talents, live a useless life, and are the unpohftitable burdens of the earth; for any service they do when they are awake they had as good be always asleep. Even their souls are idle, and lulled asleep, their rational powers chilled and frozen.

2. It impoverishes men, and brings them to want; they that will not labour, cannot expect to eat, but must suffer hunger; An idle soul, one that is idle in the affairs of his soul, that takes no care or pains to work out his salvation, shall perish for want of that which is necessary to the life and happiness of the soul.

16. He that keepeth the commandment keepeth his own soul; but he that despiseth his ways shall die.

Here is, 1. The happiness of those that walk circumspectly; They that make conscience of keeping the commandment in every thing, that live by rule, as becomes servants and patients, they keep their own souls, they secure their present peace, and future bliss, and provide every way well for themselves. If we keep God's word, God's word will keep us from every thing really hurtful.

2. The misery of those that live at large, and neglect the worship of God: They that despise their ways shall die, shall perish eternally, they are in the high road to ruin. With respect to those that are careless about the end of their ways, and never consider whether they are going, and about the rule of their ways, that will walk in the way of their hearts, and after the course of the world, (Eccl. xi. 9.) that never consider what they have done, or what they are concerned to do, but walk at all adventures, (Lec. xxxvi. 21.) right or wrong, it is all one to them; what can come of this but the greatest mischief?

17. He that hath pity upon the poor lendeth unto the Lord; and that which he hath given will he pay him again.

Here is, 1. The duty of charity described. It includes two things: (1.) Compassion, which is the inward principle of charity in the heart; it is to have pity on the poor; those that have not a penny for the poor, yet may have pity on them, a charitable concern and sympathy; and if a man give all his goods to feed the poor, and have not this charity in his heart, it is nothing, 1 Cor. xiii. 3. We must draw out our souls to the hungry, Isa. lviii. 10. (2.) Bounty and liberality. We must not only pity the poor, but give, according to their necessity and our ability, Jam. iii. 15, 16. That which he has given. Margin, His deed. It is charity to do for the poor, as well as to give; and thus, if they have their limbs and senses, they may be charitable to one another.

2. The encouragement of charity. (1.) A very kind construction shall be put upon it; What is given to the poor, or done for them, God will place it to account as lent to him, lent inpon interest, so the word signifies; he takes it kindly, as if it were done to himself, and he would have us to take the comfort of it, and to be as well pleased as ever any insurer was when he had let out a sum of money into good hands. (2.) A very rich recompence shall be made for it; he will pay him again. In temporal, spiritual, and eternal blessings. Almsgiving is the surest and safest way of thriving.

18. Chasten thy son while there is hope, and let not thy soul spare for his crying.

Parents are here cautioned against a foolish indulgence of their children, that are untoward and viciously inclined, and that discover such an ill temper of mind as is not likely to be cured but by severity.

1. Do not say, that it is all in good time to correct them; no, as soon as ever there appears a corrupt disposition in them, check it immediately, before it gets head, and takes root, and is hardened into a habit; Chasten thy son while there is hope, for, perhaps, if he be let alone awhile, he will be past hope, and a much greater chastening will not do that which now a less would effect. It is easiest plucking up weeds as soon as they spring up, and the bullock that is designed for the yoke should be betimes accustomed to it.

2. Do not say, that it is a pity to correct them, and that because they cry, and beg to be forgiven, you cannot find in your heart to do it; if the point will be gained without correction, well and good; but if you find, as it often proves, that your forgiving them once, upon a dissembled repentance, and promise of amendment, does but embolden them and harden again, especially, if it be a thing that is itself sinful, as lying, swearing, ribaldry, stealing, or the like; in such a case, put on resolution, and let not thy soul spare for his crying. It is better that he should cry under the rod, than under the sword of the magistrate, or, which is more fearful, that of divine vengeance.

19. A man of great wrath shall suffer punishment; for if thou deliver him, yet thou must do it again.

1. As we read this, it intimates, in short, that angry men never want we; those that are of strong, or rather of headstrong, passions, commonly bring themselves, and their families, into trouble and vexations suits and quarrels, and the provocations they give; they are still smarting, in one instance or other, for their ungodly heats; and if their friends deliver them out of one trouble, they will quickly involve themselves in another, and they must do it again; all which trouble to themselves and others would be prevented if they would mortify their passions, and get the rule of their own spirits.

2. It may as well be read, He that is of great wrath, meaning the child that is to be corrected, and is impatient of rebuke, cries, and makes a noise, even that wrath of his against the rod of correction deserves to be punished, for if thou deliver him for the sake of that, thou wilt be forced to punish him so much the more the next time. A stomachful, high-spirited, child, must be subdued betimes, or it will be the worse for it.

20. Hear counsel, and receive instruction, that thou mayest be wise in thy latter end.

Note. 1. It is well with those that are wise in their latter end, wise for their latter end, for their future state, for another world, that are found wise when their latter end comes; wise virgins, wise builders, wise stewards; that are wise at length, and understand the things that belong to their peace, before they be hid from their eyes. A carnal worldly, at his end, shall be a fool, (Jer. xviii. 11.) but godliness will prove wisdom at last. 2. Those that would be wise in their latter end, must hear counsel, and receive instruction, in their
21. There are many devices in a man's heart; nevertheless, the counsel of the Lord, that shall stand.

Here is, 1. Men projecting. They keep their designs to themselves, but they cannot hide them from God, he knows the many devices that are in men's hearts, devices against his counsel, as those, Ps. ii. 1•3. Micah iv. 11. devices without his counsel, no regard had to his providence, as those, James iv. 13. This and the other they will do, and not take God along with them; devices unlike God's counsels; men are wavering in their devices, and often absurd and unjust, but God's counsels are wise and holy, steady and uniform.

2. God overruling. Various men have various designs, according as their inclination and interest leads them, but the counsel of the Lord, that shall stand, whatever comes of the devices of men. His counsel often breaks men's measures, and baffles their devices; but their devices cannot in the least alter his counsel, or disturb the proceedings of it, or put him upon new counsels, Isa. xiv. 24.—xlvi. 11. What a check does this give to politic, designing, men, who think they can manage all mankind, that there is a God in heaven, that laughs at them! Ps. ii. 4. What comfort does this speak to all God's people, that all God's purposes, which, we are sure, are right and good, shall be accomplished in due time!

22. The desire of a man is his kindness; and a poor man is better than a liar.

Note, 1. The honour of doing good is what we may reasonably be ambitious of. It cannot but be the desire of a man, if he have any spark of virtue in him, to be kind; one would not covet an estate for anything so much as thereby to be put into a capacity of relieving the poor, and obliging our friends.

2. It is far better to have a heart to do good, and want ability for it, than have ability for it, and want a heart to it; The desire of a man to be kind, and charitable, and generous, is his kindness, and shall be so construed; both God and man will accept his good will, according to what he has, and will not expect more. A poor man, who wishes you well, but can promise you nothing, because he has nothing to be kind with, is better than a liar, than a rich man, who makes you believe he will do mighty things, but, when it comes to the setting to, will do nothing. The character of the men of low degree, that they are vanity, from whom nothing is expected, is better than that of men of high degree; that they are a lie, they deceive those whose expectations they raised.

23. The fear of the Lord tendeth to life; and he that hath it shall abide satisfied; he shall not be visited with evil.

See what they get by it, that live in the fear of God, and always make conscience of their duty to him.

1. Safety: They shall not be visited with evil; they may be visited with sickness, or other afflictions, but there shall be no evil in them, nothing to hurt them, because nothing to separate them from the love of God, or to hurt the soul.

Satisfaction: They shall abide satisfied; they shall have those comforts which are satisfying, and shall have a constant contentment and complacency in them. It is a satisfaction which will abide, whereas all the satisfactions of sense are transient, and soon gone. Satur penurocabit, non cubabit incan- tatione—He shall not go supperless to bed; he shall have that which will make him easy, and be an entertainment to him in his silent and solitary hours, Ps. cxv. 7.

3. True and complete happiness; serious godli- ness has a direct tendency to life, to all good, to eternal life; it is the sure and ready way to it; there is something in the nature of it, fitting men for heaven, and so leading them to it.

24. A slothful man hideth his hand in his bosom, and will not so much as bring it to his mouth again.

A sluggard is here exposed as a fool, for, 1. All his care is to save himself from labour and cold. See his posture; He hides his hand in his bosom, pretends he is lame, and cannot work; his hands are cold, and he must warm them in his bosom; and, when they are warm there, he must keep them so. He hides himself in his own case, and is resolved against labour and hardship. Let those work that love it; for his part, he thinks there is no such fine life as sitting still and doing nothing.

2. He will not be at the pains to feed himself; an elegant hyperbole; as we say, A man is so lazy, that he would not shake fire off him; so here, He cannot find in his heart to take his hand out of his bosom, not to put meat into his own mouth. If the law be so, that those who will not labour must not eat, he will rather starve than stir: thus his sin is his punishment, and therefore is egregious folly.

25. Smite a scorner, and the simple will beware; and reprove one that hath understanding, and he will understand knowledge.

Note, 1. The punishment of scorners will be a means of good to others. When men are so hardened in wickedness, that they will not themselves be wrought upon by the severe methods that are used to reclaim and reform them, yet such methods must be used for the sake of others, that they may hear and fear, Deut. xiv. 20. If the scorner will not be recovered from his sin, the disease being invertebrate, yet the simple will beware of venturing upon the rozam, which exposes men thus. If it cure not the infected, it may prevent the spreading of the infection.

2. The reproof of wise men will be a means of good to themselves; they need not be smitten; a word to the wise is enough. Do but reprove one that has understanding, and he will so far understand himself and his own interest, that he will understand knowledge by it, and not miss it again, through ignorance and inadvertence, when once he has been told of it; so kindly does he take reproof, and so wisely improve it.

26. He that wasteth his father, and chasteth away his mother, is a son that causeth shame, and bringeth reproach.

Here is, 1. The sin of a prodigal son. Beside the wrong he does to himself, he is injurious to his good parents, and basely ungrateful to them that were the instruments of his being, and have taken so much care and pains about him, which is a great aggravation of his sin, and renders it exceeding sinful in the eyes of God and man. He wastes his father, wastes his estate which he should have supported him in; he degenerates, wastes his spirits, and breaks his heart, and brings his gray head with sorrow to the grave. He chases away his mother, alienates her affections from him, which cannot be done without a great deal of regret and uneness to her; he makes her weary of the house, with his unedness and insolence, and glad to retire for a little quietness; and, when he has all spent, he turns her out of doors.

2. The shame of a prodigal son. It is a shame to himself that he should be so brutish and unnatural; he makes himself odious to all mankind. It is a shame to his parents and family, who are reflected upon, though perhaps without just cause, for teaching him no better, or being some way wanting to him.

27. Cease, my son, to hear the instruction that causeth to err from the words of knowledge.

This is a good caution to those who have had a good education, to take heed of hearkening to those who, under pretense of religion and godliness, give them off from those good principles under the influence of which they were trained up. Observe,

1. There is that which seems designed for the instruction, but really tends to the destruction, of young men. The factors for vice will undertake to teach them free thoughts and a fashionable conversation; how to palliate the sins they have a mind to, and stop the mouth of their own consciences; how to get clear of the restraints of their education, and set up for wits and beaus. This is the instruction which causeth to err from the forms of sound words, which should be held fast in faith and love.

2. It is the wisdom of young men to turn a deaf ear to such instructions, as the adder does to the charms that are designed to insnare her. "Dread hearing such talk as tends to instil loose principles into the mind; and if thou art linked in with such, break off from them; thou hast heard enough, or too much, and therefore hear no more, of the evil communication which corrupts good manners."

28. An ungodly witness scorneth judgment; and the mouth of the wicked devoureth iniquity.

Here is a description of the worst of sinners, whose hearts are fully set in them to do evil.

1. They set that at defiance which would deter and detain them from sin; An ungodly witness is one that bears false witness against his neighbour, and will forswear himself to do another a mischief, in which there is not only great injustice, but great impiety; this is one of the worst of men. Or, An ungodly witness is one that profanely and atheistically witnesses against his neighbor, whose instructions reduceth from the words of knowledge; (v. 27.) such a one scorns judgment, laughs at the terrors of the Lord, mocks at that fear, Job xv. 26. Tell him of law and equity, that the scriptures and an oath are sacred things, and not to be jested with, that there will come a reckoning day; he laughs at it all, and scorns to heed it.

2. They are greedily and glad of that which gives them an opportunity to sin; The mouth of the wicked eavens devoureth iniquity, drinks it in like water, Job xv. 16.

29. Judgments are prepared for scorners, and stripes for the back of fools.

Note, 1. Scorners are fools; those that ridicule things sacred and serious, do but make themselves ridiculous; their folly shall be manifest unto all men.

2. Those that scorn judgments cannot escape them, v. 28. The unbelief of man shall not make God's threatenings of no effect; they that devour iniquity swallow the hook with the bait. The civil magistrate has judgments prepared for scorners; for, otherwise, he would bear the sword in vain; but if he be remiss, and connine at sin, yet God's judgments slumber not, they are prepared, Matth. xxv. 41.

CHAP. XX.

1. WINE, is a mocker, strong drink is raging; and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise.

Here is, 1. The mischief of drunkenness; Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging; it is so to the sinner himself, it mocks him, makes a fool of him, promises him that satisfaction which it can never give him; it smiles upon him at first, but at the last it bites; in reflection upon it, it rages in his conscience; it is raging in the body, puts the humour into a ferment. When the wine is in, the wit is out, and then the man, according as his natural temper in either case may be disposed. If he be a debauchee, he drinks himself into man. Drunkenness, which pretends to be a sociable thing, renders men unfit for society, for it makes them abusive with their tongues, and outrageous in their passions, ch. xxii. 29.

2. The folly of drunkards is easily inferred thence. He that is deceived thereby, that suffers himself to be drawn into this sin, when he is so plainly warned of the consequences of it, is not wise, he shows that he has no right sense or consideration of things; and he is truly so, but he renders himself incapable of getting wisdom; for it is a sin that infatuates and betrays men, and takes away their heart. A drunkard is a fool, and a fool he is likely to be.

2. The fear of a king is as the roaring of a lion: whose provoketh him to anger sinner against his own soul.

See here, 1. How formidable kings are, and what a terror they strike upon those they are angry with; Their fear, with which (especially when they are absolute, and their will is a law) they keep their subjects in awe, is as the roaring of a lion, which is very dreadful to the creatures he preys upon, and makes them tremble, so that they cannot escape from him. Those princes that rule by wisdom and love, rule like God himself, and bear his image; but those that rule merely by terror, and with a high hand, do but rule like a lion in the forest, with a brutal power. Oderint, dum metuant—Let them hate, provided they fear.

2. How unwise therefore they are that quarrel with them, that are angry at them, and so provoke them to anger; they sin against their own lives; much more do they sin with those that we have, who want to provoke the King of kings to anger. Nemo me impune lacesset—No one shall provoke me with impunity.

3. It is an honour for a man to cease from strife: but every fool will be meddling.

This is designed to rectify men's mistakes concerning strife.

1. Men think it is their wisdom to engage in quarrels; whereas it is the greatest folly that can be. He thinks himself a wise man that is quick in resenting affronts, that stands upon every nicety of honour and right; he will not stand an ace of either; that prescribes and imposes, and gives, law, to every body; but he that thus meddles is a fool, and creates a great deal of needless vexation to himself.

2. Men think, when they are engaged in quarrels, that it would be a shame to them to go back, and let fall the weapon; whereas really it is an honour for a man to cease from strife, an honour to withdraw an action, to drop a controversy, to forgive an injury, and even to be disputants with those that we have fallen out with. It is the honour of a man, a wise man, a man of spirit, to show the command he has of himself, by ceasing from strife, yielding, and stooping, and receding from his just demands, for peace sake, as Abraham, the better man, Gen. xiii. 8.

4. The sluggard will not plough by reason of the cold; therefore shall he beg in harvest, and have nothing.

See here the evil of slothfulness, and the love of ease:

1. It keeps men from the most necessary business, from ploughing and sowing when the season is; The sluggard has ground to occupy, and has ability for it, he can plough, but he will not, some excuse or other he has to shift it off, but the true reason is, it is cold weather; though ploughing time is not in the depth of winter, it is in the borders of winter, when he thinks it too cold for him to be abroad. Those are scandalously sluggishe, who, in the way of their business, cannot find in their hearts to undergo so little toil as that of ploughing, and so little hardship as that of a cold blast. Thus careless are many in the affairs of their souls; a trifling difficulty will frighten them from the most important duty; but good soldiers must endure hardness.

2. Thereby it deprives them of the most necessary supports; That will not plough in seed-time, cannot expect to reap in harvest; and therefore they must beg their bread with astonishment when the diligent are bringing home their sheaves with joy. He that will not submit to the labour of ploughing, must submit to the shame of begging; they shall beg in harvest, and yet have nothing; no, not then when there is most plenty. Though it may be charity to relieve sluggards, yet a man may, in justice, not relieve them; they deserve to be left to starve. They that would not provide oil in their vessels, begged when the bridegroom came, and were denied.

5. Counsel in the heart of man is like deep water; but a man of understanding will draw it out.

A man’s wisdom is here said to be of use to him, for the pumping of other people, and diving into their minds.

1. To get the knowledge of them. Though men’s counsels and designs are ever so carefully concealed by them, so that they are as deep water which one cannot fathom; yet there are those who, by sly insinuations, and questions that seem foreign, will get out of them both what they have done, and what they intend to do. Those therefore who would keep counsel, must not only put on resolution, but stand upon their guard.

2. To get knowledge by them. Some are very able and fit to give counsel, have an excellent faculty of clearing a hair, hitting the joint of a difficulty, and advising pertinently; but they are modest, and reserved, and not communicative; they have a great deal in them, but it is loath to come out; in such a case, a man of understanding will draw it out, as wine out of a vessel. We lose the benefit we might have by the conversation of wise men, for want of the art of being inquisitive.

6. Most men will proclaim every one his own goodness: but a faithful man who can find?

Note. 1. It is easy to find those that will pretend to be kind and liberal. Many a man will call himself a man of mercy, will boast what good he has done, and what good he designs to do, or, at least, what an affection he has to well-doing. Most men will talk a great deal of their charity, generosity, hospitality, and piety, will sound a trumpet to themselves, as the Pharisees, and, what little goodness they have, will proclaim it, and make a mighty matter of it.

2. But it is hard to find those that really are kind and liberal; that have done, and will do, more than either they speak of, or care to near spoken of; that will be a true friend in a strait; such a one as one may trust to is like a black swan.

7. The just man walketh in his integrity; his children are blessed after him.

It is here observed, to the honour of a good man, 1. That he does well for himself; he has a certain rule, which, with an even steady hand, he governs himself by; He walks in his integrity, he keeps a good conscience, and he has the comfort of it, for it is his. He is not liable to those uneasinesses, either in contriving what he shall do, or reflecting on what he has done, which they are liable to that walk in deceit.

2. That he does well for his family; His children are blessed after him, and fare the better for his sake; God has mercy in store for the seed of the faithful.

8. A king that sitteth in the throne of judgment scattereth away all evil with his eyes.

Here is 1. The character of a good governor; He is a king that deserves to be called so, who sits in the throne, not as a throne of honour, to take his ease, and take state upon him, and oblige men to keep their distance, but as a throne of judgment, that he may do justice, right the injured, and punish the injurious; that makes his business his delight, and loves to assure confidence, and that does not devolve the whole care and trouble upon others, but takes cognizance of affairs himself, and sees with his own eyes as much as may be, 1 Kings x. 9.

2. The happy effect of a good government. The presence of the prince goes far toward the putting of wickedness out of countenance; if he inspect his affairs himself, those that are employed under him will be kept in awe, and restrained from doing wrong. If great men be good men, and will use their power as they may and ought, what good may they do, and what evil may they prevent?

9. Who can say, I have made my heart clean, I am pure from my sin?

This question is not only a challenge to any man in the world to prove himself sinless, whatever he pretends, but a lamentation of the corruption of mankind, even that which remains in the best. Alas! Who can say, “I am sinless?” Observe,

1. Who the persons are that are excluded from these pretensions; all, one as well as another. Here, in this imperfect state, no person whatsoever can pretend to be without sin. Adam could say so in innocency, and saints can say so in heaven, but none in this life. Those that think themselves as good as they should be, cannot; and, these that are really good, will not, dare not, say this.

2. What the pretension is that is excluded. We cannot say, We have made our hearts clean; though we can say, through grace, “We are cleaner than we have been,” yet we cannot say, “We are clean and pure from all remainders of sin;” or, though we are clean from the gross acts of sin, yet we cannot say, “Our hearts are cleanly;” or, though we are in a pleasure, yet we cannot say, “We ourselves made our own hearts clean,” it was the work of the Spirit; or, though we are pure from the sins of many others, yet we cannot say, “We are pure from our sin, the sin that easily besets us, the body of death which Paul complained of, Rom. vii. 24.

10. Divers weights, and divers measures, both of them are alike abomination to the Lord.

See here, 1. The various arts of deceiving that men have; all which evils the love of money is the root of. In paying and receiving money, which was then commonly done by the scale, they had divers weights, an under-weight for what they paid, and an over-weight for what they received; in delivering out, and taking in, goods, they had divers measures, a scanty measure to sell by, and a large measure to buy by. This was doing wrong with plot and contrivance, and under cover of doing right. Under these is included all manner of fraud and deceit in commerce and trade.

2. The displeasure of God against them; whether they be about the money or the goods in the buyer, or in the seller, they are all alike an abomination to the Lord; he will not prosper the trade that is thus driven, nor bless what is thus got; he hates those that thus break the common faith by which justice is maintained, and will be the Avenger of all such.

11. Even a child is known by his doings, whether his work be pure, and whether it be right.

The tree is known by its fruits, a man by his doings; even a young tree by its first fruits, a child by his childish things, whether his work be clean only, appearing good, (the word is used ch. xvi. 2.) or whether it be right, really good. This intimates,

1. That children will discover themselves; one may soon see what their temper is, and which way their inclination leads them, according as their constitution is. Children have not learned the art of dissembling and concealing their bent, as grown people have.

2. That parents should observe their children, that they may discover their disposition and genius, and both change them, and direct them, accordingly. Drive the mill that will go, and draw out what goes amiss. Wisdom is herein profitable to direct.

12. The hearing ear, and the seeing eye, the Lord hath made even both of them.

Note, 1. God is the God of nature, and all the powers and faculties of nature are derived from him, and depend upon him, and therefore are to be employed for him. It was he that formed the eye, and planted the ear, (Ps. xcv. 9.) and the structure of both is admirable; and it is he that preserves to us the use of both; to his providence we owe it that our eyes are seeing eyes, and our ears hearing ears. Hearing and seeing are the learning senses, and we must particularly own God's goodness in them.

2. God is the God of grace; it is he that gives the ear that hears God's voice, the eye that sees his beauty, for it is he that opens the understanding.

13. Love not sleep, lest thou come to poverty; open thine eyes, and thou shalt be satisfied with bread.

Note, 1. Those that indulge themselves in their case may expect to want necessaries, which should have been gotten by honest labour; "Therefore, though thou must sleep, (nature requires it,) yet love not sleep, as those do that hate business. Love not sleep for its own sake, but only as it fits for further work. Love not much sleep, but rather grudge the time that is spent in it, and wish thou wealthiest live without it, that thou mightest always be employed in some good exercise." We must allow it to our bodies as men allow it to their servants, because they cannot help it, and otherwise they shall have no good of them. They that love sleep are likely to come to poverty, not only because they lose the time they spend in excess of sleep, but because they contract a listless, careless, disposition, and are still half asleep, never well awake.

2. Those that stir up themselves to their business may expect to have conveniences; "Open thine eyes, and awake, and shake off slumber, see how far in the day it is, how thy work wants thee, and how busy others are about thee! And when thou art awake, look up, look to thine advantages, and do not let slip thine opportunities; apply thy mind closely to thy business, and be in care about it. It is the easy condition of a great advantage; open thine eyes, and thou shalt be satisfied with bread; if thou dost not grow rich, yet thou shalt have enough; and that is as good as a feast."

14. It is naught, it is naught, saith the buyer: but when he is gone his way, then he boasteth.

See here, 1. What arts men use to get a good bargain, and to buy cheap. They not only cheapen carelessly, as if they had no need, no mind, for the commodity, when, perhaps, they cannot go without it, (there may be prudence in that,) but they villify and run down that which yet they know to be of value; they cry, "It is naught, it is naught; it has this and the other fault, or perhaps may have; it is not good of the sort; and it is too dear; we can have better and cheaper elsewhere; or have bought better and cheaper." This is the common way of dealing; and after all, it may be, they knew the contrary of what they affirm; but the buyer may think he has no other way of being even with the seller, who deems as extravagantly commend his goods, and justify the price he sets on them; and so there is a fault on both sides; whereas the bargain would be made every jot as well, if both buyer and seller would be modest, and speak as they think.

2. What pride and pleasure often take in a good bargain, and how good bargains, through wherein they contradict themselves, and own they dissembled when they were driving the bargain; when he has beaten down the seller, who was content to lower his price rather than lose a customer, (as many poor tradesmen are forced to do, small profit is better than none,) then he goes his way, and boasts what excellent goods he has got at his own price, and takes it as an affront and a reflection upon his judgment if any body disparages his bargain. Perhaps he knew the worth of the goods better than the seller himself did, and knows how to get a great deal by them. See how apt men are to be pleased with their gettings, and proud of their tricks; whereas a fraud and a lie are what a man ought to be ashamed of, though he have gained ever so much by them.

15. There is gold, and a multitude of rubies: but the lips of knowledge are a precious jewel.

The lips of knowledge (a good understanding to guide the lips, and a good eloquence to diffuse the knowledge) are to be preferred far before gold, and pearl, and rubies; for,

1. They are more rare in themselves, more scarce, and hard to be got. There is gold in many a man's pocket, that has no grace in his heart. In Solomon's time there was plenty of gold, (1 Kings x. 21.) and abundance of rubies, every body wore them, they were to be bought in every town; but wisdom is a rare thing, a precious jewel, few have it so as to de good with it, nor is it to be purchased of the merchants.
2. They are more enriching to us, and more adorning: They make us rich toward God, rich in good works. 1 Tim. ii. 9, 10. Most men are beggars of gold, and a ruby or two will not serve, they must have a multitude of them, a cabinet of jewels, but he that has the lips of knowledge despises these, because he knows and possesses better things.

16. Take his garment that is surety for a stranger; and take a pledge of him for a strange woman.

Two sorts of persons are here spoken of, that are ruining their own estates, and will be beggars shortly, and therefore are not to be trusted without good security.
1. Those that will be bound for any body that will ask them, that entangle themselves in rash sureties, to oblige their idle companions; they will break at last, nay, they cannot hold out long; these waste by wholesale.
2. Those that are in league with abandoned women, that treat them, and court them, and keep company with them; they will be beggars in a little time, never give them credit without a good pawn. Strange women have strange ways of impoverishing men, to enrich themselves.

17. Bread of deceit is sweet to a man; but afterwards his mouth shall be filled with gravel.

Note, 1. Sin may be pleasant in the commission; Bread of deceit, wealth gotten by fraud, by lying and oppression, may be sweet to a man, and the more sweet for its being ill-gotten; such pleasure does the carnal mind take in the success of its wicked projects. All the pleasures and profits of sin are bread of deceit, they are stolen, for they are forbidden fruit, and they will deceive men, for they are not what they promise. For a time, however, they are rolled under the tongue as a sweet morsel, and the sinner blesses himself in them.
But, 2. It will be bitter in the reflection. Afterward, the sinner’s mouth shall be filled with gravel; when his conscience is awakened, when he sees himself deserted, and becomes apprehensive of the wrath of God against him for this sin, how painful and uneasy then is the thought of it! The pleasures of sin are but for a season, and are succeeded with sorrows. Some nations have punished malefactors by mingling gravel with their bread.

18. Every purpose is established by counsel; and with good advice make war.

Note, 1. It is good in every thing to act with deliberation, and to consult with ourselves at least, and, in matters of moment, with our friends too, before we determine, but especially to ask counsel of God, and beg direction from him, and observe the guidance of his eye. This is the way to have both our minds and our purposes established, and to succeed well in our affairs; whereas what is done hastily and with precipitation, is repented of at leisure. Take time, and you will have done the sooner. De liberandum est du, quod statuendo est semen—A final decision should be preceded by mature deliberation.
2. It is especially our wisdom to be cautious in making war; consider, and take advice, whether the war should be begun or no, whether it be just, whether it be prudent, whether we be a match for the enemy, and able to carry it on when it is too late to retreat; (Luke xiv. 31.) and, when it is begun, bow, and by what arts, it may be prosecuted, for skill is as necessary as courage. Going to law is a kind of going to war, and, therefore, must be done with good advice, Prov. xxxv. 8. The rule among the Romans was, nec sequi bellum, nec fugere—neither to urge war, nor yet to shun it.

19. He that goeth about as a tale-bearer revealeth secrets; therefore meddle not with him that flattereth with his lips.

Two sorts of people are dangerous to be conversed with.
1. Tale-bearers; though they are commonly flatterers, and by speaking fair insinuate themselves into men’s acquaintance. Those are unprincipled people, that go about carrying stories, that make mischief among neighbours and relations, that sow in the minds of people jealousies of their governors, of their ministers, and of one another, that reveal secrets which they are intrusted with, or which, by unfair means, they come to the knowledge of; or, under pretence of guessing at men’s thoughts and intentions, tell that of them which is really false. “Be not familiar with such, do not give them the hearing when they tell their tales and reveal secrets, for you may be sure that they will betray your secrets too, and tell tales of you.”
2. Flatterers; for they are commonly tale-bearers. If a man fawn upon you, cajole and commend you, suspect him, for he has some design upon you, and stands upon your guard; he would pick that out of you, which will serve him to make a story of to somebody else, to your prejudice; therefore meddle not with him that flatters with his lips. Those too dearly love, and too dearly buy, their own praise, that will put confidence in a man, and trust him with a secret or business, because he speaks fairly to them.

20. Whoso curseth his father or his mother, his lamp shall be put out in obscure darkness.

Here is, 1. An undutiful child become very wicked by degrees; he began with despising his father and mother, slighting their instructions, disobeying their commands, and running at their reproofs, but at length he arrives at such a pitch of impudence and impiety as to curse them, to give them scurrilous and opprobrious language, and to wish mischief to them who were the instruments of his being, and have taken so much care and pains about him; and this, in defiance of God and his law, which has made this a capital crime, (Exod. xxii. 17. Matth. xv. 4.) and in violation of all the bonds of duty, their affection, and gratitude.
2. An undutiful child become very miserable at last; His lamp shall be put out in obscure darkness; all his honour shall be laid in the dust, and he shall for ever lose his reputation; let him never expect any peace or comfort in his own mind, no, nor prosperity in this world. His days shall be shortened, and the lamp of his life extinguished, according to the reverse of the promise in the fifth commandment. His family shall be cut off, and his posterity be a curse to him; and it will be his eternal ruin, and the lamp of his happiness shall be put out in the blackness of darkness, so the word is, even that which is for ever, Jude 13. Matth. xxii. 13.

21. An inheritance may be gotten hastily at the beginning; but the end thereof shall not be blessed.

Note, 1. It is possible that an estate may be suddenly raised. There are those who will be rich, by right or wrong, who make no conscience of what they say or do, if they can but get money by it, who, when it is in their power, will cheat their own father, and who sordidly spare and heard up what they get, grudging themselves and their families food convinces, and thinking all lest but what they buy lend with, or put out to interest. By such ways as these a man may grow rich, may grow very rich, in a little time, at his first setting out.

2. An estate that is suddenly raised is often as suddenly ruined; it was raised hastily, but, not being raised honestly, it proves soon ripe and soon rotten, the end thereof shall not be blessed of God, and, if he do not bless it, it can neither be comfortable, nor of any continuance; so that he who got it, at the end, will be a fool. He had better have taken time, and built firmly.

22. Say not thou, I will recompense evil: but wait on the Lord, and he shall save thee.

They that live in this world must expect to have injuries done them, affronts given them, and trouble wrongfully created them, for we dwell among briers. Now here we are told what to do when we have wrong done us.

We must not avenge ourselves, no, nor so much as think of it, or design it; "Say not thou, no not in thy heart, I will recompense evil for evil; do not please thyself with the thought that some time or other thou shalt have an opportunity of being quits with him. Do not wish revenge, or hope for it, much less resolve upon it, no, not when the injury is fresh, and the resentments of it most deep. Never say that thou wilt do a thing which thou canst not in faith pray to God to assist thee in; and that thou canst not do in meditating revenge."

2. We must refer ourselves to God, and leave it to him to plead our cause, to maintain our right, and reckon with those that do us wrong, in such a way and manner as he thinks fit, and in his own due time; "Wait on the Lord, attend his pleasure, acquiesce in his will, and he does not say that he shall punish him that has injured thee; instead of desiring that, thou must forgive him and pray for him, but he shall save thee, and that is enough. He will protect thee, and preserve thee; when passing by one injury shall not (as is commonly feared) expose thee to another; nay, he will recompense good to thee, to balance thy trouble, and encourage thy patience," as David hoped, when Shimei cursed him, 2 Sam. xvi. 12.

23. Divers weights are an abomination unto the Lord; and a false balance is not good.

This is to the same purport with what was said v. 10.

1. It is here repeated, because it is a sin that God doubly hates; as lying (which is of the same nature with this sin) is mentioned twice among the seven things that God hates, ch. vi. 17, 19. and because, probably, it was a sin very much practised at that time in Israel, and therefore made light of, as if there were no harm in it, under pretence that, being commonly used, there was no trading without it.

2. It is here added, A false balance is not good; to intimate that it is not only abominable to God, but unprofitable to the sinner himself; there is really no good to be got by it, no, not a good bargain, for a bargain made by fraud will prove a losing bargain in the end.

24. Man's goings are of the Lord; how can a man then understand his own way?

We are here taught, that, in all our affairs,

1. We have a necessary and constant dependence upon God; all our natural actions depend upon his providence, all our spiritual actions upon his grace. The best man is no better than God makes him; and every creature is that to us which it is the will of God that it should be. Our enterprises succeed, not as we desire and design, but as God directs and dispenses. The goings even of a strong man, so the word signifies, are of the Lord, for his strength is weakness without God, nor is the battle always to the strong.

2. We have no foresight of future events, and therefore know not how to forecast for them; How can a man understand his own way? How can he tell what will befall him, since God's counsels concerning him are secret? and therefore how can he of himself contrive what to do, without divine direction? We so little understand our own way, that we know not what is good for ourselves, and therefore we must make a virtue of necessity, and commit our way unto the Lord, in whose hand it is, follow the guidance, and submit to the disposal of Providence.

25. It is a snare to the man who devoureth that which is holy, and after vows to make inquiry.

Two things, by which God is greatly afforded, men are here said to be insinuate by, and entangled not only in guilt, but in trouble and ruin at length.

1. Sacrilege; men's alienating holy things, and converting them to their own uses, which is here called devouring them. What is devoted in such a way to the service and honour of God, for the support of religion and divine worship, or the relief of the poor, ought to be conscientiously preserved to the purposes designed; and those that directly or indirectly embezzle them, or defeat the purpose for which they were given, will have a great deal to answer for; Will a man rob God in tithes and offerings? Mal. iii. 8. Those that hurry over religious offices, (their praying and preaching,) and huddle them up in haste; as being impatient to get done, may be said to devour that which is holy.

2. Covenant-breaking: It is a snare to a man, after he has sworn to God, to inquire how he may evade them, or get them dispensed with, and to contrive excuses for the violating of them. If the matter of them was doubtful, and the expressions ambiguous, that was his fault, he should have made them with more caution and consideration, for it will involve his conscience (if he be tender) in great perplexities, if he be to inquire concerning them afterward; (Eccl. v. 6.) for when we have opened our mouth to the Lord, it is too late to think of going back, Acts v. 4.

26. A wise king scattereth the wicked, and bringeth the wheel over them.

See here, 1. What is the business of magistrates; they are to be a terror to evil-doers. They must scatter the wicked, who are linked in confederacies to assist and imboden another in doing mischief; and there is no doing this but by bringing the wheel over them, putting the laws in execution against them, crushing their power, and quashing their projects. Severity must sometimes be used, to rid the country of those that are openly vicious and mischievous, debouched and debauching.

2. What is the qualification of magistrates, which is necessary in order to this; they have need to be both pious and prudent, for it is the wise king, that is both religious and discreet, that is likely to effect the suppression of vice and reformation of manners.

27. The spirit of man is the candle of the Lord, searching all the inward parts of the belly.
We have here the dignity of the soul, the great soul of man, that light which enlighteth every man.

1. It is a divine light; it is the candle of the Lord, a candle of his lighting, for it is the inspiration of the Almighty, that gives us understanding. He forms the spirit of man within him. It is after the image of God that man is created in knowledge.

Conscience, that noble faculty, is God's deputy in the soul; it is a candle not only lighted by him, but lighted for him. The Father of spirits is therefore called the Father of lights.

2. It is a discovering light. By the help of reason, we come to know men, to judge of their characters, and dine into their designs; by the help of conscience we come to know ourselves. The spirit of a man has a self-consciousness; (1 Cor. ii. 11.) it searches into the dispositions and affections of the soul, praises what is good, condemns what is otherwise, and judges of the thoughts and intents of the heart. This is the office, this the power of conscience, which we are therefore concerned to get rightly informed, and keep void of offence.

23. Mercy and truth preserve the king; and his throne is upheld by mercy.

Here is, 1. The virtues of a good king; those are mercy and truth, especially mercy, for that is mentioned twice here. He must be strictly faithful to his word, must be sincere, and abhor all dissimulation, must religiously discharge all the trusts reposed in him, must support and countenance truth. He must likewise rule with clemency, and by all acts of compassion gain the affections of his people.

Mercy and truth are the glories of God's throne, and kings are called gods.

2. The advantages he gains thereby. These virtues will preserve his person, and support his government, will make him easy and safe, beloved by his own people, and feared by his enemies, if it be possible that he should have any.

29. The glory of young men is their strength; and the beauty of old men is the gray head.

This shows that both young and old have their advantages, and therefore must each of them be, according to their capacities, serviceable to the public, and neither of them despise or envy the other.

1. Let not old people despise the young, for they are strong and fit for action, able to go through business, and break through difficulties, which the aged and weak cannot grapple with. The glory of young men is their strength, provided they use it well, (in the service of God and their country, not of their lusts,) and that they be not proud of it, nor trust to it.

2. Let not young people despise the old, for they are wise and fit for counsel, and though they have not the strength that young men have, yet they have more wisdom and experience.

20. The blueness of a wound cleanseth away evil: so do stripes the inward parts of the belly;

Note. 1. Many need severe rebukes. Some children are so obstinate, that their parents can do no good with them without sharp correction; some criminals must feel the rigor of the law and public justice, gentle methods will not work upon them; they must be beaten black and blue. And the wise God sees that his own children sometimes need very sharp afflictions.

2. Severe rebukes sometimes do a great deal of good, as corrosives contribute to the cure of a wound, eating out the proud flesh. The red drives out even that foolishness which was bound up in the heart, and cleanses away the evil there.

3. Frequently those that most need severe rebukes can worst bear them. Such is the corruption of nature, that men are so loath to be rebuked sharply for their sins as to be beaten till their bones ache. Correction is grievous to him that forsakes the way, and yet it is good for him, Heb. xii. 11.

CHAP. XXI.

1. THE king's heart is in the hand of the Lord, as the rivers of water; he turneth it whithersoever he will.

Note. 1. Even the hearts of men are in God's hand, and not only their goings, as he had said, ch. xx. 24. God can change men's minds, can, by a wise government, by the operation upon their spirits, turn them from that which they seemed most intent upon, and incline them to that which they seemed most averse to, as the husbandman, by canals and gutters, turns the water through his grounds as he pleases, which does not alter the nature of the water, or put any force upon it, any more than God's providence does upon the native freedom of man's will, but directs the course of it to serve his own purposes.

2. Even kings' hearts are so, notwithstanding their powers and prerogatives, as much as the hearts of common persons. The hearts of kings are unsearchable to us, much more unmanageable by us; as they have their Arcana imperii—State secrets, so they have the prerogatives of their crown, but the great God has them not only under his eye, but in his hand. Kings are what he makes them. Those that are most absolute are under God's government: he puts things into their hearts, Rev. xvii. 17. Ezra vii. 27.

2. Every way of a man is right in his own eyes: but the Lord pondereth the hearts.

Note. 1. We are all apt to be partial in judging of ourselves and our own actions, and to think too favourably of our own character, as if there were nothing amiss in it; Every way of a man, even his by-way, is right in his own eyes; the prudent heart is very ingenious in putting a fair face upon a foul matter, and in making that appear right to itself, which is far from being so, to stop the mouth of conscience.

2. We are sure that the judgment of God concerning us is according to truth. Whatever our judgment is concerning ourselves, the Lord pondereth the heart. God looks at the heart, and judges of men according to that, of their actions according to their principles and intentions; and his judgment of that is as exact as ours is of that which we ponder most, and more so; he weighs it in an unerring balance, ch. xvi. 2.

3. To do justice and judgment is more acceptable to the Lord than sacrifice.

Here. 1. It is implied that many deceive themselves with a conceit, that if they offer sacrifice, that will excuse them from doing justice, and procure them a dispensation for their unrighteousness; and this makes their way seem right, v. 2. We have fasted, Isa. lviii. 3. I have peace-offerings with me, Prov. vii. 14.

2. It is plainly declared, that living a good life,

3. But moral duties were preferred before them, (1 Sam. xv. 22.) which intimated that their excellency was not innate, nor the obligation to them perpetual, Micah vi. 6-8. Much of religion lies in doing judgment and justice, from a principle of duty to God, contempt of the world, and love to our neighbours and this is more pleasing to God than all burnt-offerings and sacrifices, Mark xii. 33.

4. An high look, and a proud heart, and the ploughing of the wicked, is sin.

This may be taken as showing us,
1. The marks of a wicked man. He that has a high look and a proud heart, that carries himself insolently and scornfully toward both God and man; and that is always ploughing and plotting, designing and devising some mischief or other, he is indeed a wicked man. The light of the wicked is sin. Sin is the pride, the ambition, the glory and joy, and the business of wicked men.

2. The miseries of a wicked man. His raised expectations, his high designs, and most elaborate contrivances and projects, are sin to him; he contracts guilt in them, and so prepares trouble for himself. The very speculations and plottings of all wicked men, as well as their pleasure, is nothing but sin. So Bishop Patrick. They do all to serve their lusts, and have no regard to the glory of God in it, and therefore their ploughing is sin, and, no marvel, when their sacrificing is so, ch. xv. 8.

5. The thoughts of the diligent tend only to plenteousness; but of every one that is hasty, only to want.

Here is, 1. The way to be rich. If we would live plenteously and comfortably in the world, we must be diligent in our business, and not shrink from the toil and trouble of it, but prosecute it closely, improving all advantages and opportunities for it, and doing what we do with all our might; yet we must not be hasty in it, nor hurry ourselves and others with it, but keep doing fair and softly, which, we say, goes far in a day. With diligence there must be contrivance; the thoughts of the diligent are as necessary as the hand of the diligent. Forecast is as good as work. Scest thou a man thus prudent and diligent? He will have enough to live on.

2. The way to be poor. Those that are hasty, that are rash and inconsiderate in their affairs, and will not take time to think, that are greedy of gain, by right or wrong, and make haste to be rich by unjust practices, or unwise projects, they are in the ready road to poverty. Their thoughts and contrivances, by which they hope to raise themselves, will ruin them.

6. The getting of treasures by a lying tongue is a vanity tossed to and fro of them that seek death.

This shows the folly of those that hope to enrich themselves by dishonest practices, by oppressing and overreaching those with whom they deal, by false-witness-bearing, or by fraudulent contracts; if those that make no conscience of their assertions when there is any thing to be got by a falsehood. They may perhaps heap up treasures by these means, that which they make their treasure; but, 1. They will not meet with the satisfaction they expect; it is a vanity tossed to and fro; it will be disappointment and vexation of spirit to them; they will not have the comfort of it, nor can they put any confidence in it, but will be perpetually uneasy. It will be taken and lost by their own consciences, and by the censures of men; let them expect to be in a constant hurry.

2. They will meet with the destruction they do not expect. While they are seeking wealth by such unlawful practices, they are really seeking death, they lay themselves open to the envy and ill will of men by the treasures they get, and to the wrath and curse of God by the lying tongue wherewith they get them, which he will make to fall upon themselves, and sink them to hell.

7. The robbery of the wicked shall destroy them; because they refuse to do judgment.

See here, 1. The nature of injustice. Getting money by lying, (v. 6.) is no better than downright robbery. Cheating is stealing; you had as good pick a man's pocket, as impose upon him by a lie, in making a bargain which he had no fence against but by not believing you; and it will be no excuse from the guilt of robbery to say that he might choose whether he would believe you, for that is a debt we should owe to no one man.

2. The cause of injustice. Men refuse to do judgment, they will not render to all their due, but withhold it, and omissions make way for commissions; they come at length to robbery itself. They that refuse to do justice will choose to do wrong.

3. The effect of injustice; it will return upon the sinner's own head. The robbery of the wicked will terrify them, so some; their consciences will be filled with horror and amazement, will cut them, will saw them asunder, so others; it will destroy them, here and for ever, therefore he had said, (v. 6.) They seek death.

8. The way of man is froward and strange; but as for the pure, his work is right.

This shows, that as men are, so is their way.
1. Evil men have evil ways. If the man be froward, his way also is strange; and this is the way of most men, such is the general corruption of mankind. They are all gone aside; (Ps. xiv. 2, 3.) all flesh have perverted their way. But the froward man is the man of deceit, that acts by craft and trick in all he does, his way is strange, contrary to all the rules of honour and honesty, it is strange, for you know not where to find him, or when you have him; it is strange, for it is alienated from all good, and estranges men from God and his favour. It is what he beholds afar off, and so do all honest men.

2. Men that are pure are proved to be such by their work, for it is right, it is just and regular; and they are accepted of God, and approved of men. The way of mankind in their apostacy is froward and strange, but as for the pure, those that by the grace of God are recovered out of that state, of which there is here and there one, their work is right, as Noah's was in the old world, Gen. vii. 1.

9. It is better to dwell in a corner of the house-top, than with a brawling woman in a wide house.

See here, 1. What a great affliction it is to a man to have a brawling, scolding woman to his wife, who, upon every occasion, and often upon no occasion, breaks out into passion, and chides either him or those about her, is fretful to herself, and furious to her children and servants, and, in both, vexatious to her husband. If a man has a wide house, spacious and pompous, this will imbitter the comfort PROVERBS, XXI.

10. The soul of the wicked desireth evil; his neighbour findeth no favour in his eyes.

See here the character of a very wicked man.
1. The strong inclination he has to do mischief; His very soul desires evil, desires that evil may be done, and that he may have the pleasure, not only of seeing it, but of having a hand in it; the root of wickedness lies in the soul; the desire that men have to do evil is that which conceives and brings forth sin.
2. The strong aversion he has to do good; His neighbour, his friend, his nearest relation, finds no favour in his eyes, cannot gain from him the least kindness, though he be in the greatest need of it. And, when he is in the pursuit of the evil his heart is so much upon, he will spare no man that stands in his way; his next neighbour shall be used no better than a stranger, than an enemy.

11. When the scorner is punished, the simple is made wise; and when the wise is instructed, he receiveth knowledge.

This we had before, (ch. xix. 25.) and it shows, that there are two ways by which the simple may be made wise.
1. By the punishments that are inflicted on those that are incorrigibly wicked. Let the law be executed upon a scorner, and even he that is simple will be awakened and alarmed by it, and will discern, more than he did, the evil of sin, and will take warning by it, and take heed.
2. By the instructions that are given to those that are wise and willing to be taught; When the wise is instructed by the preaching of the word, he, not only the wise himself, but the simple, that stands by, receives knowledge. It is no injustice at all to take a good lesson to ourselves which was designed for another.

12. The righteous man wisely considereth the house of the wicked: but God overthrowneth the wicked for their wickedness.

1. As we read this verse, it shows the reason why good men, when they come to understand things right, will not envy the prosperity of evil-doers. When they see the house of the wicked, how full it is, perhaps, of all the good things of this life, they are tempted to envy; but when they wisely consider it, when they look upon it with an eye of faith, when they see God overthrew the wicked for their wickedness, that there is a curse upon their habitation, which will certainly be the ruin of it ere long, they see more reason to despise them, or pity them, than to fear or envie them.

2. Some give another sense of it; The righteous man, the judge or magistrate, that is intrusted with the execution of justice, and the preservation of the public peace, examines the house of the wicked, searches it for arms, or for stolen goods, makes a diligent inquiry concerning his family, and the characters of those about him, that he may by his power overthrow the wicked for their wickedness, and prevent their doing any further mischief, that he may fire the nests where the birds of prey are harboured, or the unclean birds.

13. Whoso stoppeth his ears at the cry of the poor, he also shall cry himself, but shall not be heard.

Here is the description and doom of an uncharitable man.
1. His description; He stops his ears at the cry of the poor, at the cry of their wants and miseries, he resolves to take no cognizance of them; at the cry of their requests and supplications, he resolves he will not so much as give them the hearing, turns them away from his door, and forbids them to come near him; or if he cannot avoid hearing them, he will not heed them, nor be moved by their complaints, nor be prevailed with by their importunities; he shuts up the bowels of his compassion, and that is equivalent to the stopping of this ears, Acts vii. 57.
2. His doom; He shall himself be reduced to such a state that he may do as he please, but he shall not be heard. Men will not hear him, but reward him as he has rewarded others. God will not hear him; for he that showed no mercy shall have judgment without mercy; (Jas. ii. 13.) and he that on earth denied a crumb of bread, in hell was denied a drop of water. God will be deaf to their prayers who are deaf to the cries of the poor, which, if they be not heard by us, will be heard against us, Exod. xxii. 23.

14. A gift in secret pacifieth anger; and a reward in the bosom strong wrath.

Here is, 1. The power that is commonly found to be in gifts. Nothing is more violent than anger; Oh the force of strong wrath! And yet a handsome present, prudently managed, will turn away some men's wrath, when it seemed impecuniable, and discharge the keenest and most passionate resentments. Concerning God's giving money to a master-sin, and has the command of other lusts. Pecunia omnia spatia. Money commands all things. Thus Jacob pacified Esau, and Abigail David.
2. The policy that is commonly used in giving and receiving bribes; it must be a gift in secret, and a reward in the bosom; for that he takes it would not be thought to covet it, nor known to receive it, nor would he willingly be beholden to him whom he has been offended with; but if it be done privately all is well. No man shall be too open in giving any gift, nor boast of the presents he sends; but if it be a brile to pervert justice, that is so scandalous, that those who are fond of it are ashamed of it.

15. It is joy to the just to do judgment; but destruction shall be to the workers of iniquity.

Note, 1. It is a pleasure and satisfaction to good men, both to see justice administered by the government they live under, right taking place, and iniquity suppressed, and also to practise it themselves, according as their sphere is. They not only do justice, but do it with pleasure; not only for fear of shame, but for love of virtue.
2. It is a terror to wicked men to see the laws put in execution against vice and profaneness; it is destruction to them; as it is also a vexation to them to be forced, either for the support of their credit, or for fear of punishment, to do judgment themselves. Or, if we take it as we read it, the meaning is: There is true pleasure in the practice of religion, but certain destruction at the end of all vicious courses.

16. The man that wandereth out of the way of understanding shall remain in the congregation of the dead.

Here is, 1. The sinner upon his ramble; He wanders out of the way of understanding, and when once he has left that good way, he wanders endlessly.

The way of religion is the way of understanding; those that are not truly pious are not truly intelligent; those that wander out of this way break the hedge which God has set, and follow the conduct of the world and the flesh; and they go astray like lost sheep.

2. The sinner at his rest, or rather his ruin: He shall remain (quietly—he shall rest, but not in peace—in peace) in the congregation of the giants, the sinners of the old world that were swept away by the deluge; to that destruction the damnation of sinners is compared, as sometimes to the destruction of Sodom, when they are said to have their portion in fire and brimstone. Or in the congregation of the damned that are under the power of the second death.

There is a vast congregation of damned sinners, bound in bundles for the fire, and in that they shall remain for ever, who are shut out from the congregation of the righteous. He that forsakes the way to heaven, if he return not to it, will certainly sink into the depths of hell.

17. He that loveth pleasure shall be a poor man; he that loveth wine and oil shall not be rich.

Here is an argument against a voluptuous, luxurious, life, taken from the ruin it brings upon men's temporal interests. Here is,

1. The description of an epicure: He loves pleasure. God allows us to use the delights of sense soberly and temperately, wine to make glad the heart, and put vigour into the spirits, and oil to make the face to shine, and beautify the countenance; but he that loves these, that sets his heart upon them, covets them earnestly, is solicitous to have all the delights of sense wound up to the height of pleasureableness, is impatient of every thing that crosses him in his pleasures, relishes these as the best pleasures, and has his mouth by them put out of taste for spiritual things, he is an epicure. 2 Tim. iii. 4.

2. The punishment of an epicure in this world; He shall be a poor man; for the lusts of sensuality are not maintained but at a great expense; and there are instances of those who want necessities, and live upon them, who once could not live without dainties and varieties. Many a bean becomes a beggar.

18. The wicked shall be a ransom for the righteous, and the transgressor for the upright.

This intimates,

1. What should be done by the justice of men; The wicked, that are the trouble of a land, ought to be punished, for the preventing and turning away of those national judgments which otherwise will be inflicted, and in which even the righteous are many times involved. Thus, when Achan was stoned, he was a ransom for the camp of righteous Israel; and the seven sons of Saul, when they were hanged, were a ransom for the kingdom of righteous David.

2. What is often done by the providence of God; The righteous is delivered out of trouble, and the wicked comes in his stead, and so seems as if he were a ransom for him, ch xi. 8. God will rather leave many wicked people to be cut off than abandon his own people. I will give men for thee, Isa xlix. 3, 4.

19. It is better to dwell in the wilderness, than with a contentious and an angry man.

Note. 1. Unbridled passions imitate and spoil the comfort of all relations. A peevish angry wife makes her husband's life uneasy, to whom she should be a comfort and a meet help. Those cannot dwell in peace and happiness that cannot dwell in peace and love. Even those that are one flesh, if they be not withal one spirit, have no joy of their union.

2. It is better to have no company than bad company. The wife of thy covenant is thy companion, and yet if she be peevish and provoking, it is better to dwell in a solitary wilderness, exposed to wind and weather, than in company with her. A man may better enjoy God and himself in a wilderness than among quarrelsome relations and neighbours.

See v. 9.

20. There is treasure to be desired, and oil in the dwelling of the wise: but a foolish man spendeth it up.

Note. 1. Those that are wise will increase what they have, and live plentifully; their wisdom will teach them to proportion their expenses to their income, and to lay up for hereafter; so that there is a treasure of things to be desired, and as much as needs be desired, a good stock of all things convenient, laid up in season, and particularly of oil, one of the staple commodities of Canaan, Deut. viii. 8. This is in the habitation, or cottage, of the wise; and it is better to have an old-fashioned house, and have it well furnished, than a fine modern one, ill kept. God blesses the endeavours of the wise, and then their houses are replenished.

2. Those that are foolish will mispend what they have, upon their lusts, and so bring the stock they had, to nothing. Those manage themselves ill, that are in haste to spend what they have, but not in care which way to get more. Foolish children spend what their wise parents had laid up; one sinner destroys much good, as the prodigal son.

21. He that followeth after righteousness and mercy, findeth life, righteousness, and honour.

See here, 1. What it is to make religion our business; it is to follow after righteousness and mercy; not to content ourselves with easy performances, but to do our duty with the utmost care and pains, as those that are pressing forward, and in fear of coming short; we must both do justly, and love mercy, and proceed and persevere therein; and though we cannot attain to perfection, yet it will be a comfort to us if we aim at it, and follow after it.

What will be the advantage of doing so? Those that do follow after righteousness, shall find righteousness; God will give them grace to do good, and they shall have the pleasure and comfort of it, they that make conscience of being just to others, shall be justly dealt with by others, and others shall be kind to them. The Jews followed after righteousness, and did not find it, because they sought amiss. Rom. ix. 31. Otherwise, Seek and you shall find, and with it shall find both life and honour, everlasting life and honour, the crown of righteousness.

22. A wise man casteth the city of the mighty, and casteth down the strength of the confidence thereof.

Note. 1. Those that have power are apt to promise themselves great things from their power. The city of the mighty thinks itself impregnable, and therefore it builds with the confidence thereof, what it boasts of, and trusts in, bidding defiance and pleasure.

2. Those that have wisdom, though they are so modest as not to promise much, often perform great things, even against those that are so confident of their strength, by their wisdom. Good conduct will go far even against force; and a strategist, well managed, may effectually scale the city of the mighty, and cast down the strength it had such a confidence in. A wise man will gain upon the affections of people, and conquer them by strength of reason, which is a more noble conquest than that by strength of arms. They that understand their interest will willingly submit themselves to a wise and good man, and the strongest walls shall not hold out against him.

23. Whoso keepeth his mouth and his tongue, keepeth his soul from troubles.

Note, 1. It is our great concern to keep our soul from straits, from being entangled in snares and perplexities, and disquieted with troubles, that we may preserve the possession and enjoyment of ourselves, and our souls may be in frame for the service of God.

2. Those that would keep their souls, must keep a watch before the door of their lips, must keep the mouth by temperance, that no forbidden fruit go into it, no stolen waters, that nothing be eaten or drunk to excess; they must keep the tongue also, that no forbidden word go out of the door of the lips, no corrupt communication. By a constant watchfulness over our words, we shall prevent abundance of mischiefs which an ungoverned tongue runs into. Keep thy heart, and that will keep thy tongue from sin: keep thy tongue, and that will keep thy heart from trouble.

24. Proud and haughty scorners is his name, who dealeth in proud wrath.

See here the mischief of pride and haughtiness.

1. It exposes men to sin, it makes them passionate, and kindles in them the fire of proud wrath; they are continually dealing in it, as if it were their trade to be angry, and they had nothing so much to do as to better passions, and exchange bitter words. Most of the wrath that inflames the spirits and societies of men, is proud wrath. Men cannot bear the least slight, nor in any thing to be crossed or contradicted; but they are out of humour, and in a heat, immediately. It likewise makes them scornful when they are angry, very abusive with their tongues, insolent toward those above them, and importunate toward all about them; only by fire doth comes all this.

2. It exposes men to shame; they get a bad name by it, and every one calls them proud and haughty scorners, and therefore nobody cares for having any thing to do with them. If men would but consult their reputation a little, and the credit of their profession, which suffers with it, they would not indulge their pride and passion as they do.

25. The desire of the slothful killeth him; for his hands refuse to labour. 26. He coveteth greedily all the day long; but the righteous giveth and spareth not.

Here is, 1. The miseries of the slothful, when he is not content to do his duty, or an honest calling, by which they might get an honest livelihood: they are as fit for labour as other men, and business offers itself, to which they might lay their hands, and apply their minds, but they will not; herein they fondly think they do well for themselves; (see ch. xxvi. 16.) Soul, take thine ease; but really they are enemies to themselves; for, beside that their slothfulness starves them, depriving them of their necessary supports, their desires at the same time stab them; though their hands refuse to labour, their hearts cease not to covet, lusts, and honours, which yet cannot be obtained without labour; their desires are impetuous and insatiable, they covet greedily all the day long, and cry, Give, give; they expect every body should do for them, though they will do nothing for themselves, much less for any be all: now these desires kill them, they are a perpetual vexation to them, fret them to death, and perhaps, put them upon such dangerous courses, for the satisfactions of their craving lusts, as hasten them to an untimely end. Many times the slothful, in their desire, which is to make provision for the flesh, and would not be at the pains to get it honestly, have turned highwaymen, and that has killed them. Those that are slothful in the affairs of their souls, and yet have desires toward that which would be the happiness of their souls, these desires kill them, will aggravate their condemnation, and be witness against them, that they were convinced of the worth of spiritual blessings, but refused to be at the pains that are necessary to the obtaining of them.

2. The honours of the honest and diligent. The righteous and industrious have their desires satisfied, and enjoy not only that satisfaction, but the further satisfaction of doing good to others. The slothful are always craving, and gaping to receive, but the righteous are always full, and contriving to give; and it is more blessed to give than to receive. They give, and share not; give liberally, and upon need: they give a portion to seven, and also to eight, and do not spare for fear of wanting.

27. The sacrifice of the wicked is abomination: how much more, when he bringeth it with a wicked mind!

Sacrifices were of divine institution, and, when they were offered in faith, and with repentance and reformation, God was greatly honoured by them, and well pleased in them; but they were often not only unacceptable, but an abomination, to God, and he declared so; which was an indication, both that they were not required for their own sakes, and that there were better things, and more effectual, in every heart, when the sacrifice and offering should be done away. They were an abomination.

1. When they were brought by wicked men, who did not, according to the true intent and meaning of sacrificing, repent of their sins, mortify their lusts, and amend their lives. Cain brought his offering. Even wicked men may be found in the external performances of religious worship; they can freely give God their beasts, their lips, their knees, who would not give him their hearts: the Pharisees gave alms. But when the person is an abomination, as every wicked man is to God, the performance cannot but be so; even when he brings it diligently; so some read the latter part of the verse. Though their offerings are continually before God, (Ps. I. 8.) they are an abomination to him.

2. Much more when they were brought with wicked minds, when their sacrifices were made, not only consistent with, but serviceable to, their wickedness: as Absalom's vow, Jezebel's fast, and the Pharisees' long prayers. When men make a show of devotion, that they may the more easily and effectually compass some covetous or malicious design; when holiness is pretended, but some wickedness intended; then, especially, the performance is an abomination, Isa. lxvi. 5.

28. A false witness shall perish: but the man that heareth speaketh constantly.

Here is, 1. The doom of a false witness: He who, for favour to the side, or malice to the other, giv's in a false evidence, or makes an affidavit of that which he knows to be false, or, at least, does not know to be true, if he be discovered, his reputation will be ruined; a man may tell a lie perhaps in his haste, but he that gives a false testimony does it with deliberation and solemnity, and it cannot be a presumptuous sin, and a forfeiture of man's credit; but, though it should not be discovered, he himself shall be ruined; the vengeance he imprecated upon himself, when he took the false oath, will come upon him.

2. The praise of him that is conscientious; He who hears, obeys the command of God, indeed, are to every man truth with his neighbour; he who testifies nothing but what he has heard and knows to be true, speaks constantly, consistently with himself; he is always in the same story; he speaks in finem—to the end; people will give credit to him, and hear him out; he speaks unto victory, he carries the cause, which the false witness shall lose; he shall speak to eternity; what is true, is true eternally. The life of truth is established for ever.

29. A wicked man hardeneth his face: but as for the upright, he directeth his way.

Here is, 1. The presumption and impudence of a wicked man; He hardens his face, brazenizes it, that he may not blush, steels it, that he may not tremble, when he commits the greatest crimes; he bids defiance to the terrors of the law, and the checks of his own conscience, the reproofs of the word and the rebukes of Providence; he will have his way; and nothing shall hinder him. Isa. diei. 7.

2. The caution and circumspection of a good man; as for the upright, he do not say, What would I do? What have I a mind to? That I will have; but, What should I do? What does God require of me? What is duty? What is prudence? What is for edification? And so he does not force his way, but directs his way by a safe and certain rule.

30. There is no wisdom, nor understanding, nor counsel, against the Lord. 31. The horse is prepared against the day of battle: but safety is of the Lord.

The designing, busy, part of mankind are here directed, in all their counsels and undertakings, to have their eye to God, and to believe: 1. That there can be no success against God, and therefore they must never act in opposition to him, in contempt of his commands, or in contradiction to his counsels. Though they think they have wisdom, and understanding, and counsel, the best politics and politicians, on their side, yet, if it be against the Lord, it cannot prosper long, it shall not prevail at last. He that sits in heaven laughs at men's projects against him and his Anointed, and will carry his point in despite of them. Ps. ii. 1-6. They that fight against the Lord are prepared shine and run for themselves; whoever make war with the Lamb, he will certainly overcome them, Rev. xvii. 14.

2. That there can be no success without God, and therefore they must never act but in dependence on him. Be the cause ever so good, and the patrons of it ever so strong, and wise, and faithful, and the means of carrying it on, and gaining the point, ever so probable, still they must acknowledge God, and take the thoughts and purposes of God's grace; the poor are as corrected and comforted, for instance, as the rich. There is the same Christ, the same scripture, the same Spirit, the same covenant of promises, for them both. There is the same heaven for poor saints that there is for rich; Lazarus is in the bosom of Abraham: and there is the same hell for rich sinners that there is for poor. All stand upon the same level before God, as they do also in the grave. The small and great are there as great and small in their place.
3. A prudent man foreseeth the evil, and hideth himself: but the simple pass on, and are punished.

See here, 1. The benefit of wisdom and consideration: A prudent man, by the help of his prudence, will foresee an evil before it comes, and hide himself; he will be aware when he is entering into a temptation, and will put on his armour, and stand on his guard; when the clouds are gathering for a storm, he takes the warning, and flies to the name of the Lord as his strong tower. Noah foresaw the deluge, Joseph the years of famine, and provided accordingly.

2. The mischief of rashness and inconsideration; the simple, who believe every word that flatters them, will believe none that warns them, and so they pass on, and are punished; they venture upon sin, though they are told what will be in the end thereof; they throw themselves into trouble, notwithstanding the fair warning given them, and they repent their presumption when it is too late. See an instance of both these, Exod. ix. 20, 21. Nothing is so perilous to precious souls as this, they will not take warning.

4. By humility and the fear of the Lord, are riches, honour, and life.

See here, 1. Wherein religion does very much consist; in humility, and the fear of the Lord; that is, walking humbly with God; we must so reverence God's majesty and authority, as to submit with all humility to the commands of his word, and the dispositions of his providence. We must have such low thoughts of ourselves, as to believe humbly toward God and man. Where the fear of God is, there will be humility.

2. What is to be gotten by it; riches, and honour, and comfort, and long life, in this world, as far as God sees good; at least, spiritual riches and honour in the favour of God, and the promises and privileges of the covenant of grace, and eternal life at last.

5. Thorns and snares are in the way of the froward: he that doth keep his soul shall be far from them.

Note, 1. The way of sin is vexatious and dangerous; In the way of the froward, that crooked way, which is contrary to the will and word of God, thorns and snares are found; thorns of grief for past sins, and snares entangling them in further sin. He that makes no conscience of what he says, and does, will find himself hampered by that imaginary liberty, and tormented by his pleasures. Froward people, who are soon angry, expose themselves to trouble at every step. Every thing will fret and vex him that will fret and vex at every thing.

2. The way of duty is safe and easy; He that keeps his soul, that watches carefully over his own heart and ways, is far from those thorns and snares, for his way is both plain and pleasant.

6. Train up a child in the way he should go; and when he is old, he will not depart from it.

Here is, 1. A great duty enjoined, particularly to those that are the parents and instructors of children, in order to the propagating of wisdom, that it may remain with them; Train up children in that age of vanity, to keep them from the snares and thorns of it; in that learning age, to prepare them for what they are designed for. Catechise them, initiate them, keep them under discipline; train them as soldiers, who are taught to handle their arms, keep rank, and observe the word of command. Train them up, not in the way they would go, (the bias of their corrupt hearts would draw them aside,) but in the way they should go, the way in which, if you love them, you would have them go. Train up a child according as he is capable, so some take it; with a gentle hand, as nurses feed children, little and often, Deut. vi. 7.

2. A good reason for it, taken from the great advantage of this care and pains with children; when they grow up, when they grow old, it is to be hoped, they will not depart from it. Good impressions made upon them then, will abide upon them all their days. Ordinarily, the vessel retains the savour with which it was first seasoned. Many, indeed, have departed from the good way in which they were trained up; Solomon himself did; but it may be a means of their recovering themselves, as it is supposed Solomon did. At least, the parents will have the comfort of having done their duty, and used the means.

7. The rich ruleth over the poor, and the borrower is servant to the lender.

He had said, (v. 2.) Rich and poor meet together; but here he finds, here he shows, that, as to the things of this life, there is a great difference; for, 1. Those that have little will be in subjection to those that have much, because they have dependence upon them, they have received, and expect to receive, support from them; The rich rule over the poor, and too often more than becomes them, with pride and rigour; unlike to God, who, though he be great, yet despises not any. It is part of the affliction of the poor, that they must expect to be trampled upon; and part of their duty, to be scrupulously careful, that they be not guilty of those things that are kind to them, and study to be grateful.

2. Those that are going behind-hand, find themselves to lie much as the mercy of those that are before-hand; The borrower is servant to the lender, is obliged to him, and must sometimes beg, Have patience with me. Therefore it is part of Israel's promised happiness, that they should lend and not borrow, Deut. xxvii. 12. And it should be our endowment, and the rich should give their poor, that they may have the means of paying their debts.

8. He that soweth iniquity shall reap vanity: and the rod of his anger shall fail.

Note, 1. Ill-gotten gains will not prosper; He that sows iniquity, that does an unjust thing, in hopes to get by it, shall reap vanity; what he gets will never do him any good, nor give him any satisfaction. He will meet with nothing but disappointment. They that create trouble to others, do but prepare trouble for themselves. Man shall reap as he sows.

2. Abused power will not last. If the word of authority turn into a rod of anger, if men rule by passion instead of prudence, and, instead of the public welfare, aim at nothing so much as the gratifying of their own resentments, it shall fall, and be broken, and their power shall not bear them out in their exorbitances, Isa. x. 24, 25.

9. He that hath a bountiful eye shall be blessed; for he giveth of his bread to the poor.

Here is, 1. The description of a charitable man; he has a bountiful eye, opposed to the evil eye, (ch. xxiii. 6,) and the same with the single eye, (Matth. vi. 22.) an eye that seeks out objects of charity, an eye that offers itself, an eye that sees upon the sight of one in want and misery, afflicts the heart with compassion; an eye, that, with the alms, gives a pleasant look, which makes the alms doubly acceptable. He has also a liberal hand, he give of his bread to those that need; his bread, the bread appointed for his own eating. He will rather abridge himself than see the poor perish for want; yet he does not give all his bread, but of his bread; the poor shall have their share with his own family.

2. The blessedness of such a man, the lions of the judgment seat to bless him, all about him will speak well of him, and God himself shall bless him, in answer to many a good prayer put up for him, and he shall be blessed.

10. Cast out the scorners, and contention shall go out; yea, strife and reproach shall cease.

See here, 1. What the scorners does; it is implied that he sows discord, and makes mischief, wherever he comes; much of the strife and contention which disturb the peace of all societies is owing to the evil interpreter, as some read it, that construes every thing into the worst; to those that despise and de-ride every one that comes in their way, and take a pride in bantering and abusing all mankind.

2. What is to be done with the scorners, that will not be reclaimed; Cast him out of your society, as Ishmael, when he mocked Isaac, was thrust out of Abraham's family. They that would secure the peace must exclude the scorners.

11. He that loveth pureness of heart, for the grace of his lips the king shall be his friend.

Here is, 1. The qualifications of an accomplished, a complete, gentleman, that is fit to be employed in public business; he must be an honest man, a man that loves pureness of heart, and hates all impurity; not only pure from all fleshly lusts, but from all deceit and dissimulation, from all selfishness and sinister designs; that takes care to approve himself a man of sincerity, is just and fair from principle, and delights in nothing more than in keeping his own conscience clear, and void of offence. He must also be a man of speech, with a good grace; not to daub and flatter, but to deliver himself decently and ingeniously, in language as clean and smooth as his spirit.

2. The preference such a man stands fair for; The king, if he be wise and good, and understand his own and his people's interest, shall be his friend, shall make him of his cabinet-council, as there was one in David's court, and another in Solomon's, that was called the king's friend; or, in any business that he has, the king will befriend him. Some understand it of the King of kings; a man in whose spirit there is no guile, and whose speech is always with grace, God will be his Friend, Messiah, the Prince, will be his Friend; this honour have all the saints.

12. The eyes of the Lord preserve knowledge; and he overthrew the words of the transgressor.

Here is, 1. The special care God takes to preserve knowledge, to keep up religion in the word, by keeping up among men the knowledge of himself and of good and evil, notwithstanding the corruption of mankind, and the artifices of Satan to blind men's minds and keep them in ignorance; it is a wonderful instance of the power and goodness of the eyes of the Lord, his watchful providence. He preserves men of knowledge, wise and good, (2 Chron. xvi. 9.) particularly faithful witnesses, who speak what they know; God protects such, and prospers their counsels. He does, by his grace, preserve knowledge in such, secures his own work and interest in them; see Prov. ii. 7, 8.

2. The just vengeance God takes on those that speak and act against knowledge, against their own knowledge, and against the interests of knowledge and religion in the world; He overthrows the words of the transgressor, and preserve knowledge in spite of them. He defeats all the counsels and designs of false and treacherous men, and turns them to their own confusion.

13. The slothful man saith, There is a lion without, I shall be slain in the streets.

Note, 1. Those that have no love for their business will never want excuses to shift it off. Multitudes are ruined, both for soul and body, by their slothfulness, and yet still they have something or other to say for themselves; so ingenious are men in putting a cheat upon their own souls! And who, I pray, will be the gainer at last, when the pretences will be all rejected as vain and frivolous?

2. Many go in for real duties by imaginary difficulties; The slothful man has work to do without in the fields, but he fancies there is a lion there; nay, he pretends he dares not go along the streets, for fear somebody or other should meet him and kill him. He does not himself think so, he only says so to those that call him up; he talks of a lion without, but considers not his real danger from the devil, that roaring lion, which is in bed with him, and from his own slothfulness, which kills him.

14. The mouth of strange women is a deep pit: he that is abhorred of the Lord shall fall therein.

This is designed to warn all young men against the lusts of uncleanness; as they tender the welfare of their souls, let them take heed of strange women, lascivious women, whom they ought to be strange to; of the mouth of strange women, of the kisses of their lips, (ch. vii. 13.) of the words of their lips, their charms and enticements; dread them, have nothing to do with them; for,

1. Those who abandon themselves to that sin prove that they are abandoned of God; it is a deep pit, which those fall into that are abhorred of the Lord, who leaves them to themselves to enter into that temptation, and takes off the bridle of his restraining grace, to punish them for other sins. Value not thyself upon being in favour with such women, when it bespeaks thee under the wrath of God.

2. It is seldom that they recover themselves, for it is a deep pit, it will be hard getting out of it, it so besots the mind, and debauches the conscience, by pleasing the flesh.

15. Foolishness is bound in the heart of a child; but the rod of correction shall drive it far from him.

We have here two very sad considerations:

1. That corruption is woven into our nature; Sin is foolishness, it is contrary both to our right reason and to our true interest; it is in the heart, there is an inward inclination to sin, to speak and act foolishly; it is in the heart of children, they bring it into the world with them, it is what they were shapen and conceived in; it is not only found there, but it is bound there, it is annexed to the heart; so some vicious dispositions cleave close to the soul. Are bound to it, as the scion to the stock into which it is grafted, which quite alters the property; there is a knot tied between the soul and sin, a true-lover's knot; they two become one flesh. It is true of ourselves, it is true of our children, whom we have begotten in our own likeness. O God, thou knowest this foolishness.

2. That correction is necessary to the cure of it,
It will not be got out by fair means and gentle methods; there must be strictness and severity, and that which will cause grief. Children need to be corrected, and kept under discipline, by their parents; and we all need to be corrected by our heavenly Father; (Heb. xii. 6, 7,) and under the correction we must stroke down folly, and kiss the rod.

16. He that oppresseth the poor to increase his riches, and he that giveth to the rich, shall surely come to want.

This shows what evil courses rich men sometimes take; by which, in the end, they will impoverish themselves, and provoke God, notwithstanding their abundance, to bring them to want; they oppress the poor, and give to the rich; that is,

1. They will not in charity relieve the poor, but withhold from them, that, by saving that which is really the best, but which they think the most needless part, of their expenses, they may increase their riches; but they will make presents to the rich, and give them great entertainments, either in pride and vainglory, that they may look great, or by any policy, that they may receive it again with advantage; such shall surely come to want. Many have been beggarly by a foolish generosity, but never any by a prudent charity. Christ bids us invite the poor, Luke xiv. 12, 13.

2. They not only will not relieve the poor, but they oppress them, rob the spital,* extort from their poor tenants and neighbours, invade their rights, who have not wherewithal to defend themselves, and then give bribes to the rich, to protect and countenance them in it; but it is all in vain, they shall come to want. They that rob God, and so make him their Enemy, cannot secure themselves by giving to the rich, to make them their friends.

17. Bow down thine ear, and hear the words of the wise, and apply thine heart unto my knowledge. 18. For it is a pleasant thing if thou keep them within thee; they shall withal be fitted in thy lips. 19. That thy trust may be in the Lord, I have made known to thee this day, even to thee. 20. Have not I written to thee excellent things in counsels and knowledge; 21. That I might make thee know the certainty of the words of truth, that thou mightest answer the words of truth to them that send unto thee?

Solomon here changes his style and manner of speaking; hitherto, for the most part, since the beginning of ch. x. he had laid down doctrinal truths, but now and then dropped a word of exhortation, leaving us to make the application as we went along; but here, to the end of ch. xxiv. he directs his speech to his son, his pupil, to his reader, his hearer, speaking as to a particular person: hitherto, for the most part, his sense was comprised in one verse, but here usually it is drawn out further. See how Wisdom tries variety of methods with us, lest we should be chary of being addressed, in order that our attention may be awakened, and our application assisted. Ministers must not think it enough to preach before their hearers, but must preach to them; nor enough to preach to them all in general, but should apply themselves to particular persons, as here; Do thou do so and so. Here is,

1. An earnest exhortation to get wisdom and *A corruption of the word hospital, denoting here any charitable grace, by attending to the words of the wise men, both written and preached; the words of the prophets and priests; and particularly to that knowledge which Solomon, in this book, gives men of good and evil, sin and duty, rewards and punishments. To these words, to this knowledge, the car shall be humbled down, in humility and sorrow, in correction; and the heart applied by faith, and love, and close consideration. The car will not serve without the heart.

II. Arguments to enforce this exhortation. Consider,

1. The worth and weight of the things themselves, which Solomon in this book gives us the knowledge of; they are not trivial things, for amusement and diversion, not jocular proverbs, to be repeated in report, and in order to pass away time; no, but excellent things, which concern the glory of God, the holiness and happiness of our souls, the welfare of mankind, and all communities; they are principally things, so the word is, fit for kings to speak, and senators to hear; they are things that concern counsels and knowledge, wise counsels, relating to the most important concerns; things which will not only make us knowing ourselves, but enable us to advise others.

2. The clearness of the discovery of these things, and the directing of them to us in particular. They are made known, publicly known, that all may read; plainly known, that he that runs may read; made known this day, more fully than ever before, in this day of light and knowledge; made known in this day; but it is only a little while that this light is with thee; perhaps the things that are this day made known to thee, if thou improve not the day of thy visitation, may, before to-morrow, be hid from thine eyes. They are written, for no freest certainty, and that they may be received, and transmuted, pure and entire, to posterity; but that which the emphasis is here most laid upon, is, that they are made known to thee, even to thee, and written to thee, as if it were a letter directed to thee by name; it is suited to thee and to thy case, thou mayest in this glass see thine own face; it is intended for thee, to be a rule to thee, and by it thou must be judged. They cannot say of these things, They are good things, but they are nothing to me; no, they are of the greatest concern imaginable to us.

3. The agreeableness of these things to us, in respect both of comfort and credit. (1.) If we hide them in our hearts, they will be very pleasing, and yield us an abundant satisfaction; (v. 18.) *It is a pleasant thing, and will be thy constant entertainment, if thou keep them within thee; if thou digest them, and be actuated and governed by them, and delivered into them as into a mouth." The form of godliness, when that is restored in, is but a force put upon a man, and he does but do penance in that white clothing; those only that submit to the power of godliness, and make heart-work of it, find the pleasure of it, ch. ii. 10. (2.) If we make use of them in our discourse, they will be very becoming, and gain us a good reputation; they shall be fitted in thy lips. *Speak of these things, and thou speakest like thyself, and as is fit for thee to speak, considering thine character; thou wilt also have pleasure in speaking of these things, as well as in thinking of them.

4. The advantage designed us by them. The excellent things which God hath written to us are not like the commands which the master gives his servant, which are all intended for the benefit of the master, but like those which the master gives his scholar; which are all intended for the benefit of the scholar. These things must be kept by us, for they are written to us.

(1.) That we may have a confidence in God, and so may have comfort in him, and communion with him; that thy trust may be in the Lord, v. 19. We cannot trust in God, except in the way of duty; we are, therefore, taught our duty, that we may have reason to trust in God. Nay, this is itself one great duty we are to learn, and a duty that is the foundation of all practical religion, to live a life of delight in God, and dependence on him.

(2.) That we may have a satisfaction in our own judgment; 'That I might make thee know the certainty of the words of truth.' That, the more I know what is truth, the more plainly do I distinguish between it and falsehood, and mayest know upon what grounds thou receivest and believest the truths of God.' Note. [1.] It is a desirable thing to know, not only the words of truth, but the certainty of them; that our faith may be intelligent and rational, and may grow up to a full assurance. [2.] The way to know the certainty of the words of truth, is, to make conscience of our duty; for if any man do his will, he shall know for certain that the doctrine is of God, John vii. 17.

(3.) That we may be useful and serviceable to others for their instruction; "That thou mayest give a good account of the words of truth to them to send to thee to consult thee as an oracle;' or, as the margin reads it, 'to those that send thee, that employ thee as an agent or ambassador in any business.' Knowledge is given to us to do good with, that others may be comforted, and we may, in our place serve our generation according to the will of God. And those who make conscience of keeping God's commandments will be best able to give a reason for the hope that is in them.

22. Rob not the poor, because he is poor; neither oppress the afflicted in the gate; 23. For the Lord will plead their cause, and spoil the soul of those that spoiled them.

After this solemn preface, one would have expected something new and surprising; no: here is a plain and common, but very needful, caution against the barbarous and inhuman practice of oppressing poor people. Observe, 1. The sin itself, and that is, robbing the poor, and oppressing them, contrary taking from them, that have but little to lose, and so leaving them nothing. It is bad to rob any man, but most absurd to rob the poor, whom we should relieve; to squeeze those with our power, whom we should water with our bounty; to oppress the afflicted, and so to add affliction to them, to give judgment against them, and so to patronise those that do rob them; which is as bad as if we robbed them ourselves. Rich men will not suffer themselves to be wronged, poor men cannot help it, and therefore we ought to be the more careful not to wrong them.

2. The aggravations of the sin. (1.) If their inability, by reason of their poverty, to right themselves, imbolden us to rob them, it is so much the more; that is robbing the poor because he is poor; this is not only a base and cowardly thing, to take advantage against a man because he is helpless, but it is unnatural, and bespeaks men worse than beasts. (2.) Or if it be done under colour of law and justice, that is oppressing the afflicted in the gate, where they ought to be protected from wrong, and to have justice done them against those that oppress them; which is as bad as if we robbed them ourselves.

3. The danger that attends this sin. He that robs and oppresses the poor, it is at his peril; for, (1.) The oppressed will find God their powerful Patron; he will plead their cause, and not suffer them to be run down and trampled upon. If men will not appear for them, God will. (2.) The oppressors will find him a just Avenger; he will make reprimands upon them, will spoil the souls of those that spoil them; he will repay them in spiritual judgments, in curses to their souls. He that robs the poor will be found in the end a murderer of himself.

24. Make no friendship with an angry man, and with a furious man thou shalt not go; 25. Lest thou learn his ways, and get a snare to thy soul.

Here is, 1. A good caution against being intimate with a passionate man. It is the law of friendship that we accommodate ourselves to our friends, and be ready to serve them, and therefore we ought to be wise and wary in the choice of a friend, that we come not under that sacred tie to any one whom it would be dangerous for us to accommodate ourselves to; though we must be civil to all, yet we must be careful whom we lay in our bosoms, and contract a familiarity with. And, among others, a man who is expressly provoked, touchy, and apt to resent affronts, who, when he is in a passion, cares not what he says or does, but grows outrageous, such a one is not fit to be made a friend or companion, for he will be ever and anon angry with us, and that will be our trouble, and we will expect that we should, like him, be angry with others, and that may".

2. Good cause given for this caution; lest thou learn his way. Those we go with we are apt to grow like. Our corrupt hearts have so much tincter in them, that it is dangerous conversing with those that throw about the sparks of their passion; we shall thereby get a snare to our souls, for a disposition to anger is a great snare to any man, and an occasion of much sin. He does not say, 'Lest thou have ill language given thee, or get a broken head'; but, which is much worse, 'Lest thou imitate him, to humour him, and so contract an ill habit.'

26. Be not thou one of them that strike hands, or of them that are sureties for debts.

27. If thou hast nothing to pay, why should he take away thy bed from under thee? We have here, as often before, a caution against suretyship, as a thing both imprudent and unjust.

1. We must not associate ourselves, nor contract an intimacy, with men of broken fortunes and reputations, who need, and will urge their friends to be bound for them, but that the persons our friends, hours, to feed their lusts, and, by keeping up a little longer, may do the more damage at last to those that give them credit. Have nothing to do with such; be not thou among them.

2. We must not cheat people of their money, by striking hands ourselves, or becoming surety for others, when we have not to pay. If a man by the Divine Providence is disabled to pay his debts, he ought to be pitied and helped, but he that takes up money or goods himself, or is bound for another, when he knows that he has not wherewithal to pay, or that which he has is so settled, that the creditors cannot come at it, he does in effect pick his neighbour's pocket; and though, in all cases, compassion is to be used, yet he may thank himself if the law have its course, and his bed be taken from under him, which might not be taken for a pawn to secure a debt, Exod. xxvii. 26. 27. For if a man appeared so powerful, he was not to do nothing else to his security, he ought to be relieved, and it was honestly done to own it; but for the recovery of a debt, it seems it might be taken by the summum jus—i.e. strict operation of law.

3. We must not ruin our own estates and families; every man ought to be just to himself, and to his wife and children; those are not so who live above what they have, who, by the mismanagement of their own affairs, or by incumbering themselves with the debts of others, waste what they have, and bring themselves to poverty. We may take joyfully
CHAPTER XXIII.

WHEN thou sittest to eat with a ruler, consider diligently what is before thee; 2. And put a knife to thy throat, if thou be a man given to appetite. 3. Be not desirous of his dainties; for they are deceitful meat.

The sin we are here warned against, is, luxury and sensuality, and the indulgence of the appetite in eating and drinking, a sin that most easily besets us.

1. We are here told when we enter into temptation, and are in most danger of falling into this sin; "When thou sittest to eat with a ruler, thou hast great plenty before thee, varieties and dainties, such a table as thou hast seldom seen; thou art ready to think, as Haman did, of nothing but the honour hereby done thee; (Esth. v. 12,) and the opportunity thou hast of pleasing thy palate, and forgettest that there is a snare laid for thee." Perhaps the temptation may be stronger and more dangerous to one that is not used to such entertainments, than to one that always sits down to a good table.

2. We are here bid double our guard at such a time. We must, (1.) Apprehend ourselves to be in danger; "Consider diligently what is before thee, what meat and drink are before thee, that thou mayest choose that which is safest for thee, and which thou art least likely to eat and drink of to excess. Consider also, that companion, that ruler himself, who, if he be wise and good, will take it as an affront for any of his guests to disorder themselves at his table." And if when we sit to eat with a ruler, much more when we sit to eat with the Ruler of rulers at the Lord's table, we must consider diligently what is before us, that we may not in any respect eat and drink unworthily, unbecomingly, lest that table become a snare. (2.) We must alarm ourselves into temperance and moderation, "Put a knife to thy throat, restrain thyself, as if it were with a sword hanging over thy head, from all excess. Let these words, Take heed lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, and so that day come upon you unwares; or these, For all these things God shall bring thee into judgment; or these, Drunkards shall not inherit the kingdom of God; be a knife to the throat." The Latins call luxury, gula—the throat; "Take up arms against that sin. Rather be so abominable, that thy throat should be cut, than indulge thyself in voluptuousness." We must never feed ourselves without fear, (Jude 12,) but we must in a special manner fear when temptation is before us. (3.) We must reason ourselves into a holy contempt of the gratifications of sense; "If thou be a man given to appetite, thou must, by a present resolution, and an application of the terrors of the Lord, restrain thyself. When thou art in danger of falling into any excess, put a knife to thy throat; that may serve for ever. But that is not enough, lay the axe to the root, mortify that appetite which has such a power over thee, not desirous of dainties." Now, We ought to observe what is our own iniquity, and, if we find ourselves addicted to flesh-pleasing, we must not only stand upon our guard against temptation from without, but subdue the corruption within. Nature is desirous of food, and we are taught to pray for it, but it is less in desire of dainties, and we cannot in faith pray for them, for frequently they are not food convenient either for mind, body, or estate. They are deceitful meat, and therefore David, instead of praying for them, prays against them, Ps. cxii. 4. "They are pleasant to the palate, but perhaps rise in the stomach, turn sour there, upbraid a man, and make him sick. They do not yield men the satisfaction they promised themselves from them; for those that are given to appetite, when they have that which every dainty, not pleased, they are soon weary of it, they must have something else more dainty; the more a luxurious appetite is humour'd and indulged, the more humorous and troublesome it grows, and the more hard to please; dainties will surfeit, but never satisfy. But especially are they, upon this account, deceitful meat, that, while they please the body, they prejudice the soul, they over-charg the heart, and unfit it for the service of God, nay, they take away the heart, and diminutive the soul, from the things of God, and spoil its relish. Why then should we covet that which will certainly cheat us?"

4. Labour not to be rich; cease from thine own wisdom. 5. Wilt thou set thine eyes upon that which is not? for riches certainly make themselves wings; they fly away, as an eagle toward heaven.
As some are given to appetite, (v. 2) so others to covetousness, and those Solomon here takes to task. Men cheat themselves as much by setting their hearts on money (though it seems most substantial) as by setting them on dainties. Observe,

I. How he dissuades the covetous man from toiling and tormenting himself; (v. 4) "Do not aim to be rich; to raise an estate, and make what thou hast in abundance, more than is needful." We endure life tremendously, and provide for our children and families, according as our rank and condition are, but we must not seek great things. Be not of those that will be rich, that desire it as their chief good, and design it as their highest end, 1 Tim. vi. 9. Covetous men think it is their wisdom, imagining that if they be rich to such a degree, they shall be completely happy; cease from that wisdom, for it is a mistake, a man's life consists not in the abundance of the things which he possesses, Luke xii. 15. Those that aim at great things,

1. "They fill their hands with business more than they can grasp, so that their life is both a perfect drudgery and a perpetual hurry; but be not thou such a fool, labour not to be rich. What thou hast and doest, be master of it, and not a slave to it, as those that rise up early, sit up late, and eat the bread of carefulness, and all the while and every moment they may have to give, is our wisdom and duty, Eph. iv. 28. Immoderate labour, that we may have to hoard, is our sin and folly.

2. "They fill their heads with projects more than they understand, so that their life is a constant toil of care and fear; but do not thou vex thyself, cease from thine own wisdom, go on quietly in the way of thy business, not contriving new ways, and setting thy wits on work to find out new inventions. Acquaintance in God's wisdom, and cease from thine own, ch. iii. 5, 6.

II. How he dissuades the covetous man from cheating and deceiving himself by an inordinate love and pursuit of that which is vanity and vexation of spirit; for,

1. It is not substantial and satisfying; "Wilt thou be such a fool as to set thine eyes, to cause thine eyes to fly with eagerness and violence, upon that rich man's hoard? Those are things that are not. They have a real existence in nature, and are the real gifts of Providence, but in the kingdom of grace they are things that are not; they are not a happiness and portion for a soul; are not what they promise to be, nor what we expect them to be; they are a show, a shadow, a sham upon the soul that trusts to them; they are not, for in a little while they will not be, they will not be ours, they perish in the using; the fashion of them passes away. (2.) It is therefore folly for us to set our eyes upon them; to admire them as the best things, and appropriate them to ourselves as our good things; and to aim at them as our mark at which all our actions are levelled; to fly upon them as the eagle upon her prey. "Wilt thou do a thing scabrous in itself? What, thou a reasonable creature, wilt thou dote upon shadows? The eyes are put for national and intellectual powers; wilt thou throw those away upon such undeserving objects? To set the hands and feet upon the world is well enough, but not the eyes, the eyes of the mind, those were made to contemplate better things. Wilt thou, my son, that professed religion, put such an affront upon God, (toward whom thine eyes should ever be) and such an abuse upon thy own soul?

2. It is not durable and abiding; Riches are very uncertain; they are not to be trusted; for so, they make themselves wings, and flee away. The more frequently our eyes are set upon them, the more likely they are to fly away from us. (1.) Riches will leave us; those that hold them ever so fast, cannot hold them always, cannot hold them long; either they must be taken from us, or we must be taken from them. The goods are said to flow away as a stream, (Job xx. 28.) here to flee away as a bird. (2.) Perhaps they may leave us suddenly; when we have taken a great deal of pains for them, and begin to take a great deal of pride and pleasure in them. The covetous man sits hatching upon his wealth, and brooding over it till it is fledged, as the young ones under the hen, and then it is gone. Or, as if a man should be fond of a flight of wild-fowl that light in his field, and call them his own, because they are upon his ground, whereas if he offer to come near them, they take wing immediately, and are gone to another man's field. (3.) The wings they flee away upon are of their own making; they have in themselves the principle of their own corruption, the devouring moth and rust. They are vesting in their own nature, and like a handful of dust, which if it be grasped, slips through the fingers. Snow will last awhile, and look pretty, if it be left to lie on the ground where it fell, but if gathered up and laid in the bosom, it is dissolved and gone immediately. (4.) They go irresistibly and irrecoverably, as an eagle toward heaven, that flies strongly, there is no stopping her, and flies out of sight of the strong air, and when she has thus done riches leave men, and leave them in grief and vexation, if they set their hearts upon them.

6. Eat thou not the bread of him that hath an evil eye, neither desire thou his dainty meats: 7. For as he thinketh in his heart, so is he: Eat and drink, saith he to thee; but his heart is not with thee. 8. The morrow which thou hast eaten shalt thou vomit up, and lose thy sweet words.

Those that are voluptuous, and given to appetite, (v. 2) are glad to be where there is good cheer stirring, and those that are covetous and saving, that they may spare at home, will be glad to get a dinner at another man's table; and therefore both are here advised not to be forward to accept of every man's invitation, but especially not to thrust themselves in, unbidden. Observe,

1. There are those that pretend to bid their friends welcome, that are not hearty and sincere in it. They have a fair tongue, and know what they should say; Eat and drink, saith he, because it is expected that the master of the feast should so compliment his guests; but they have an evil eye, and grudge their guests every bit they eat, especially if they eat freely. They would seem to be liberal in making the entertainment, and would have the credit of it, but they have so great a love to their money, and so little to their friends, that they cannot have the comfort of it, nor any enjoyment of them selves or their friends. The miser's feast is his pleasure. If a man be so very selfish, and sordid, that he cannot find in his heart to bid his friends welcome to what he has, lie ought not to add to that the guilt of dissimulation by inviting them, but let him own himself to be what he is, that the vile person may not be called liberal, or the churl bountiful, Isai. xxxii. 5.

2. One can have no comfort in accepting the entertainments that are given grudgingly; "Eat not thou the bread of such a man, let him keep it to himself. Do not spuge upon those that are bountiful, nor make thyself burthensome to any; but especially scorn to be beholden to those that are palpably, and not sincerely. Better have a dimmer of love, but true and true welcome, than dainty meats without it. Therefore," (1.) "Judge of the man as his mind is; thou thinkest to pay thy respect to him as a friend,
9. Speak not in the ears of a fool; for he will despise the wisdom of thy words.

We are here directed not to cast pearls before swine, (Matth. vii. 6.) and not to expose things sacred to the contempt and ridicule of profane scoffers. It is our duty to take all fit occasions to speak of the most sacred things.

1. There are some that will make a jest of every thing, though it be ever so prudent and pertinently spoken; that will not only despise a wise man’s words, but despise even the wisdom of them, that in them which is most improvable for their own edification; they will particularly reproach that, as if it had an ill design upon them, which they must guard against.

2. Those that do so forfeit the benefit of good advice and instruction, and a wise man is not only allowed, but advised, not to speak in the ears of such fools; let them be foolish still, and let not precious breath be thrown away upon them. If what a wise man says in his wisdom will not be heard, let him hold his peace, and try whether the wisdom of that will be regarded.

10. Remove not the old land-mark; and enter not into the fields of the fatherless: 11. For their Redeemer is mighty; he shall plead their cause with thee.

Note, 1. The fatherless are taken under God’s special protection; with him they not only find mercy showed to them, (Hos. xiv. 5.) but justice done for them. He is their Redeemer, their Goel, their near Kinsman, that will take their part, and stand up for them with jealousy, as taking himself affronted in the injuries done to them. As their Redeemer, he will plead their cause against those that do them any injury, and, one way or other, will not only defend their right, and correct it if the wrong be done to them. And he is mighty, almighty; his omnipotence is engaged and employed for their protection, which their proudest and most powerful oppressors will find themselves an unequal match for; and that it is at their peril to contend with it.

2. Every man therefore must be careful not to injure them in any thing, or to invade their rights; either by a clandestine removal of the old landmarks, or by a forcible entry into their field. Being fatherless, they have none to right them, and, being in their childhood, they do not so much as apprehend the wrong that is done them. Sense of honour, and much more the fear of God, should restrain men from offering any injury to children, especially fatherless children.

12. Apply thy heart unto instruction, and thine ears to the words of knowledge. 13. Withhold not correction from the child: for if thou beatest him with the rod, he shall not die. 14. Thou shalt beat him with the rod, and shalt deliver his soul from hell. 15. My son, if thy heart be wise, my heart shall rejoice, even mine; 16. Yea, my reins shall rejoice when thy lips speak right things.

Here is, 1. A parent instructing his child. He is here brought in, persuading him to give his mind to his book, and especially to the scriptures and his catechism; to attend to the words of knowledge, by which he might come to know his duty, and danger, and interest, and not to think it enough to give them the hearing, but to apply his heart to them, to delight in them, and bow his will to the authority of them.

The heart is then applied to the instruction, when the instruction is applied to the heart.

2. A parent correcting his child. A tender parent can scarcely find in his heart to do it, it goes much against the grain, but he finds it necessary, it is his duty, and therefore he dares not withhold correction when there is occasion for it; (shar’ the rod, and shoul’st the child;) he beats him with the rod, gives him a gentle correction, the stripes of the sons of men, not so much as we give to beasts. Beat him with the rod, and he shall not die; the rod will not kill him; nay, it will prevent his killing himself by those vicious courses which the rod will be necessary to restrain him from. For the present, it is not joyous but grievous, both to the parent and to the child; but, when it is given with wisdom, designed for good, accompanied with prayer, and blessed of God, it may prove a happy means of preventing his utter destruction, and delivering his soul from hell. Our great care must be about our children’s soul, we must not see them in danger of hell, without using all possible means, with the utmost care and concern, to snatch them as brands out of everlasting burnings. Let the body smart, so that the spirit be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus.

3. A parent encouraging his child, telling him, (1.) What was all he expected; nothing but what would be for his own good, that his heart be wise, that he speak right things; that he be under the government of good principles, and that by those principles he particularly maintain a good government of his tongue. It is to be hoped, that those will do right things, when they grow up, who learn to speak right things when they are young, and dare not speak any bad words. (2.) What a comfort it would be to him, if herein he answered his expectation; “If thy heart be wise, my heart shall rejoice, shall rejoice in thee; even mine, who have taken so much care and pains about thee, my heart that has many a time ached for thee, for whom thou shouldst study thus to make a gracious requital.”

Note, The wisdom of children will be the joy of their parents and teachers, who have no greater joy than to see them walk in the truth, 3 John 4. “Children, if you be wise and good, devout and conscientious, God will be pleased with you, and that will be our joy; we shall think our labour, in instructing and correcting you, well bestowed. It is an answerable for the many prayers we have put up for you; we shall be eased of a great deal of care, shall not need to be so strict and severe in watching over you, and shall, consequently, be the easier, both to you and to ourselves. We shall rejoice in hope that you will be a credit and comfort to us, if we should live to be old, that you will bear up the name of Christ in your generation, that you will live comfortably in this world, and happily in another.”
Let not thy heart envy sinners: but be thou in the fear of the Lord all the day long. 18. For surely there is an end; and thine expectation shall not be cut off.

Here is, 1. A necessary caution against entertaining any favourable thoughts of prospering profaneness; "Let not thine heart envy sinners; do not grudge them either the liberty they take to sin, or the success they have in sin, it will cost them dear, and they are to be pitied rather than envied. Their prosperity is their portion, (Ps. xvi. 11.) not, it is their poison." Prov. i. 22. We must not nourish in our hearts any secret discontent at the providence of God, though it seem to smile upon them, nor wish ourselves in their condition. "Let not thine heart imitate sinners," (so some read it,) do not as they do, walk not in the way with them, use not the methods they take to enrich themselves, though they thrive by them.

2. An excellent direction to maintain high thoughts of God in our minds at all times, Be thou in the fear of the Lord, every day, and all the day long. We must be in the fear of the Lord, as in our employment, exercising ourselves in holy adorations of God in subjection to his precepts, submission to his providences, and a constant care to please him; we must be in it as in our element, taking a pleasure in contemplating God's glory, and complying with his will. It is to be devoted to his fear; (Ps. cxix. 38.) and governed by it as our commanding principle in all we say and do. All the days of our life we must constantly keep up an awe of God upon our spirits, must pay a deference to his authority, and have a dread of his wrath. We must be always so in his fear as never to be out of it.

3. A good reason for both of these; (v. 18.) Surely there is an end, an end and expectation, as Jer. xxix. 11. There will be an end of the prosperity of the wicked, therefore do not envy them, (v. 17.) there will be an end of thy afflictions, therefore be not weary of them; an end of thy services, thy work and warfare will be accomplished, perfect love will cast out fear, and thine expectation of the reward not only will be not cut off, or disappointed, but it will be infinitely outdone. The consideration of the end will help to reconcile us to all the difficulties and discouragements of the way.

19. Hear thou, my son, and be wise, and guide thy heart in the way. 20. Be not among wine-bibbers; among riotous eaters of flesh: 21. For the drunkard and the glutton shall come to poverty; and drowsiness shall clothe a man with rags. 22. Hearken unto thy father that begat thee, and despise not thy mother when she is old. 23. Buy the truth, and sell it not; also wisdom, and instruction, and understanding. 24. The father of the righteous shall greatly rejoice; and he that beggeth a wise child shall have joy of him. 25. Thy father and thy mother shall be glad, and she that bare thee shall rejoice. 26. My son, give me thy heart, and let thine eyes observe my ways. 27. For an whore is a deep ditch; and a strange woman is a narrow pit. 28. She also lieth in wait as for a prey, and increaseth the transgressors among men.

Here is good advice for parents to give to their children; words are put into their mouths, that they may train them up in the way they should go. Here we have,

1. An earnest call to young people to attend to the advice of their godly parents, not only to this that is here given, but to all other profitable instructions; "Hear, my son, and be wise, v. 19. This will be an evidence that thou art wise, and a means to make thee wiser." Wisdom, as Faith, comes by hearing. As said, (v. 22.) "Hearken unto thy father who begat thee, and who therefore has an authority over thee, and an affection for thee, and, thou mayest be sure, has no other design than thine own good." We ought to give reverence to the fathers of our flesh, who begat us, and were the instruments of our being; much more ought we to obey, and be in subjection to, the Father of our spirits, who made us, and is the Author of our being. We are since as Finisher also, from a sense of duty to God, and in love to her child, gives him good instructions, let him not despise her, or her advice, when she is old. When the mother is grown old, we may suppose the children to be grown up; but let them not think themselves past being taught, even by her, but rather respect her the more for the multitude of her years, and the wisdom which they teach. Scornful and insolent young men will make a jest, it may be, of the good advice of an aged mother, and deride her; but who do not seem to heed what an old woman says; but such will have a great deal to answer for another day, not only as having set at nought good counsel, but as having slighted and grieved a good mother, ch. xxx. 17.

II. An argument to enforce this call, taken from the great comfort which this will be to their parents, v. 24. Note. 1. It is the duty of children to study how they may rejoice the hearts of their godly parents, and do it yet more and more, so that they may greatly rejoice in them when the evil days come, and the years of which they say they have no pleasure in them, but this, to see their children do well; as Barzillai to see Chimham preferred. 2. Children will be a joy to their parents, if they be righteous and wise. Righteousness is true wisdom; they who do good, do well for themselves. Those are completely such as they should be who are simply wise, knowing and learned, but righteous, honest and godly men, being righteous, conscientious and well-meaning, but wise, prudent and discreet in the management of themselves. If such the children be, especially all the children, the father and mother will be glad, and think nothing too much that they have done, or do, for them; they will please themselves in them, and give God thanks for them; particularly she that bare them with pain, and nursed them with pains, will rejoice in them, and reckon herself well-requited, and the sorrow more than forgotten, because a wise and good man is the product of it, who is a blessing to the world he was born into.

III. Some general precepts of wisdom and virtue.

1. Guide thine heart in the way, v. 19. It is the heart that must be taken care of, and directed aright; the motions and affections of the soul must be toward right objects, and under a steady guidance. If the heart be guided in the way, the steps will be guided, and the conduct well-ordered.

2. Buy the truth, and sell it not, v. 23. Truth is that by which the heart must be guided and governed, for without truth there is no goodness; no regular practices without right principles. It is by the power of truth, known and believed, that we must be kept back from sin, and constrained to duty; the understanding must be well-informed with what is true, and instruction. And therefore, (1.) We must buy it, be willing to part with any thing for it. He does not say at what rate we must buy it, because we cannot buy it too dear, but must have it at any rate; whatever it costs us, we shall not repent the bargain. When we are at expense for the means of knowledge, man, resolved to gain knowledge, by that reason, then we buy the truth. Riches should be employed for the getting of knowledge, rather than knowledge for the getting of riches. When we are at pains in searching after truth, that we may come to the knowledge of it, and may distinguish between it and error, then we buy it. Dil laboribus omnia vendunt—Heaven concedes every thing to the laborious. When we choose rather to suffer less in our temporal interest, than to deny or neglect the truth, that we may have it; and it is a pearl of such great price, that we must be willing to part with all to purchase it, must make shipwreck of estate, trade, preferment, rather than of faith and a good conscience.

(2.) We must not sell it; do not part with it for pleasures, honours, riches, any thing in this world; do not neglect the study of it, nor throw off the profession of it, nor revolt from under the dominion of it, for the getting or saving of any secular interest whatsoever. Hold fast the form of sound words, and never let it go upon any terms.

3. Give me thine heart, v. 26. God, in this exhortation, speaks to us as unto children; Son, Daughter, Give me thy heart. The heart is that which the great God requires and calls for from every one of us; whatever we give, if we do not give him our hearts, it will not be accepted. We must set our love upon him. Our thoughts must converse much with him, and on him, and not high. Bid; the tenderness of our hearts must be fastened. We must make it our own act and deed to devote ourselves to the Lord, and we must be free and cheerful in it. We must not think to divide the heart between God and the world; he will have all or none; Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart. To this call we must readily answer, “My Father, take my heart, such as it is, and make it such as it should be; take possession of it, and set up thy throne in it.”

4. Let thine eyes observe my ways; have an eye to the rule of God’s word, the conduct of his providence, and the good examples of his people. Our eyes must observe these, as he that writes observes his copy, that we may keep in the right paths, and may proceed and persevere in them.

IV. Some particular cautions against these sins which are, of all others, the most destructive to the seeds of wisdom and grace in the soul, which impair the sweet image of God in it.

1. Gluttony and drunkenness, v. 20, 21. The world is full of examples of this sin, and temptations to it, which all young people are concerned to stand upon their guard against, and keep at a distance from. Be not a wine-bibber; we are allowed to drink a little wine, (1 Tim. v. 23;) but not much; not to make a trade of it, never to drink to excess. Be not a riotous eater of flesh, as the Israelites were, when they came out of Egypt. Who will give us flesh to eat? Whereas Paul, though he is free to eat flesh, yet resolves that he will eat no flesh while the world stands, rather than make his brother to offend; so indifferent is it to he, 1 Cor. viii. 13. Be not an excessive eater of flesh; intemperance must be avoided in meat as well as drink. Be not a luxurious eater of flesh; not pleased with any thing but what is very nice and delicate, savoury and dainty. So take not only a pleasure, but a pride, in being curious about their diet, and, as they call it, eating well; as if that were the ornament of a gentleman which is really the shame of a Christian; making a god of the belly. Be not a wine-bibber, and be not a riotous eater; and therefore, be not among wine-bibbers, nor among riotous eaters; do not give them countenance, lest thou learn their ways, and insensibly fall into those sins, or at least lose the dread and detestation of them. They covet to have thee among them; for we are not desirous; but thou thyself are very desirous to debauch others; therefore do not gratify them, lest thou endanger thyself. He fetches an argument against this sin from the expressiveness of it, and its tendency to impoverish men; and if men will not be deterred from it by the ruin it brings on their secular interests, which nearest their hearts, no marvel that they are not frightened from it by what they are told out of the world of the greatest mischief it beareth them in their spiritual and eternal concerns. The drunken and the glutton hate to be reformed, though they are told they shall come to poverty; nay, though they are told they shall come to hell. Drunkenness is the cause of drownings; it stupefies men, and makes them inattentive to seriousness, and then all goes to wreck and ruin; for men that have lived creditably come to be clothed with rags.

2. Whoredom: that is another sin which takes away the heart that should be given to God, Hos. iv. 11. He shows the danger which attends that sin, v. 27, 28.

(1.) It is a sin from which few recover themselves, when once they are entangled in it. It is like a deep ditch, and a narrow fit, which it is almost impossible to get out of; and therefore it is wisdom to keep far enough from the brink of it. Take heed of making any approaches toward this sin, because it is so hard to make a retreat from it; conscience, which should head the retreat, being debauched by it, and divine grace forfeited.

(2.) It is a sin which bewitches men to their ruin; The adulteress lies in wait as a robber, pretending friendship, but designing the greatest mischief, to rob them of all they have that is valuable, to strip them both of their armour and of their ornaments. Even those who, being virtuously educated, endeavour to shun the adulteress, she will lie in wait for; that she may head the retreat, being debauched by it, and then raise the guard, and she has them at an advantage. Let none, therefore, be at any time secure.

(3.) It is a sin that contributes more than any other to the spreading of vice and immorality in a kingdom; It increases the transgressors among men. One adulteress may be the ruin of many a precious soul, and may help to debauch a whole town. It increases the treacherous or perfidious ones; it not only occasions husbands to be false to their wives, but men who serve their masters, but means they have, professed religion, to throw off their profession, and break their covenants with God. Houses of uncleanliness are therefore such pest-houses as ought to be suppressed by those whose office it is to take care of the public welfare.

29. Who hath wo? who hath sorrow? who hath contentions? how hath babbling? who hath wounds without cause? who hath redness of eyes? 30. They that tarry long at the wine, they that go to seek mixed wine. 31. Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth his colour in the cup, when it moveth itself aright; 32. At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder. 33. Thine eyes shall behold strange women, and thine heart shall utter perverse things: 34. Yea, thou shalt be as he that lieth down in the midst of the sea, or as he that lieth upon the top of a mast. 35. They have stricken me, shall thou say, and I was not sick; they have beaten me, and I felt it not: when shall I awake? I will seek it yet again.

Solomon here gives fair warning against the sin of drunkenness, to confirm what he had said, v. 20. I. He cautions all people to keep out of the way of temptations to this sin; (v. 31.) Look not thou at their cup, nor let their drunkenness make thee drunk. Can any looked upon as the best wine, it is therefore called the blood of the grape. Critics judge of wine, among other indications, by the colour of it; some wine, they say, looks charmingly, looks so well, that it even says, "Come and drink me; it moves itself aight, goes down very smoothly, or perhaps the roughness of it is grateful. It is said of generous, strong-bodied, wine, that it even causes the wine to take the forbidden fruit." Note, Those that would be kept from any sin, must keep themselves from all the occasions and beginnings of it, and be afraid of coming within the reach of its allurements, lest they be overcome by them. II. He shows the many pernicious consequences of the sin of drunkenness, for the enforcement of this caution. Take heed of the bait, for fear of the hook. But the last end of drunkards is bitterness in the end, and this sin particularly. It bites like a serpent; when the drunkard is made sick by his surfeit, thrown by it into a dropsy, or some fatal disease, beggar'd and ruined in his estate, especially when his conscience is awakened, and he cannot reflect upon it without horror and indignation at himself; but, worst of all, at last, when the cup of drunkenness shall be turned into a cup of trembling, the cup of the Lord's wrath, the dishes of which he must be for ever drinking, and shall not have a drop of water to cool his inflamed tongue. To take off the force of the temptation that there is in the pleasure of the sin, foresees the punishment of it, and what it will at last end in, if repentance prevent not. In its latter end it bites, so the word is; think, therefore, what will be in the end thereof. But he chooses to specify those pernicious consequences of this sin, which are present and sensible. 1. It embolds men in quarrels, makes them quarrel with others, and say and do that which gives others occasion to quarrel with them, v. 29. He asks, Who hath wo? who hath sorrow? Who has not, in this world? Many have wo and sorrow, and cannot help it; but drunkards wilfully create wo and sorrow to themselves. They that have contentions have wo and sorrow; and drunkards are the fools whose life enter into contention. When the wine is in, the wit is out, and the passions up; and thence come drunken scuffles, and drunken frays, and drunken disputes over the cups; many a vexatious, ravishing law-suit has begun thus. There is babbling, quarrels in word, and the exchange of scurrilous language; yet it rests not there; you will have wounds without cause, for causes are things which drunkards are in no capacity to judge of, and therefore they deal blows about without the least consideration who or where to speak; Cant. vii. 9. without cause, received in service of their lusts, are marks of their infancy. Nay, drunkards wound themselves in a tender part, for they have redness of eyes, symptoms of an inward inflammation; their sight is weakened by it, and their looks deformed. This comes, (1.) Of drinking long, tarrying long at the wine, and spending that time in drunken company which should be spent in useful business, or in sleep, which is fit for business, v. 30. Oh the precious hours which both the thankful may save thus; every one of which will be brought into the account at the great day! (2.) Of drinking that which is strong and intoxicating. They go up and down to seek wine that will please them; their great inquiry, "Where is the best liquor?" They seek mixed wine, which is most palatable, but most heady; so willingly do they sacrifice their reason to please their palate! 2. It makes men impure and insolent, v. 33. (1.) The eyes grow unruly, and behold strange women to lust after them, and so let in adultery into the heart. Eat Venus in vino—Wine is oil to the fire of lust. Thine eyes shall behold strange things; so some read it. When men are drunk, the house turns round with them, and every thing looks strangely to them, so that then they cannot trust their own eyes. (2.) The tongue also grows unruly, and talks of things sacrilegiously; by it the heart utters perverse things, things contrary to good order and common civility; which they would be ashamed to speak if they were sober. What ridiculous incoherent nonsense will men talk when they are drunk, who at another time will speak admirably well, and to the purpose! 3. It stupifies and besots men, v. 34. When men are drunk, they know not where they are, nor what they say and do. (1.) Their heads are giddy, and, when they are at sea, they are tossed by the rolling waves of the sea, or upon the top of a mast; hence they complain that their heads swim; their sleeps are commonly unquiet and not refreshing, and their dreams tumultuous. (2.) Their judgments are clouded, and they have no more steadiness and consistency than he that sleeps upon the top of a mast; they drink, and forget the law, (ch. xxxi. 5.) they err through wine, (Isa. xxxvii. 27.) which think as extravagant as they talk. (3.) They are heedless and fearless of danger, and senseless of the rebukes they are under, either from God or man. They are in imminent danger of death, of damnation, lie as much exposed as if they slept upon the top of a mast, and yet are secure, and sleep on. They fear no peril when the terrors of the Lord are laid before them; nay, they feel no pain when the judgments of God are actually upon them; they cry not when he binds them. Set a drunkard in the stocks, and he is not sensible of the punishment: "They have stricken me, and I was not sick; I felt it not, it made no impression at all upon me." Drunkenness turns men into stocks and stones, they are scarcely to be reckoned animals, they are dead while they live. 4. Worst of all, the heart is hardened in the sin, and the sinner, notwithstanding all these present mischiefs that attend it, obstinately persists in it, and basely betrays the inmost secrets of his mind. Wilt thou, ado he has to shake off the chains of his drunken sleep, he can hardly get clear of the fumes of the wine, though he strives with them, that (being thirsty in the morning) he may return to it again. So perfectly lost is he to all sense of virtue and honour, and so wretchedly is his conscience seared, that he is not ashamed to say, I will seek it yet again. There is no hope; no, they have loved drunkards, and after them they will go, Jer. ii. 32. This is adding drunkenness to thirst, and following strong drink; these that do so may read their doom.
PROVERBS, XXIV.

CHAP. XXIV.

1. Be not thou envious against evil men, and neither desire to be with them: 2. For their heart studieth destruction, and their lips talk of mischief.

Here, 1. The caution given is much the same with that which we had before; (ch. xxiii. 17.) not to envy sinners, not to think them happy, nor to wish ourselves in their condition, though they prosper ever so much in this world, and are ever so merry, and ever so secure; "Let not such a thought ever come into thy mind; Oh that I could shake off the restraints of religion and conscience, and take as great a liberty to indulge the sensual appetite, as I see such and such do! No; desire not to be with them, to do as they do, and fare as they fare, and to cast in thy lot among them.

2. Here is another reason given for this caution; Be not envious against them; not only because their end will be bad, but because their way is so, v. 2. Do not think with them, for their heart studies destruction to others, but it will prove destruction to themselves. Do not speak like them, for their lips talk of their mischief. All they say has an ill tendency; to dishonour God, reproach religion, or wrong their neighbour; but it will be mischief to themselves at last. It is therefore thy wisdom to have nothing to do with them; nor hast thou any reason to look upon them with envy, but with pity rather, and a just indignation at their wicked practices.

3. Through wisdom is an house built, and by understanding it is established; 4. And by knowledge shall the chambers be filled with all precious and pleasant riches.

5. A wise man is strong; yea, a man of knowledge increaseth strength. 6. For by wise counsel thou shalt make thy war; and in multitude of counsellors there is safety.

We are tempted to envy those that grow rich, and raise their estates and families by such unjust courses as our consciences will by no means suffer us to use. But, to set aside that temptation, Solomon here shows that a man, with prudent management, may raise his estate and family by lawful and honest means, with a good conscience, and a good name, and the blessing of God upon it; and if the other be raised up little sooner, yet these will last a great deal longer.

1. That which is here recommended to us, as having the best influence upon our outward prosperity, is, wisdom, and understanding, and knowledge; that is, both piety toward God, (for that is true wisdom,) and prudence in the management of our outward affairs. We must govern ourselves in everything by the rules of religion first, and then of prudence. So that, truly piues, do not thrive in the world, for want of prudence; and some, that are prudent enough, yet do not prosper, because they lean to their own understanding, and do not acknowledge God in their ways; therefore both must go together to complete a wise man.

2. That which is here set before us as the advantage of true wisdom, is, that it will make men's outward affairs prosperous and successful.

(1.) It will build a house, and establish it, v. 3. Men may, by unrighteous practices, build their houses, but they cannot establish them, for the foundation is rotten; (Heb. ii. 9, 10.) whereas, what is honestly got will wear like steel, and be an inheritance to children's children.

(2.) It will enrich a house, and furnish it, v. 4. Those that manage their affairs with wisdom and equity, that are diligent in the use of lawful means for increasing what they have, that spare from luxury, and spend in charity, those that are in a fair way to have the increase of their warehouses, their chambers, filled with all precious and pleasant riches; precious, because got by honest labour, and the substance of a diligent man is precious, pleasant, because enjoyed with holy cheerfulness; some think this is to be understood chiefly of spiritual riches; By knowledge the chambers of the soul are filled with graces and comfort of the Spirit, those precious and pleasant riches; for the Spirit, by enlightening understanding, performs all his other operations on the soul.

3. It will fortify a house, and turn it into a castle; Wisdom is better than weapons of war, offensive or defensive. A wise man is in strength, is in a strong hold, yea, a man of knowledge strengthens might, increases it, v. 5. As we grow in knowledge, we grow in all grace, 2. Pet. iii. 18. Those that increase in wisdom are strengthened with all might, Col. i. 9, 11. A wise man will compass that by wisdom, which a strong man cannot effect by force of arms. The spirit is strengthened both for the spiritual work, and the spiritual warfare, by true wisdom.

(4.) It will govern a house and a kingdom too, and the affairs of both, v. 6. Wisdom will erect a college, or council of state. Wisdom will be of use, [1.] For the managing of the public quarrels, so as not to engage in them but for an honest cause, and not so as to make them the means of a disadvantage, or an honourable retreat; By wise counsel thou shalt make war; which is a thing that may prove of ill consequence if not done by wise counsel. [2.] For the securing of the public peace; In the multitude of counsellors there is safety, for one may foresee the danger, and discern the advantages, which another cannot. In our spiritual conflicts, we need wisdom, for our enemy is subtle.

7. Wisdom is too high for a fool; he openeth not his mouth in the gate. 8. He that deviseth to do evil shall be called a mischievous person. 9. The thought of foolishness is sin; and the corner is an abomination to men.

Here is the description.

1. Of a weak man; Wisdom is too high for him; he thinks it so, and therefore, despairing to attain it, he will take no pains in the pursuit of it, but sit down content without it. And really it is so; he has not capacity for it, and therefore the advantages he has for getting it are all in vain to him. It is no easy thing to get wisdom; those that have natural parts good enough, yet if they be foolish, if they be slothful, and will not take pains, if they be playful and trifling, and given to their pleasures, if they be viciously inclined, and keep bad company, it is too high for them, they are not likely to reach it. And, for want of it, they are unfit for the service of their country, they open not their mouth in the gate, they are not admitted into the council or magistracy, or, if they are, they are dumb statues, and stand, whether they say nothing, because they have nothing to say, and they know, that if they should or for any thing, it would not be heeded, nay, it would be hissed at. Let young men take pains to get wisdom, that they may be qualified for public business, and do it with reputation.

2. Of a wicked man, who is not only despised as a fool is, but detested. Two sorts of wicked men are so.

(1.) Such are secretly malicious. Though they speak fair, and carry it plausibly, they devise to do evil, are contriving to do an ill turn to those they bear a grudge to, or have an envious eye at; He that doth so, shall be called a mischievous person, or a monster of mischief; which, perhaps, was then a common name of reproach; he shall be branded as an inventor of evil things (Rom. i. 30.) or if any mischief be done, he shall be suspected as the author of it, or at least necessary to it. This devising evil, is the thought of foolishness, v. 9. It is made light of, and turned off with a jest, as only a foolish thing, but really it is sin, it is exceeding sinful; you cannot call it by a worse name than to call it sin. It is bad to do evil, but it is worse to devise it, for that has in it the subtlety and poison of the old serpent. But it may be taken more generally; We contract guilt, not only by the act of foolishness, but by the thought of it, though it go no further; the first risings of sin in the heart are sin, offensive to God, and must be repented of, or we are undone. Not only malicious, unclean, proud thoughts, but even foolish thoughts are sinful thoughts. If vain thoughts lodge in the heart, it defile it, which is a reason why we should keep our hearts with all diligence, and harbor no thoughts there which cannot give a good account of themselves, Gen. vi. 5.

(2.) Such as are openly abusive; The scorner, who gives ill language to every body, takes a pleasure in affronting people, and reflecting upon them, he is an abomination to men; none that have any sense of honor and virtue will care to keep company with him. The seat of the scorner is the pestilential chair, (as the Seventy call it, Ps. i. 1.) which no wise man will come near, for fear of taking the infection. Those that strive to make others odious, do but make themselves so.

10. If thou faint in the day of adversity, thy strength is small.

Note. 1. In the day of adversity, we are apt to faint, to droop and be discouraged, to desist from our work, and to despair of relief. Our spirits sink, and then our hands hang down, and our knees grow feeble, and we become unfit for any thing. And often those that are most cheerful, when they are well, drop most, and are most dejected, when they are worst.

(2.) This is an evidence that our strength is small, and is a means of weakening it more; "It is a sign that thou art not a man of any resolution, any firmness of thought, any consideration, any faith, (for that is the strength of a soul,) if thou canst not bear up under an afflictive change of thy condition. Some are so feeble, that they can bear nothing; if a trouble does but touch them, (Job, iv. 5.) nay, if it does but threaten them, they faint immediately, and are ready to give up all for gone; and by this means they render themselves unfit to grapple with their trouble, and unable to help themselves. Be of good courage, therefore, and God shall strengthen thy heart.

11. If thou forbear to deliver them that are drawn unto death, and those that are ready to be slain; 12. If thou sayest, Behold, we knew it not; doth not he that ponders the heart consider it? and he that keepeth thy soul doth he not know it? and shall not he render to every man according to his works?

Here is, 1. A great duty required of us, and that is, to appear for the relief of oppressed innocency; if we see the lives or liberties of any, who by being taken away unjustly, we ought to bestir ourselves all we can to save them, by disproving the false accusations on which they are condemned, and seeking out proofs of their innocence. Though the persons be not such as we are under any particular obligation to, we must help them, out of a general zeal for justice. If any be set upon by force and violence, and it be in our power to rescue them, we ought to do it. Nay, if we see any through ignorance exposing themselves to danger, or fallen in distress, as travellers upon the road, ships at sea, or any the like, it is our duty, though it be with peril to ourselves, to hasten with help to them, and not forbear to deliver them, not be slack, or remiss, or indifferent, in such a case.

2. An answer to the excuse that is commonly made for the omission of this duty. Thou wilt say, "Behold we knew it not;" we were not aware of the imminency of the danger the person was in; we could not be sure that he was innocent, nor did we know how to prove it, nor which way to do any thing in favour of him, else we would have helped him." Now, (1.) It is easy to make such an excuse as this, sufficient to avoid the censures of men, for perhaps they cannot disprove us, when we say, We knew it not; or, We forgot. The temptation to tell a lie, for the excusing of a fault, is very strong, when we know it is impossible to be disproved, the truth lying wholly in our breasts; as when we say, We thought so and so, and really designed it; which no one is conscious of but ourselves.

(2.) It is not so easy with such excuses to evade the judgment of God; and to the discovery of that we lie open, and by the determination of that we must abide. Now, (1.) God fonders the heart, and keeps the soul; he keeps an eye upon it, observes all the doings of it, its most secret thoughts and intents are all naked and open before him. It is his prerogative, and that in which he glories; (Jer. xvii. 10.) I the Lord search the heart. He keeps the soul; holds it in life. This is a good reason why we should be tender of the lives of others, and do all we can to preserve them, because our lives have been precious in the sight of God, and he has graciously kept them. (2.) He knows and considers whether the excuse we make be true or no; whether it was because we did not know it, or whether the true reason was not because we did not love our neighbour as we ought, but were selfish, and regardless both of God and man. Let this serve to silence all our frivolous pleas, by which we think to stop the mouth of conscience when it charges us with the omission of plain duty. Does not he that fonders the heart consider it? (3.) He will judge us accordingly. As his knowledge cannot be imposed upon, so his justice cannot be biassed, but he will render to every man according to his works, not only the commission of evil works, but the omission of good works.

13. My son, eat thou honey, because it is good: and the honey-comb, which is sweet to thy taste: 14. So shall the knowledge of wisdom be unto thy soul: when thou hast found it, then there shall be a reward, and thy expectation shall not be cut off.

We are here quickened to the study of wisdom by Proverbs, XXIV.

1. It will be very pleasant; we eat honey because it is sweet to the taste, and, upon that account we call it good, especially that which runs first from the honey-comb. Canaan was said to flow with milk and honey, and it was the common food of the country, (Luke xxiv. 41, 42.) even for children, Lxx. viii. 13. Those should weed them out of wisdom, and relish the good instructions of it. They that have tasted honey, need no further proof that it is sweet, nor can they by any argument be convinced of the contrary; so those that have experienced the power of truth and godliness are abundantly satisfied with the pleasure of both; they have tasted the sweetness of them, and all the atheists in the world with their sophistry, and the proflane with their banter, cannot alter their sentiments.

6. It will be very profitable. Honey may be sweet to the taste, and yet not wholesome; but wisdom has a future recompense attending it, as well as a present sweetness in it; "Thou art permitted to eat honey, and the agreeableness of it to thy taste invites thee to it; but thou hast much more reason to relish and digest the precepts of wisdom; for, when thou hast found that there shall be a reward, thou shalt be paid for thy pleasure, while the servants of sin pay dear for their pains. Wisdom does indeed work thy soul, but it will be a reward; it does indeed raise great expectations in thee, but as thy labour, so thy hope, shall not be in vain, thine expectation shall not be cut off, (ch. xxiii. 18.) nay, it shall be infinitely outdone."

15. Lay not wait, O wicked man, against the dwelling of the righteous; spoil not his resting-place; 16. For a just man falleth seven times, and riseth up again: but the wicked shall fall into mischief.

This is spoken, not so much by way of counsel to wicked men, they will not receive instruction, (ch. xxviii. 9.) but rather in defiance of them, for the encouragement of good people that are threatened by them. See here,

1. The designs of the wicked against the righteous, and the success they promise themselves in those designs. The plot is laid deep; they lay wait against the dwelling of the righteous, thinking to charge with the crimes which, upon his suspicion against him, they lie in wait at the door, to catch him when he stirs out, as David's persecutors, Ps. lix. title. The hope is raised high; they doubt not but to spoil his dwelling-place, because he is weak, and cannot support it, because his condition is low and distressed, and he is almost down already. All this is a fruit of the old enmity in the seed of the serpent against the seed of the woman. The blood-thirsty hate the upright.

2. The folly and frustration of those designs.

(1.) The righteous man, whose ruin was expected, recovers himself; he falls seven times into trouble, but, by the blessing of God upon his wisdom and integrity, he rises up again, sees through his troubles, and sees better times after them. The just man falls, sometimes falls seven times, perhaps into sin, sins of infirmity, through the surprise of temptation; but he rises up again, by repentance finds mercy with God, and regains his peace. (2.) The wicked man, who expects to see his ruin, and to help it forward, is undone; he falls into mischief, his sins and his troubles are his utter destruction.

17. Rejoice not when thine enemy falleth; and let not thy heart be glad when he stumbleth; 18. Lest the Lord see it, and it displease him, and he turn away his wrath from him.

Here, 1. The pleasure we are apt to take in the troubles of an enemy is forbidden us; as when any have done us an ill turn, or we bear them ill will only because they stand in our light, or in our way; when we do, we come to that they fall or any danger, suppose they stumble; and our corrupt hearts conceive a secret delight and satisfaction it; Aha, so would we have it; they are entangled, the wilderness has shut them in. Or, as Tyrus said concerning Jerusalem, (Ezek. xxvi. 2.) I shall be replenished, now she is laid waste. Men hope in the ruin of their enemies or rivals to wreak their revenge, or to find their account; but be not thou so ingrateful; rejoice not when the worst falls upon him that hast, falls. There may be a holy joy in the destruction of God's enemies, as it tends to the glory of God, and the welfare of the church; (Ps. liii. 10.) but in the ruin of our enemies, as such, we must by no means rejoice; on the contrary, we must weep, even with them when they weep, (as David, Ps. xxxv. 13, 14.) and that in sincerity; not so much as letting our hearts be secretly glad at their calamities.

2. The provocation which that pleasure gives to God is assigned as the reason of that prohibition; The Lord will see it, though it be hid in the heart only, and it will displease him; as it will displease a prudent father to see one child triumph in the correction of another, which he ought to tremble at and take warning by, not knowing how soon it may be his own case, he having so often deserved it. He adds an argument ad hominem—addressed to the individual, "Thou canst not do a greater kindness than to the enemy, when he is fallen, than to rejoice in it; for then, to cross thee and vex thee, God will turn his wrath from him; for, as the wrath of man works not the righteousness of God, so the righteousness of God was never intended to gratify the wrath of man, and humour his foolish passions; rather than seem to do that, he will adjourn the execution of his wrath; nay, it is implied, that when he turns his wrath from him, he will turn it against thee and the cup of trembling shall be put into thy hand."

19. Fret not thyself because of evil men, neither be thou envious at the wicked: 20. For there shall be no reward to the evil man; the candle of the wicked shall be put out.

Here, 1. He repeats the caution he had before given against envying the pleasures and successes of wicked men in their wicked ways. This he quotes from his father David, Ps. xxxvii. 1. We must not in any case fret ourselves, or make ourselves uneasy, whatever God does in his providence; how disagreeable soever it is to our sentiments, interests, and expectations, we must acquiesce in it. We must not be of such a mind that we may be said to fret ourselves, nor must our eye be evil against any, because God is good. Are we more wise or just than he? If wicked people prosper, we must not therefore incline to do as they do. 2. He gives a reason for this caution, taken from the end of that way which wicked men walk in; envy not their prosperity; for (1.) There is no true happiness in it; There shall be no reward to the evil man; he has as much only for his existence; these are all the good things he must ever expect; there is none intended him in the world of retribution; he has his reward, Matth. vi. 2. He shall have none. Those are not to be envied that have their portion in this life, and must outlive it, Ps. xvii. 12. (2) There is no continuance in it; their candle shines bright, but it shall presently be

...and a final period put to all their comfort, Job xxi. 17. Ps. xxxvii. 1, 2.

21. My son, fear thou the Lord and the king; and meddle not with them that are given to change: 22. For their calamity shall rise suddenly; and who knoweth the ruin of them both? Note, 1. Religion and loyalty must go together. As men, it is our duty to honour our Creator, to worship and reverence him, and to be always in his fear; as members of a community, incorporated for mutual benefit, it is our duty to be faithful and dutiful to the government God has set over us, Rom. xiii. 1, 2. Those that are truly religious will be loyal in conscience towards God; the godly in the land will be the quiet in the land; and those are not truly loyal, or will be so no longer than is for their interest, that are not religious. How should he be true to his prince, that is false to his God? And if they come in competition, it is an adjudged case; we must obey God rather than men. 2. Innovations in both are to be dreaded. Have nothing to do, he does not say, with them that change, for there may be cause to change for the better, but that are given to change, that affect it for change-sake, out of a peevish discontent with that which is, and a fondness for novelty, or a desire to fish in troubled waters; Meddle not with them that are given to change, either in religion, as in the civil government, come not into their secret, join not with them in their cabals, nor enter into the mystery of their iniquity. 3. Those that are of restless, factional, turbulent, spirits, commonly pull mischief upon their own heads, ere they are aware; Their calamity shall rise suddenly. Though they carry on their designs with the utmost secrecy, they will be discovered, and brought to condign punishment, when they little think of it. Who knows the time and manner on the rain which both God and the king will bring on their contemners, both on them and them that meddle with them?

23. These things also belong to the wise. It is not good to have respect of persons in judgment. 24. He that saith unto the wicked, Thou art righteous; him shall the people curse, nations shall abhor him: 25. But to them that rebuke him shall be delight, and a good blessing shall come upon them. 26. Every man shall kiss his lips that giveth a right answer. Here are lessons for wise men, judges, and princes. As subjects must do their duty, and be obedient to magistrates, so magistrates must do their duty in administering justice to their subjects, both in plas of the crown, and causes between party and party. These are lessons for them. 1. They must always weigh the merits of a cause, and not be swayed by any regard, one way or other, to parties concerned; It is not good in itself, nor can it ever do well, to have respect of persons in judgment; the consequences of it cannot but be the perverting of justice, and doing wrong, under colour of law and equity. A good judge will know the truth, not know faces, so as to countenance a friend, and help him out in a bad cause, or so much as omit any thing that can be said or done in favour of a righteous cause, when it is the cause of an enemy. 2. They must never connive at, or encourage, wicked people in their wicked practices. Magistrates in their places, and ministers in theirs, are to deal faithfully with the wicked man, though he be a great man, or a particular friend; to convict him of his wickedness, to show him what will be in the end thereof, to discover him to others, that they may avoid him. But if those whose office it is thus to show people their transgressions, palliate them, and connive at them; if they excuse the wicked man, much more if they prefer him and associate with him, which is, in effect, to say, Thou art righteous, they shall justly be looked upon as enemies to the public peace and welfare, which they ought to advance, and the people shall curse them, and cry out shame on them; and even those of other nations shall abhor them, as base betrayers of their trust. 3. They must discountenance, and give check to, all fraud, violence, injustice, and immorality; and though thereby they may disoblige a particular person, yet they will recommend themselves to the fame of God and man. Let magistrates and ministers, and private persons too, that are capable of doing it, rebuke the wicked, that they may bring them to repentance, or put them to shame, and they shall have the comfort of it in their own bosoms: to them shall be delight; when their consciences witness for them that they have been witnesses for God; and a good blessing shall come upon them, the blessing of God and good men; they shall be deemed righteous patriots, and their country's patriots. See ch. xxxviii. 23. 4. They must always give judgment according to equity; (v. 26.) they must give a right answer, give their opinion, and pass sentence, according to law and the true merits of the cause; and every one shall kiss his lips that doeth so, shall love and honour him, and be subject to his orders, for there is a kiss of allegiance as well as of affection. He that in common conversation likewise speaks pertinent and with sincerity, recommends him to his company, and is beloved and respected by all.

27. Prepare thy work without, and make it fit for thyself in the field; and afterwards build thy house. This is a rule of prudence in the management of household affairs; for all good men should be good husbands, and manage with discretion, which would prevent a great deal of sin, and trouble, and disgrace to their profession. 1. We must prefer necessaries before conveniencies, and not lay that out for show, which should be expended for the support of the family. We must be content with a mean cottage for a habitation, rather than want, or go in debt for, food convenient. 2. We must not think of building till we can afford it; "First apply thyself to thy work without in the field, let thy ground be put into good order, look after thy husbandry, for that is it by which thou must get; and when thou hast got well by that, then, and not till then, thou mayest think of re-building and beautifying thy house, for that is it upon which, and in which, thou wilt have occasion to spend." Many have ruined their estates and families by laying out money on that which brings nothing in, beginning to build, when they were not able to finish. Some understand it as advice to young men not to marry (for by that the house is built) till they have set up in the world, and get wherewith to maintain a wife and children comfortably. 3. When we have any great design on foot, it is wisdom to take it before us, and make the necessary preparations, before we fall to work, that, when it is begun, it may not stand still for want of materials. Solomon observed this rule himself in building the house of God; all was made ready before it was brought to the ground, 1 Kings vi. 7.

28. Be not a witness against thy neighbour without cause; and deceive not with thy lips. 29. Say not, I will do so to him as he hath done to me; I will render to the man according to his work.

We are here forbidden to be in any thing injurious to our neighbour, particularly in and by the forms of law; either, 1. As a witness; “Never bear a testimony against any man without cause, unless what thou sayest thou knowest to be punctually true, and thou hast a clear call to testify it. Never bear a testimony against any one;” for it follows, “Deceive not with thy lips; deceive not thy judge and jury, deceive not those whom thou conversest with into an ill opinion of thy neighbour. When thou speakest of thy neighbour, do not only speak that which is true, but take heed, lest in the manner of thy speaking thou insinuate any thing that is otherwise, and so should deceive by ineffable or hyperbole.

Or, 2. As a plaintiff or prosecutor. If there be occasion to bring an action or information against thy neighbour, let it not be from a spirit of revenge; Say not, I am resolved I will meet with him, I will do so to him as he has done to me; even a righteous cause becomes unrighteous, when it is thus prosecuted with malice. Say not, I will render to the man according to his work; and make him pay dear for it; for it is God’s prerogative to do so, and we must leave it to him, and not step into his token or take his work out of his hands. If it will needs be our own carvers, and judges in our own cause, we forfeit the benefit of an appeal to God’s tribunal; therefore we must not avenge ourselves, because he has said, "Vengeance is mine.

30. I went by the field of the slothful, and by the vineyard of the man void of understanding; 31. And, lo, it was all grown over with thorns, and nettles had covered the face thereof, and the stone wall thereof was broken down. 32. Then I saw, and considered it well; I looked upon it, and received instruction. 33. Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep: 34. So shall thy poverty come as one that travelleth; and thy want as an armed man.

Here is, 1. The view which Solomon took of the field and vineyard of the slothful man. He did not go on purpose to see it, but, as he passed by, observed the fruitfulness of the ground, as it is very proper for travelling to do, and his subjects’ management of their land, as it is very proper for magistrates to do, he cast his eye upon a field, and a vineyard, unlike all the rest; for though the soil was good, yet there was nothing growing in them but thorns and nettles; not here and there one, but they were all overrun with weeds; and if there had been any fruit, it would have been eaten up by the beasts, for there was no fence, the stone wall was broken down. See the effects of that curse upon the ground, (Gen. iii. 18.) “Thorns and thistles shall it bring forth unto thee, and nothing else, unless thou take pains with it.” See what a blessing to the world the husbandman’s calling is, and what a wilderness this earth, even Canaan itself, would be without it. The king himself is served of the field, but he would be ill served, if God did not teach the husbandman discretion and diligence to rid the ground, plant it, sow it, and fence it. See what a great difference there is between some and others in the management even of their worldly affairs, and how little some consult their reputation, not caring though they proclaim their slothfulness, in the manifold effects of it, to all that pass by, shamed by their neighbour’s diligence.

The questions which he made upon it. He paused little, and considered it, looked again upon it, and received instruction. He did not break out into any passionate censures of the owner, did not call him any ill names, but he endeavoured himself to get good by the observation, and to be quickened by it to diligence. Note, These that are to give instruction to others, must receive instruction themselves; and instruction must be received, not only from what we read and hear, but from what we see. Not only what we see of the works of God, but from what we see of the manners of men; not only from men’s good manners, but from their evil manners. Plutarch relates a saying of Cato Major, That wise men profit more by fools than fools by wise men; for wise men will avoid the faults of fools, but fools will not imitate the virtues of wise men. Solomon reckoned that he received instruction by this sight, though it did not suggest to him any new notion or lesson, but only put him in mind of the service that himself had rendered, of the ridiculous folly of the sluggard, who, when he has needful work to do, lies dozing in bed, and cries, Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, and still it will be a little more, till he has slept his eyes out, and, instead of being fitted by sleep for business, as wise men are, he is dullest, and stupidest, and made good for nothing. Hence, certain misery attends him; his poverty comes as one that travelleth, it is constantly coming nearer and nearer to him, and will be upon him speedily, and want seizeth him as irresistibly as an armed man, a highwayman that will strip him of all he has.

Now this is applicable, not only to our worldly business, to show what a scandalous thing slothful ness in that is, and how injurious to the family, but to the affairs of our souls. Note, (1.) Our souls are our fields and vineyards, which we are every one of us to take care of, to dress, and to keep. They are capable of being improved with good husbandry; that may be got out of them which will be fruit abounding to our account. We are charged with them, to occupy them till our Lord come; and a great deal of care and pains it is requisite that we should take about them. (2.) These fields and vineyards are often in a very bad state; not only fruit brought, but all overgrown with thorns and nettles, scratching, stinging, inordinate lusts and passions, pride, covetousness, sensuality, uncleanness, these are the thorns and nettles, the wild grapes, which the unsanctified heart produces; no guard kept against the enemy, but the stone wall broken down; all lies in common, all exposed. (3.) Where it is thus, it is owing to the sinner’s own slothfulness and folly; he is a sluggard, loves sleep, hates labour, and he is void of understanding, understands neither his business nor his interest; he is perfectly besotted. (4.) The issue of it will certainly be the ruin of the soul, and all its welfare. It is everlasting want that thus comes upon it as an armed man. We know the place assigned to the wicked and slothful servant.

CHAP. XXV.

1. THESE are also proverbs of Solomon, which the men of Hezekiah, king of Judah, copied out.

This verse is the title of this latter collection of Solomon’s proverbs, for he sought out, and set in order, many proverbs, that by them he might be still teaching the people knowledge, Ecc. xii. 9. Observe,
1. The proverbs were Solomon's, who was divinely inspired to deliver, for the use of the church, these wise and weighty sentences. We have had many, but still there are more; yet, herein also, Christ is greater than Solomon, for, if we had all upon record that Christ said and did, that was instructive, the world could not contain the books that should be written. (Luke xix. 41.)

2. The publishers were Hezekiah's servants, who, it is likely, here acted as his servants, being appointed by him to do this good service to the church, among other good offices that he did in the law and in the commandments, 2 Chron. xxxv. 21. Whether he employed the prophets in this work, as Isaiah, Hosea, or Micah, who lived in his time, or some that were trained up in the schools of the prophets, or some of the priests and Levites, to whom we find him giving a charge concerning divine things, (2 Chron. xxix. 4.) or as the Jews think) his princes and ministers of state, who were more properly called his servants, is not certain; if it was done by Eliakim, and Joach, and Shebna, it was no diminution to their character. They copied out these proverbs from the records of Solomon's reign, and published them as an appendix to the former edition of his book, as a public and religious service to the church, to publish other men's works have lain hid in obscurity, perhaps a great while. Some think they culled these out of the 3000 proverbs which Solomon spake, (1 Kings iv. 32.) leaving out those that were physical, and that pertain to natural philosophy, and preserving such only as were divine and moral; and in this collection some observe that special regard was had to theervations which concern kings and their administration.

2. It is the glory of God to conceal a thing; but the honour of kings is to search out a matter. 3. The heaven for height, and the earth for depth, and the heart of kings is unsearchable.

Here is 1. An instance given of the honour of God; It is his glory to conceal a matter. He needs not search into any thing, for he perfectly knows every thing by a clear and certain view, and nothing can be hid from him; and yet his own way is in the sea, and his path in the great waters. There is an unfathomable depth in his counsels, Rom. xi. 33. It is but a little portion that is heard of him. Clouds and darkness are round about him. We see what he does, but we know not the reasons. Some refer it to the sins of men; it is his glory to be hidden, which is covering it, not remembering it, not mentioning it; his forbearance, which he exercises toward sinners, is likewise his honour, in which he seems to keep silence, and take no notice of the matter.

2. A double instance of the honour of kings. (1.) It is God's glory that he needs not search into a matter. because he knows it without search; but it is the honour of kings, with a close application of mind, and by all the methods of inquiry, to search out the matters that are brought before them, to take pains in examining offenders, that they may discover their designs, and bring to light the hidden works of darkness; not to give judgment till they have weighed things; nor to leave it wholly to others to examine things, but to see with their own eyes. (2.) It is God's glory that he cannot himself be found out by searching, and some of that honour is devolved upon kings, wise kings, that search out matters; their hearts are unsearchable, like the height of heaven, or the depth of the earth, which we may guess at, but cannot measure. Princes have their arcana imperii—state secrets, designs which are kept private, and reasons of state, which private persons are not competent judges of, and therefore ought not to pry into. Wise princes, when they search into a matter, have reaches which one would not think of, as Solomon, when he called for a sword to divide the living child with, designing thereby to discover the true mother.

4. Take away the dross from the silver, and there shall come forth a vessel for the finer. 5. Take away the wicked from before the king, and his throne shall be established in righteousness.

This shows that the vigorous endeavours of a prince to suppress vice, and reform the manners of his people, is the most effectual way to support his government. Observe, 1. What the duty of magistrates is: To take away the wicked, to use their power for the terror of evil works and evil workers, not only to banish those that are vicious and profane from their presence, and forbid them the court, but so to frighten them and restrain them, that they may not spread the infection of their wickedness among their subjects. This is called taking away the dross from the silver, which is done by the force of fire. Wicked people are the dross of a nation, the scum of the country, and, as such, to be taken away. If men will not do it, God will, Ps. cix. 119. If the wicked be taken away from before the king, if he abandon them, and show his detestation of their wicked courses, it will go far toward the disabling of them to do mischief. The reformation of the court will promote the reformation of the kingdom, Ps. cl. 6. It is the advantage will be of their doing this duty. (1.) It will be the bettering of the subjects; they shall be made like silver refined, fit to be made vessels of honour. (2.) It will be the settling of the prince; his throne shall be established in this righteousness; for God will bless his government, the people will be pliable to it, and so it will become durable.

6. Put not forth thyself in the presence of the king, and stand not in the place of great men: 7. For better it is that it be said unto thee, Come up hither, than that thou shouldest be put lower in the presence of the prince whom thine eyes have seen.

Here we see, 1. That religion is so far from destroying good manners, that it teaches us to behave ourselves lowly and reverently towards our superiors, to keep our distance, and give place to those to whom it belongs; "Put not forth thyself rudely and carelessly in the king's presence, or in the presence of great men; do not compare with them; (so some understand it;) "do not vie with them in apparel, furniture, gardens, house-keeping, or residence, for that is an affront to them, and will waste thine own estate." 2. That religion teaches us humility and self-denial, which is a better lesson than that of good manners; "Deny thyself the place thou art entitled to, covet not to make a fair show, nor aim at preference, nor thrust thyself into the company of those that are above thee; be content in a low sphere, if that is it which God has allotted to thee." The reason he gives, is, because this is really the way to advancement, as our Saviour shows in a parable that seems to be borrowed from this, Luke xiv. 9. Not that we must therefore pretend modesty and humility, and make a stratagem of it, for the court
8. Go not hastily to strive, lest thou know not what to do in the end thereof, when thy neighbour hath put thee to shame.

9. Debate thy cause with thy neighbour himself; and discover not a secret to another;

10. Lest he that heareth it put thee to shame, and thine infamy turn not away.

Here is good counsel given about going to law:

1. "Be not hasty in bringing an action, before thou hast thyself considered it, and consulted with thy friends about it; Go not hastily to strive, do not send for a writ in a passion, or upon the first appearance of right on thy side, but weigh the matter deliberately, because we are apt to be partial in our own cause; consider the certainty of the expenses, and the uncertainty of the success, how much care and vexation it will be the occasion of, and, after all, the cause may go against thee; surely then thou shouldst not go hastily to strive."

2. "Bring not an action before thou hast tried to end the matter amicably; (v. 9.) Debate thy cause with thy neighbour privately, and perhaps you will understand one another better, and see that there is no occasion to go to law." In public quarrels, the war that must at length end, might better have been prevented by a treaty of peace, and a great deal of blood and treasure spared. It is so in private quarrels; "Sue not thy neighbour as a heathen man and a judean, until thou hast told him his fault between thee and him alone, and he has refused to refer the matter, or to come to an accommodation. Perhaps the matter in variance is a secret, not fit to be divulged to any, much less be to be brought upon the stage before the country; and therefore end it privately, that it may not be discovered." Reveal not the secret of another, so some read it. "Do not in revenge, to disgrace thine adversary, disclose that which should be kept private, and which does not at all belong to the cause."

Two reasons he gives why we should be thus cautious in going to law; (1.) "Because otherwise the cause will be in danger to go against thee, and thou wilt not know what to do, when the defendant has justified himself in what thou didst charge upon him, and made it out that thy complaint was frivolous and vexatious, and that thou hadst no just cause of action, and so put thee to shame, nonsuit thee, and force thee to pay costs; all which might have been prevented by a little consideration." (2.) "Because it will turn very much to thy reproach, if thou findest the character of thy cause, not only the defendant himself, (v. 8.) but he that hears the cause tried, will put thee to shame, will expose thee as a man of no principle, and thine infamy will not turn away, thou wilt never retrieve thy reputation."

11. A word fully spoken is like apples of gold in pictures of silver. 12. As an ear ing of gold, and an ornament of fine gold, so is a wise reprover upon an obedient ear.

Solomon here shows how much it becomes a man,

1. To speak pertinently; A word upon the wheels, that runs well, is well circumstanced in proper time and place, instruction, advice, or comfort, given seasonably, and in apt expressions, adapted to the case of the person spoken to, and agreeing with the character of the person speaking, is like golden balls resembling apples, or true apples of a golden colour, (golden repects,) or perhaps gilded, as sometimes we have gilded laurels, and those besossed in pictures of silver, or rather, brought to a table in a silver network basket, or in a silver box of that which we call, fit gree-work, through which the golden apples might be seen. Doubtless it was some ornament of the table then well known. As that was very pleasing to the eye, so is a word fitting spoken to the ear.

Especially give a reprover with discretion, and so as to make it acceptable. If it be well given by a wise reprover, and well taken by an obedient ear, it is an ear-ring of gold, and an ornament of fine gold, very graceful, and well-becoming both the reprover and the reproved; both will have their praise, the reprover for giving it so prudently, and the reproved for taking it so patiently, and making a good use of it. Others will commend them both, and they will have satisfaction in each other; he who gave the reprove is pleased that it had the desired effect, and he to whom it was given has reason to be thankful for it as a kindness. That is well given, we say, that is well taken; yet it does not always prove that that is well taken which is well given. It were to be wished that a wise reprover should always meet with an obedient ear, but often it is not so.

13. As the cold of snow in the time of harvest, so is a faithful messenger to them that send him; for he refresheth the soul of his masters.

See here, 1. What ought to be the care of a servant, the meanest that is sent on an errand, and intrusted with any business, much more the greatest, the agent and ambassador of a prince; he ought to be faithful to him that sends him, and to see to it that he do not, by mistake or with design, falsify his trust, and that he be in nothing, that lies in his power, wanting to his master's interest. Those that are as far as possible removed from their commission, ought to act as carefully as for themselves.

2. How much this will be the satisfaction of the master; it will refresh his soul, as much as ever the cold of snow (which in hot countries they preserve by art all the year round) refreshed the labourers in the harvest, that bore the burthen and heat of the day. The more important the affair was, and the more fear of its miscarrying, the more acceptable is the messenger, if he have managed it successfully and well. A faithful minister, Christ's messenger, should be thus acceptable to us; (Job xxxiii. 23.) however, he will be a sweet savour to God, 2 Cor. ii. 16.

14. Whoso bounteth himself of a false gift is like clouds and wind without rain.

He may be said to boast of a false gift,

1. Who pretends to have received or given that which he never had, which he never gave; makes a noise of his great accomplishments, and his good services, but it is all false; he is not what he pretends to be. Or,

2. Who promises what he will give, and what he will do, but performs nothing; who raises people's expectations of the mighty things he will do for his country, for his friends, what noble legacies he will leave, but either he has not wherewithal, or he never designs it. Such a one is like the morning cloud, that passes away, and disappoints those who looked for rain from it to water the parched ground; (Jude 12.) Clouds without water.

15 By long forbearing is a prince persuaded, and a soft tongue breaketh the bone. Two things are here recommended to us, in dealing with others, as likely means to gain our point:
1. Patience, to bear a present heat without being put into a heat by it, and to wait for a fit opportunity to offer our reasons, and to give persons time to consider them. By this means even a prince may be persuaded to do a thing which he seemed very averse to, much more a common person. That which is justice and reason now will be so another time, and therefore we need not urge them with violence now, but wait for a more convenient season. This is, as our Saviour speaks, “wait upon the Lord,” Ps. 27. 14.

2. A soft tongue breaketh the bone; it mollifies the roughest spirits, and overcomes those that are most morose; like lightning, which, they say, sometimes has broken the bone, and yet not pierced the flesh. Gideon with a soft tongue pacified the Ephraimites, and Abigail turned away David’s wrath. Hard words, we say, break no bones, and therefore we should bear them patiently; but, it seems, soft words do, and therefore we should, on all occasions, give them prudently.

16. Hast thou found honey? eat so much as is sufficient for thee, lest thou be filled therewith, and vomit it. Here, 1. We are allowed a sober and moderate use of the delights of sense; “Hast thou found honey? It is not forbidden fruit to thee, as it was to Jonathan; thou mayest eat of it with thanksgiving to God, who, having created things grateful to our senses, has given us leave to make use of them. Eat as much as is sufficient, and no more; enough is as good as a feast.”

2. We are cautioned to take heed of excess. We must use all pleasure as we do honey, with a check upon our appetite, lest we take more than does us good, and make ourselves sick with it. We are most in danger of surfeiting upon that which is most sweet, and therefore those that fare sumptuously every day have need to watch over themselves, lest their hearts be at any time overcharged. The pleasures of sense lose their sweetness by the excessiveness of them; as honey, which turns sour in the stomach; it is therefore our interest, as well as our duty, to use them with sobriety.

17. Withdraw thy foot from thy neighbour’s house; lest he be weary of thee, and so hate thee.

Here he mentions another pleasure which we must not take too much of, that of visiting our friends; the former, for fear of surfeiting ourselves, this, for fear of surfeiting our neighbour.

1. It is a piece of civility to visit our neighbours sometimes, to show our respect to them and concern for them, and to cultivate and improve mutual acquaintance and love, and that we may have both the satisfaction and advantage of their conversation.

2. It is wisdom, as well as good manners, not to be troublesome to our friends in our visiting of them; not to visit too often, nor stay too long, nor contrive to come at meal-time, nor make ourselves busy in the affairs of their families; hereby we make ourselves neither welcome, nor welcome, but and become nauseous, to the neighbour, who, if thus plagued and haunted with thy visits, will be weary of thee, and hate thee, and that will be the destruction of friendship, which should have been the improvement of it. Post triste suae dies, finitas vises et hostes.—After the third day, fish and company became distasteful. Familiarity breeds contempt. Nulli te facias nimis solitatem.—Be not too intimate with any. He that spungen upons his friends lessen him. How much better a Friend then is God than any other friend; for we need not withdraw our foot from his house, the throne of his grace; (ch. viii. 34.) the oftener we come to him the better, and the more welcome.

18. A man that beareth false witness against his neighbour is a mail, and a sword, and a sharp arrow.

Here, 1. The sin condemned, is, bearing false witness against our neighbour, either in judgment, or in common conversation, contrary to the law of the tenth commandment.

2. That which it is he condemned for, is, the mischieflessness of it; it is in its power to ruin not only men’s reputation, but their lives, estates, families, all that is dear to them; a false testimony is everything that is dangerous, it is a mal ad club to knock a man’s brains out, a faif, which there is no fence against; it is a sword to wound near at hand, and a sharp arrow to wound at a distance; we have therefore need to pray, “Lord deliver my soul, O Lord, from lying lips, Ps. cxvi. 2.

19. Confidence in an unfaithful man in time of trouble is like a broken tooth, and a foot out of joint. 1. The confidence of an unfaithful man (so some read it) will be like a broken tooth; his policy, his power, his interest, all that which he trusted in to support him in his wickedness, will fail him in time of trouble, Ps. lii. 7.

2. Confidence in an unfaithful man, so we read it; in a man whom we thought trusty, and therefore depended on, but who proves otherwise; it proves not only unserviceable, but painful and vexatious, like a broken tooth, or a foot out of joint, which, when we put any stress upon it, not only fails us, but makes us feel from it; especially in time of trouble, when we most expect help from it; it is like a broken reed, Isa. xxxvi. 6. Confidence in a faithful God, in time of trouble, will not prove thus; on him we may rest, and in him dwell at ease.

20. As he that taketh away a garment in cold weather, and as vinegar upon nitre; so is he that singeth songs to a heavy heart.

1. The absurdity here censured, is singing songs to a heavy heart. Those that are in great sorrow are to be comforted by sympathising with them, condoling with them, and concurring in their lamentation: if we take that method, the moving of our lips may assuage their grief; (Job xvi. 5.) but we take a wrong course with them, if we think to relieve them by being merry with them, and endeavouring to make them merry; for it adds to their grief, to see their friends so little concerned for them; it puts them upon rising up the causes of their grief, and aggravating them, and makes them harden themselves in sorrow against the assaults of mirth.

2. The absurdities this is compared to, are, taking away a garment from a man in cold weather, which makes him colder, or pouring vinegar upon nitre, which, like water upon lime, puts it into a ferment; so improper, so incongruous, is it to sing pleasant songs to one that is of a sorrowful spirit. Some wait it in a contrary sense; As he that puts on a garment in cold weather warms the body, or as vinegar upon nitre dissolves it, so he that sings songs of comfort to a person in sorrow refreshes him, and dispels his grief.
21. If thine enemy be hungry, give him bread to eat; and if he be thirsty, give him water to drink: 22. For thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head, and the Lord shall reward thee.

By this it appears, that, however the scribes and Pharisees had corrupted the law, not only the commandment of loving our brethren, but even that of loving our enemies, was not only a new, but an old, commandment; an Old Testament law, which our Saviour has given us with the new enforcement of his own great example in loving us when we were enemies. Observe, 1. How we must express our love to our enemies; by the real offices of kindness, even those that are expensive to ourselves, and most acceptable to them; "If they be hungry and thirsty, instead of pleasing thyself with their distress, and contriving how to cut off supplies from them, relieve them, as Elias did the Syrians that came to apprehend him," 2 Kings vii. 23. 2. What encouragement we have to do so. (1.) It will be a likely means to win upon them, and bring them over to be reconciled to us; we shall mollify them as the refiner melts the metal in the crucible, not only by putting it over the fire, but by heaping coals of fire upon it. The way to turn an enemy into a friend, is, to act toward him in a friendly manner. If it do not gain him, it will aggravate his sin and punishment, and heap the burning coals of God's wrath upon his head, as rejoicing in his calamity may be an occasion of God's turning his wrath from him, ch. xxxiv. 17. (2.) However, we shall be no losers by our self-denial; "Whether he relent toward thee or no, the Lord shall reward thee; he shall forgive thee, who thus shewest thyself to be of a forgiving spirit; he shall provide for thee when thou art in distress, (though thou hast been evil and ungrateful,) as thou dost for thine enemy." However, it shall be recompensed in the resurrection of the just, when kindness done to our enemies shall be remembered, as well as those shown to God's friends.

23. The north wind driveth away rain; so doth an angry countenance a backbiting tongue.

Here see, 1. How we must discourage sin, and witness against it, and particularly the sin of slandering and backbiting, we must frown upon it, and, by giving it an angry countenance, endeavour to put it out of countenance. Slanders would not be so readily spoken as they are, if they were not readily heard; but good manners would silence the slanderer, if he knew that his tales displeased the company. We should show ourselves uneasy, if we heard a dear friend, whom we value, evil-spoken of; the same dislike we should shew of evil speaking in general. If we cannot otherwise reprove, we may do it by our looks. 2. The good effect which this might, probably, have; who knows but it may silence and drive away a backbiting tongue? Sin, if it be countenanced, becomes daring, but if it receive an check, it is so conscious of this shame, that it becomes cowardly, and this particularly; for many abuse those they speak of, only in hopes to curry favour with those they speak to.

24. It is better to dwell in a corner of the house-top, than with a brawling woman, and in a wide house.

This is the same with what he had said, ch. xxi. 9. Observe, 1. How these are to be pitied that are unequally yoked, especially with such as are brawling and contentious, whether husband or wife; for it is equally true of both. It is better to be alone than to be joined to one, who, instead of being a meet help, is a great bindrance to the comfort of life. 2. How those may sometimes be envied that live in solitude; as they want the comfort of society, so they are free from the vexation of it. And as there are cases which give occasion to say, "Blessed is the womb that has not borne," so there are which give occasion to say, "Blessed is the man who was never married, but who lives like a servant in a corner of the house-top." 25. As cold waters to a thirsty soul, so is good news from a far country.

See here, 1. How natural it is to us to desire to hear good news from our friends, and concerning our affairs at a distance. It is sometimes with impatience that we expect to hear from abroad, our souls thirst after it: but we should check the inordinateness of that desire; if it be bad news, it will come too soon, if good, it will be welcome at any time. 2. How acceptable such good news will be when it does come, as refreshing as cold water to one that is thirsty. Solomon himself had much trading abroad, as well as correspondence by his ambassadors with foreign courts; and how pleasant it was to hear of the good success of his negotiations abroad, he well knew by experience. Heaven is a country afar off; how refreshing is it to hear good news from thence, both in the everlasting gospel, which signifies glad tidings, and in the witness of the Spirit with our spirits that we are God's children.

26. A righteous man falling down before the wicked, is as a troubled fountain and a corrupt spring.

It is here represented as a very lamentable thing, and a public grievance, and of ill consequence to many, like the troubling of a fountain, and the corrupting of a spring, for the righteous to fall down before the wicked; that is, 1. For the righteous to fall into sin, in the sight of the wicked, for to do any thing unbecoming their profession, which is told in Gash, and published in the streets of Askelon, and in which the letters of the Philistines rejoice; for them that have been in reputation for wisdom and honour, to fall from their excellency, this troubles the fountain by grieving some, and corrupts the springs by infecting others, and emboldening them to do likewise. 2. For the righteous to be oppressed, and run down, and trampled upon, by the violence or subtly of evil men, to be displeased, and thrust into obscurity, this is the troubling of the fountains of justice, and corrupting the very springs of government, ch. xxviii. 12, 28.—xxix. 2. 3. For the righteous to be cowardly, to truckle to the wicked, to be afraid of opposing his wickedness, and basely to yield to him, this is a reflection upon religion, a discouragement to good men, and strengthens the hands of sinners in their sins, and so is like a troubled fountain, and a corrupt spring.

27. It is not good to eat much honey; sc for men to search their own glory is not glory.

Two things we must be graciously dead to: 1. To the pleasures of sense, for it is not good to eat much honey, though it pleases the taste, and, if eaten with moderation, is very wholesome, yet, if eaten to excess, it becomes nauseous, creates bile, and is the occasion of many diseases; it is true of all the delights of the children of men, that they will surfeit, but never satisfy, and they dangerous to those that allow themselves the liberal use of them. 2. To the praise of men. We must not be greedy of that, any more than of pleasure, because, for men to search their own glory, to court applause, and covet to make themselves popular, is not their glory, but their shame, every one will seek for them, but the glory which is so courted, when it is got, is not glory, it is really no true honour to a man.

Some give another sense of this verse; To eat much honey is not good, but to search into glorious and excellent things is a great commendation, it is true glory; we cannot therein offend by excess. Others thus; As honey, though pleasant to the taste, if used immediately, oppresseth the stomach, so also every man search into things sublime and glorious, though pleasant to us, if we pry too far, will overwhelm our capacities with a greater glory and lustre than they can bear. Or thus; “You may be surfeited with eating too much honey, but the last of glory, of their glory, the glory of the blessed, is glory, it will be ever fresh, and never pall the appetite.”

28. He that hath no rule over his own spirit is like a city that is broken down, and without walls.

Here is, 1. The good character of a wise and virtuous man implied; he is one that has rule over his own spirit; he governs the government of hisself, and of his own appetites and passions, and does not suffer them to rebel against reason and conscience. He has the rule of his own thoughts, his desires, his inclinations, his resentments, and keeps them all in good order.

2. The bad case of a vicious man, who has not this rule over his own spirit, who, when temptations to excess in eating or drinking are before him, has no government of himself, when he is provoked, brakes out into exorbitant passions, such a one is like a city that is broken down, and without walls; all that is good goes out, and forsakes him, all that is evil breaks in upon him; he lies exposed to all the temptations of Satan, and becomes an easy prey to that enemy; he is also liable to many troubles and vexations; it is likewise as much a reproach to him as it is to a city to have its walls ruined, Neh. i. 3.

CHAP. XXVI.

1. As snow in summer, and as rain in harvest; so honour is not seemly for a fool.

Note, 1. It is too common a thing for honour to be given to fools, who are utterly unworthy of it, and unfit for it; bad men, who have neither wit nor grace, are sometimes preferred by princes, and applauded and cried up by the people. Folly is set for a richly dressed, a seat of very high honour, xli. 2.

2. It is very absurd and unbecoming when it is so.
It is as incongruous as snow in summer, and as great a disorder in the commonwealth as that is in the course of nature and in the seasons of the year; nay, it is as injurious as rain in harvest, which hinders the labourers, and spoils the fruits of the earth when they are ready to be gathered. When bad men are in power, they commonly abuse their power; in discouraging virtue, and giving countenance to wickedness, for want of wisdom to discern it, and grace to detest it.

2. As the bird by wandering, as the swallow by flying; so the curse causeless shall not come.

Here is, 1. The folly of passion; it makes men scatter causeless curses; wishing ill to others, upon presumption that they are bad, and have done ill, when either they mistake the person, or misunderstand the fact, or call evil good, and good evil. Give honour to a fool, and he thunders out his anathemas against all that he is disgusted with, right or wrong.
Great men, when wicked, think they have a privilege to keep those about them in awe, by cursing them, and swearing at them; which yet is an expression of the most impotent malice, and shows their weakness as much as their wickedness.

2. The safety of innocency. He that is cursed without cause, whether by furious imprecatings or solemn anathemas, the curse shall do him no more harm than the bird that flies over his head, than Saul’s curse on David, i. 19. It will fly away like the sparrow or the wild dove, which go nobody knows whither, till they return unto their proper place, as the curse will at length return on the head of him that uttered it.

3. A whip for the horse, a bridle for the ass, and a rod for the fool’s back.

Here, 1. Wicked men are compared to the horse and the ass; so brutish are they, so unreasonably, and not to be governed but by force or fear;
so low has sin sunk men, so much below themselves!
Men indeed are born like the child’s ass; but as some, by the grace of God, are changed, and become rational, so others, by custom in sin are hardened, and become more and more sottish, as the horse and the mule, Ps. xxxii. 9.

2. Direction is given to use them accordingly; Princes, instead of giving honour to a fool, (v. 1.)
must put disgrace upon him; instead of putting power into his hand, must exercise power over him. A horse unbrowed needs a whip, for correction, and an ass a bridle for direction, and to check him, when he would turn out of the way; so a vicious man, who will not be under the guidance and restraint of religion and reason, ought to be whipt and bridled, and be rebuked severely, and made to smart for what he has done amiss, and to be restrained from offending any more.

4. Answer not a fool according to his folly, lest thou also be like unto him. 5.
Answer a fool according to his folly, lest he be wise in his own conceit.

See here the noble security of the scripture-style, which seems to contradict itself, but really does not.
Wise men have need to be directed how to deal with fools; and they have never more need of wis-don than in dealing with such, to know when to keep silence, and when to speak, for there may be a time for both.

1. In some cases, a wise man will not set his wit that to a fool, so far as to answer him according to his folly. “If he boast of himself, do not answer him by boasting of thyself. If he rail and talk passionately, do not thou rail and talk passionately too. If he tell one great lie, do not thou tell another to match it. If he calumny thy friends, do not thou calumny his. If he banter, do not answer him in his own language, lest thou be like him; even thou, who knowest better things, who hast more sense, and hast been better taught.”

2. Yet, in other cases, a wise man will use his wisdom for the conviction of a fool; when, by taking notice of what he says, there may be hopes of doing good, or, at least, preventing further mischief, either to himself or others.

If thou have reason to think that thy silence will be deemed an evidence of the weakness of thy cause, or of thine own weakness, in such a case, answer him, and let it be an answe.

ad hominem—to the man, beat him at his own we-
6. He that sendeth a message by the hand of a fool, cuttest off the feet, and drinketh damage. 7. The legs of the lame are not equal; so is a parable in the mouth of fools. 8. As he that bindeth a stone in a sling; so is he that giveth honour to a fool.

9. As a thorn goeth up into the hand of a drunkard; so is a parable in the mouth of fools.

To recommend wisdom to us, and to quicken us to the diligent use of all the means for the getting of wisdom, Solomon here shows that fools are fit for nothing; they are either sottish men, who will never think and design at all, or vicious men, who will never think and design well.

1. They are not fit to be intrusted with any business, not fit to go on an errand; (v. 6.) He that doth send but a message by the hand of a fool, of a careless, heedless, slumbering, one who delighteth in his jests, and giveth to his pleasures, that he cannot apply his mind to anything that is serious, he will find his message misunderstood, the one half of it forgotten, the rest awkwardly delivered, and so many blunders made about it, that he had as well have cut off his legs, that is, never have sent him; nay, he will drink damage, it will be very much to his prejudice to have employed such a one, who, instead of bringing him a good account of his affairs, will abuse him, and put a trick upon him; for, in Solomon's language, a knife and a fool are of the same signification. It will turn much to a man's disgrace to make use of the service of a fool, for people will be apt to judge of the master by his messenger.

2. They are not fit to have any honour put upon them; he had said, (v. 1.) Honour is not seemly for a fool; here he shows that it is lost and thrown away upon him; as if a man should throw a precious stone, or a stone fit to be used in weighing, into a heap of common stones, where it would be buried, and of no use; it is as absurd as if a man should dress up a stone in jewels, so others; nay, it is dangerous, it is like a stone bound in a sling, with which a man will be likely to do hurt; to give honour to a fool, is to put a sword in a madman's hand, with which we know not what mischief he may do, even to those that put it into his hand.

3. They are not fit to deliver wise sayings, nor should be intrusted to manage matters of weight, though they should be instructed concerning it, and be able to say something to it. Wise sayings, as a foolish man delivers them, and applies them, (in such a manner, that one may know he does not rightly understand them,) lose their excellency and usefulness; A parable in the mouth of fools ceases to be a parable, and becomes a jest. If a man who lives a wicked life, yet speaks religiously, and takes God's covenant into his mouth, (1.) He does but shame himself and his profession; As the legs of the lame are not equal, by reason of which their going is unseemly, so unseemly is it for a fool to pretend to speak apothegms, and give advice, and for a man to talk devoutly, whose conversation is a constant contradiction to his talk, and gives him the lie. His good words raise him up, but then his bad life takes him down, and so his words are not equal. "A wise saying (says Bishop Patrick) doth as ill become a fool as dancing doth a cripple; for as his lameness never so much appears as when he would seem nimble, so the foolishness of the wise is never so ridiculous as when he would seem wise."

As therefore it is best for a lame man to keep his seat, so it is best for a silly man, and a bad man, to hold his tongue.

(2.) He does but do mischief with it to himself and others, as a drunkard does with a worm, or any other sharp thing which he takes in his hand, with which he tears himself and those about him, because he knows not how to manage it. Those that talk well, and do not live well, their good words will aggravate their own condemnation, and others will be hardened by their inconsistency with themselves. Some give this sense of it; The sharpest saying, by which a sinner, one would think, should be pricked to the heart, makes no more impression upon a fool, no, though it come out of his own mouth, than the scratch of a thorn does upon the hand of a man when he is drunk, who then feels it not, nor complains of it, ch. xxiii. 35.

10. The great God, that formed all things, both rewardeth the fool, and rewardeth transgressors.

Our translation gives this verse a different reading in the text, and in the margin; and accordingly it bespeaks, either,

1. The equity of a good God; The Master, or Lord, (so Rab signifies,) or, as we read it, The great God that formed all things at first, and still governs them in infinite wisdom, renders to every man according to his work. He rewards the fool, who sinneth through ignorance, who knew not his Lord's will, and few things; and the transgressor, who sins presumptuously, and with a high hand, who knew his Lord's will, and would not do it, with many stripes. Some understand it of the goodness of God's common providence, even to fools and transgressors, on whom he causes his sun to shine, and his rain to fall. Or it bespeaks,

2. The iniquity of a bad prince; so the margin reads it. A great man grieves all; and he hires the fool, he hires the transgressor, and the transgressor, who hires a wicked man gets power in his hand, by himself, and by the fools and knaves whom he employs under him, whom he hires and chooses to make use of, he grieves all who are under him, and is vexatious to them. We should therefore pray for kings, and all in authority, that, under them, our lives may be quiet and peaceable.

11. As a dog returneth to his vomit; so a fool returneth to his folly.

See here, 1. What an abominable thing sin is, and how hateful sometimes it is to appear, even to the sinner himself. When his conscience is convinced, or he feels smart from his sin, he is sick of it, and vomits it up; he seems then to detest it, and to be willing to part with it. It is in itself, and, first or last, will be to the sinner, more loathsome than the vomit of a dog, Ps. xxxvi. 2. 2. How apt sinners are to relapse into it notwithstanding; as the dog, after he has gained ease by vomiting that which burdened his stomach, yet goes and gorges himself again, so sinners, who have been convinced only, and not converted, return to sin again, forgetting how sick it made them. The Apostle applies this proverb to those that have known the way of righteousness, but are turned from it, (2 Pet. ii. 22.) but God will swear them out of his mouth, Rev. iii. 16.

12. Seest thou a man wise in his own conceit? there is more hope of a fool than of him.
Here is, 1. A spiritual disease supposed, and that is self-conceit. Sceat thou a man? Yes, we see many a one, wise in his own conceit; who has some little sense, but is proud of it, thinks it much more than it is, more than any of his neighbours have, and enough, so that he needs no more; has such a conceit of his own abilities as makes him opinionative, dogmatical, and censorious; and all the use he makes of it is, to puff himself up. Or, if by a wise man we understand a religious man, it describes the character of those who, making some show of religion, conclude their spiritual state to be good, when really it is very bad, like Laodicea, Rev. iii. 17.

2. The danger of this disease; it is in a manner desperate, there is more hope of a fool, that knows, and owns, himself to be such, than of such a one. Solomon was not only a wise man himself, but a teacher of wisdom; and this observation he made upon his pupils, that he found his work most difficult, and least successful, with those that had a good opinion of themselves, and were not sensible that they needed instruction. Therefore he that seems to himself to be wise, must become a fool, that he may be wise, 1 Cor. iii. 18. There is more hope of a publican than of a proud Pharisee, Matth. xxi. 28. Many are hindered from being truly wise, and religious, by false and groundless conceit that they are so, John ix. 40, 41.

13. The slothful man saith, There is a lion in the way, a lion is in the streets.

When a man talks foolishly, we say, He talks idly; for none betray their folly more than those who are idle, and about to excuse themselves in their idleness. As men’s folly makes them slothful, so their slothfulness makes them foolish. Observe,

1. What the slothful man really dredts; he dreads the way, the streets, the place, where work is to be done, and a journey to be gone; he hates business, hates everything that requires care and labour.

2. What he dreams of, and pretends to dread; a lion in the way. When he is pressed to be diligent, either in his worldly affairs, or in the business of religion, this is his excuse, (and a sorry excuse it is, as bad as none,) There is a lion in the way, some insuperable difficulty or danger which he cannot pretend to grapple with. Lions frequent woods and deserts; and, in the day-time, when man has business to do, they are in their dens, Ps. civ. 22, 23. But the sluggard fancies, or rather pretends to fancy, a lion in the streets, whereas the lion is only in his own fancy, nor is he so fierce as he is painted. Note, It is a foolish thing to frighten ourselves from real duties by fancied difficulties, Eccl. xi. 4.

14. As the door turneth upon his hinges, so doth the slothful upon his bed.

Having seen the slothful man in fear of his work, here we find him in love with his ease; he lies in his bed on one side till he is weary of that, and then turns to the other, but still in his bed, when it is far in the day, and work is to be done; as the door is moved, but not removed; and so his business is neglected, and his opportunities let slip. See the sluggard’s character.

1. He is one that does not care to get out of his bed, but seems to be hung upon it, as the door upon the hinges. Bodily ease, too much consulted, is the sad occasion of many a spiritual disease. They that love sleep will prove in the end to have loved death.

2. He that does not care to get forward with his business, in that he stirs to and fro a little, but to no purpose, he is where he was. Slothful professors turn, in profession, like the door upon the hinges. The world and the flesh are the two hinges on which they are hung, and, though they move in a course of external services, are got into a road of duties, and tread around in them like the horse in the mill, yet they get no good, they get no ground, they are never the nearer heaven; sinners unchangeable, saints unimproved.

15. The slothful hides his hand in his bosom; it grieveth him to bring it again to his mouth.

The sluggard is now, with much ado, got out of his bed, but he might as good have lain there still, for anything he is likely to bring to pass in his work, so awkwardly does he go about it, nor is he such an one to be moved, as he was moved, for his slothfulness.

He hides his hand in his bosom, for fear of cold; next to his warm bed is his warm bosom; or, pretending that he is lame, as some do, that make a trade of begging; something ails his hand, he would have it thought that it is blistered with yesterday’s hard work; or, it speaks, in general, his aversion to business; he has tried, and his hands are not used to labour, and therefore he hugs himself in his own ease, to keep himself warm. This, it is common for those that will not do their duty, to pretend they cannot; I cannot dig, Luke xvi. 3.

2. The prejudice he sustains by his slothfulness; He himself is the loser by it, for he starves himself; it grieves him to bring his hand to his mouth, he cannot find in his heart to feed himself, but dreads, as if it were a mighty toil, to lift his hand to his head. It is an elegant hyperbole, aggravating his sin, that he cannot endure the labour of a little profit, and showing how his sin is his punishment. These that are slothful in the business of religion will not be at the pains to feed their own souls with the word of God, the bread of life, nor to fetch in promised blessings by prayer, though they might have them for the fetching.

16. The sluggard is wiser in his own conceit than seven men that can render a reason.

Observe, 1. The high opinion which the sluggard has of himself, notwithstanding the gross absurdity and folly of his slothfulness; He thinks himself wiser than seven men, than seven wise men, for they are such as can render a reason. It is the wisdom of a man to be able to render a reason; of a good man, to be able to give a reason of the hope that is in him, 1 Pet. iii. 15. What we do we should be able to render a reason for, though, perhaps, we may not have wit enough to show the fallacy of every objection against it. He that takes pains in religion can render a good reason for it; he knows that he is working for a good Master, and that his labour shall not be in vain. But the sluggard thinks himself wiser than seven such; for, let seven such persuade him to be diligent, with all the reasons they can render for it, it is to no purpose, his own determination, he thinks, answers enough to them and to his reasons.

2. The reference that this has to his slothfulness: It is the sluggard, above all men, that is thus self-conceited; for, (1.) His good opinion of himself is the cause of his slothfulness; therefore he will not take pains to get wisdom, because he thinks he is wise enough already. A conceit of the sufficiency of our attainments is a great enemy to our improvement. (2.) His slothfulness is the cause of his good opinion of himself. If he would but take pains to examine himself, and compare himself with the laws of wisdom, he would have other thoughts of himself. Indulged slothfulness is at the bottom of
17. He that passeth by, and meddles with strife belonging to him, is like one that taketh a dog by the ears.

1. That which is here condemned, is, meddling with strife that belongs to us. If we must not be hasty to strive in our own cause, (ch. xxv. 8.) much less in other people's, especially theirs that we are no way related to, or concerned in, but light on accidentally as we pass by. If we can be instrumental to make peace between those that are at variance, we must do it, though we should thereby receive the ill-will of both sides, at least, while they are in their heat; but to make ourselves busy in other men's matters, and parties in other men's quarrels, is not only to court our own trouble, but to thrust ourselves into temptation. Who made me a judge? Let them end it, as they began it, between themselves.

2. Therefore we are cautioned against it, because of the danger it exposes us to; it is like taking a snarling cur by the ears, that will snap at you, and bite you; you had better have let him alone, for you cannot get clear of him when you would, and must thank yourselves if you come off with a wound and dishonour. He that has got a dog by the ears, if he let him go, he flies at him, if he keeps his hold, he has his hands full, and can do nothing else. Let every one with quietness work, and mind his own business, and not with unquietness quarrel, and meddle with other people's business.

18. Asamad man who casteth fire-brands, arrows, and death. 19. So is the man that deceiveth his neighbour, and saith, Am not I in sport?

See here, 1. How mischievous those are that make no scruple of deceiving their neighbours, they are great mischievous men who cast fire-brands, arrows, and death; so much hurt may they do to their deceiving. They value themselves upon it, as politic, cunning, men, but really they are as mad men. There is not a greater madness in the world than a wilful sin. It is not only the passionate, furious, man, but the malicious, deceitful, man, that is a mad man; he does in effect cast fire-brands, arrows, and death; he does more mischief than he can imagine. Fraud and falsehood burn like fire-brands, kill, even at a distance, like arrows.

2. See how frivolous the excuse is which men commonly make for the mischief they do, that they did it in jest; with this they think to turn it off when they are reproved for it, Am not I in sport? But it will prove dangerous playing with fire, and jesting with edge-tools. Not that these are to be commended who are captious, and can take no jest, they that themselves are wise, must suffer fools, (2 Cor. vi. 19, 20.) but those are certainly to be condemned who are so impassive to their neighbours, impose upon their credulity, cheat them in their bargains with them, tell lies to them, or tell lies of them, give them ill language, or sully their reputation, and then think to excuse it by saying that they did but jest; Am not I in sport? He that sins in jest, must repent in earnest, or his sin will be his ruin. Truth is too valuable a thing to be sold for a jest, and so is the reputation of our neighbour.

19. Where no wood is, there is the fire goeth out; so where there is no tale-bearer, the strife ceaseth. 21. As coals are to burning coals, and wood to fire; so is a contentious man to kindle strife. 22. The words of a tale-bearer are as wounds, and they go down into the innermost parts of the belly.

Contention is as a fire, it heats the spirit, burns up all that is good, and puts families and societies into a flame. Now here we are told how that fire is commonly kindled and kept burning, that we may avoid the occasions of strife, and so prevent the mischievous consequences of it. If then we would keep the peace,

1. We must not give ear to tale-bearers, for they feed the fire of contention with fuel; nay, they spread it with combustible matter; the tales they carry are fire-balls; they who, by insinuating base characters, revealing secrets, and misrepresented words and actions, do what they can to make relations, friends, and neighbours, jealous one of another, to alienate them one from another, and sow discord among them, are to be banished out of families, and all societies, and then strife will as surely cease, as the fire will go out when it has no fuel; the contentious wildest heart will understand one another, and come to a better temper; old stories will soon be forgotten, when there are no new ones told to keep up the remembrance of them, and both sides will see how they have been imposed upon by a common enemy. Whisperers and backbiters are incendiaries not to be suffered.

To illustrate this, he repeats (v. 22.) what he has said before, (ch. xviii. 8.) that the words of a tale-bearer are as wounds, wounds in the vitals; they wound the reputation of him who is belied, and, perhaps, the wound proves incurable, and even the plaster of a recantation (which yet can seldom be obtained) may not prove wide enough for it; they wound the love and charity which he, to whom they are spoken, ought to have for his neighbour, and give a fatal stab to friendship and Christian fellowship. We must therefore not only not be tale-bearers ourselves at any time we ever do any ill offices, but we should not give the least countenance to those that are.

2. We must not associate with peevish, passionate, people, that are exceptions, and apt to put the worst constructions upon every thing, that pick quarrels upon every occasion, and are quick, and high, and hot, in resenting affronts; these are contentious men, that kindle strife, v. 21. The less we have to do with such, the better, for it will be very hard not to quarrel with those that are quarrellers.

23. Burning lips and a wicked heart are like a potsherd covered with silver dross. This may be meant, either,

1. Of a wicked heart showing itself in burning lips, furious, passionate, outrageous, words, burning in malice, and persecuting those to whom, or of whom, they are spoken; ill words and ill will agree as well together as a potsherd and the dress of silver, which, now that the pot is broken and the dress separated from the silver, are fit to be thrown together to the dunghill.

2. Or of a wicked heart disguising itself with burning lips, burning with the professions of love and friendship, and even persecuting a man with flatteries; this is like a fished cover'd with the scum of oil, with which one that is weak may be imposed upon, as if it were of some value, but a wise man is soon aware of the cheat. This sense agrees with the following verses.

24. He that hateth dissembleth with his lips, and layeth up deceit within him; 25. When he speaketh fair, believe him not: for there are seven abominations in his heart. 26. Whose hatred is covered by deceit, his wickedness shall be showed before the whole congregation.

There is cause to complain, not only of the want of sincerity in men's profession of friendship, and that they do not love so well as they pretend, nor will serve their friends so much as they promise, but, which is much worse, of wicked designs in the profession of friendship, and the making of it subservient to the most malicious intentions. This is here spoken of as a common thing; (v. 24.) He that hates his neighbour, and is contriving to do him a mischief, yet dissembleth with his lips, professes to have a respect for him, and to be ready to serve him, talks kindly with him, as Cain with Abel, asks, Art thou in health, my brother? as Job to Amasa, that his malice may not be suspected, and guarded against, and so he may have the fairer opportunity to execute the purposes of it, this man fakes with deceit within him, he keeps in his mind the mischief he intends to do his neighbour, till he catches him at an advantage. This is malice which has no less of the subtility, than it has of the venom, of the old serpent in it.

Now, as to this matter, we are here cautioned,

1. Not to be so foolish as to suffer ourselves to be imposed upon by the pretensions of friendship. Remember to distrust when a man speaks fair, be not too forward to believe him, unless you know him well, for it is possible there may be seven abominations in his heart, a great many projects of mischief against you, which he is labouring so industriously to conceal with his fair speech. Satan is an enemy that hates us, and yet, in his temptations, speaks fair; as he did to Eve, but it is madness to give credit to him, for there are seven abominations in his heart, seven other spirits does our unclean spirit bring more wicked than himself.

2. Not to be so wicked as to impose upon any with a profession of friendship; for, though the fraud may be carried on plausible awhile, it will be brought to light, v. 26. He whose hatred is covered by deceit, one time or other will be discovered, and his wickedness showed, to his shame and confusion, before the whole congregation; and nothing will do more to make a man odious to all companies. Love (says one) is the best armour, but the worst cloak, and will serve dissemblers as the disguise which Ahab put on and perished in.

27. Whoso diggeth a pit shall fall therein: and he that rolleth a stone, it will return upon him.

Here see, 1. What pains men take to do mischief to others: As they put a force upon themselves by concealing it with a profession of friendship, so they put themselves to a great deal of labour to bring it about; it is digging a pit, it is rolling a stone, hard work; and yet men will not stick at it, to gratify their passion and revenge.

2. What preparation they hereby make of mischief to themselves; their violent dealing will return upon their own heads; they shall themselves fall into the pit they digged, and the stone they rolled will return upon them. Ps. vii. 15, 16.—ix. 15, 16.

The righteous God will take the wise, not only in their own craftiness, but in their own cruelty. It is the plotter's doom. Haman is hanged on a gallows of his own preparing:

Nec lex est iustior uilla Quam necis artifices arte perier una
Nor is there any law more just than that the contrivers of destruction should perish by their own arts.

28. A lying tongue hateth those that are afflicted by it; and a flattering mouth worketh evil.

There are two sorts of lies equally detestable.

1. A slandering lie, which avowedly hates those it is spoken of; A lying tongue hates those that are afflicted by it; it afflicts them by calumnies and reproaches, because it hates them, and can thus smite them secretly where they are without defence; and it hates them, because it has afflicted them, and made them its enemies. The mischief of this is open and obvious; it afflicts, it hates, and owns it, and every body sees it.

2. A flattering lie, which secretly works the ruin of those it is spoken to. In the former, the mischief is plain, and men guard against it as well as they can, but in this it is little suspected, and men betray themselves by being credulous of their own praises, and the compliments that are passed upon them. A wise man therefore will be more afraid of a flatterer that kisses and kills, than of a slanderer that proclaims war.

CHAP. XXVII.

1. BOAST not thyself of to-morrow; for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth.

Here is, 1. A good caution against presuming upon time to come; Boast not thyself, no, not of to-morrow, much less of many days or years to come. This does not forbid preparing for to-morrow, but presuming upon what to-morrow, We must not pro-perse the continuance of our lives and comforts till to-morrow, but speak of it with submission to the will of God, and as those who, with good reason, are kept at uncertainty about it. We must not take thought for the morrow, (Matt. vi. 34.) but we must cast our care concerning it upon God. See James iv. 13—15. We must not put off the great work of conversion, that one thing needful, till to-morrow, and we were sure of it, but to-day while it is called to-day, hear God's voice.

1. A good consideration, upon which this caution is grounded; We know not what a day may bring forth; what event may be in the teeming womb of time; it is a secret till it is born, Ecc. xi. 5. A little time may produce considerable changes, and such as we little think of; we know not what the present day may bring forth, the evening must commend it. Nescia quid veniat viscerum verba Thou knowest not what the close of evening may bring with it. God has wisely kept us in the dark concerning future events, and reserved to himself the knowledge of them, as a flower of the crown, that he may train us up in a dependence upon himself, and a continued readiness for every event, Acts i. 7.

2. Let another man praise thee, and not thine own mouth; a stranger, and not thine own lips.

Note. 1. We must do that which is commendable, for even strangers may praise us. Our light must shine before men, and we must do good works that may be seen, though we must not do them on purpose that they may be seen. Let our own works be such as will praise us, even in the gates. Phil. iv. 8.

2. When we have done it, we must not commend ourselves, for that is an evidence of pride, folly, and self-love, and a great lessening to a man's reputation. Every one will be forward to run him down that cries himself up. There may be a just occasion for us to vindicate ourselves, but it does not become us to applaud ourselves. Proprio laus sorbet in ore—Self-praise defiles the mouth.

3. A stone is heavy, and the sand weighty; but a fool's wrath is heavier than them both. 4. Wrath is cruel, and anger is outrageous; but who is able to stand before envy?

These two verses show the intolerable mischief,

1. Of ungoverned passion; The wrath of a fool, who, when he is provoked, cares not what he says and does, is more grievous than a great stone, or a load of sand. It lies heavy upon himself. Those who have no regard of their passions do themselves even sink under the load of them. The wrath of a fool lies heavy upon those he is enraged at, to whom, in his fury, he will be in danger of doing some mischief. It is therefore our wisdom not to give provocation to a fool, but, if he be in a passion, to get out of his way.

2. Of rooted malice; which is as much worse than the former, as coals of juniper are than a fire of thorns; Wrath (it is true) is cruel, and does many a grievous thing, and anger is outrageous; but a secret enmity at the person of another, an envy at his prosperity, and a desire of revenge for some injury or affront, are much more mischievous: one may avoid a sudden heat, as David escaped Saul's javelin, but when it grows, as Saul's did, to a settled envy, there is no standing before it; it will pursue, it will overtake. He that grieves at the good of another, will be still contriving to do him hurt, and will keep his anger for ever.

5. Open rebuke is better than secret love. 6. Faithful are the wounds of a friend; but the kisses of an enemy are deceitful.

Note. 1. It is good for us to be reproved, and told of our faults, by our friends. If true love in the heart has but zeal and courage enough to show itself in dealing plainly with our friends, and reproving them, when they will, we may say and do amiss, this is really better, not only than secret love, but than secret love, that love to our neighbours which does not show itself in this good fruit, which compliments them in their sins, to the prejudice of their souls; Faithful are the rebukes of a friend, though, for the present, they are painful as wounds. It is a sign that our friends are faithful indeed, if, in love to our souls, they will not suffer sin upon us, nor let us alone in it. The physician's care is to care the patient's disease, not to please his palate.

2. It is dangerous to be caressed and flattered by an enemy, whose kisses are deceitful; we can take no pleasure in them, because we can put no confidence in them. Job's kiss and Judas's were deceitful, and therefore we have need to stand upon our guard, that we be not deluded by them: they are to be deprecated. Some read it, The Lord delivers us from an enemy's kisses; from lying lips, and from a deceitful tongue.

7. The full soul loatheth an honey-comb; but to the hungry soul every bitter thing is sweet.

Solomon here, as often in this book, shows that the poor have in some respects the advantage of the rich; for,

1. They have a better relish of their enjoyments than the rich have; hunger is the best sauce. Coarse fare, with a good appetite to it, has a sensible pleasantness in it, which they are strangers to whose hearts are overcharged with surfeiting. They that surfeit sumptuously every day, nauseate even delicate food, as the Israelites did the quails; whereas they that have no more than their necessary food, though it be such as the full soul would call bitter, to them it is sweet; they eat it with pleasure, digest it, and are refreshed by it.

2. They are more thankful for their enjoyments; The hungry will bless God for bread and water, while those that are full think the greatest dainties and varieties scarcely worth giving thanks for. The virgin Mary seems to refer to this, when she says (Luke i. 53.) The hungry, who know how to value God's blessings, are filled with good things, but, the rich, who despise them, are justly sent empty away.

8. As a bird that wandereth from her nest, so is a man that wandereth from his place.

Note. 1. There are many that do not know when they are well off, but are uneasy with their present condition, and given to change. God, in his providence, has appointed them a place fit for them, and has made it comfortable to them; but they affect uneasiness, they love to wander, they are glad of a pretence to go abroad, and do not care for staying long at a place; they needlessly absent themselves from their own work and care, and meddle with that which belongs not to them.

2. Those that thus desert the post assigned to them, are like a bird that wanders from her nest. It is an instance of their folly, they are like a silly bird, they are always wavering, like the wandering bird that had not a nest, he rov'd from how to how, and rests now here, it is unsafe; the bird that had a nest was exposed; a man's place is his castle, he that quits it makes himself an easy prey to the fowler; when the bird wanders from her nest, the eggs and young ones there are neglected. They that love to be abroad leave their work at home undone. Let every man therefore, in the calling wherein he is called, therein abide, therein abide with God.

9. Ointment and perfume rejoice the heart; so doth the sweetness of a man's friend by hearty counsel. 10. Time own friend, and thy father's friend, forsake not; neither go into thy brother's house in the day of thy calamity: for better is a neighbour that is near, than a brother far off.

Here is, 1. A charge given to be faithful and constant to our friends, our old friends, to keep up an intimacy with them, and to be ready to do them all the good offices that lie in our power. It is good to have a friend, a bosom-friend, whom we can be free with, and with whom we may communicate counsels; it is not necessary that this friend should be a relation, or any way akin to us, though it is happiest, when, among those who are so, we find one fit to make a friend of. Peter and Andrew were brethren, so were James and John; yet Solomon frequently distinguishes between a friend and a brother. But it is advisable to choose a friend among our neighbours who live near us, that acquaintance may be kept up, and kindesses the more frequently interchanged. It is good also to have a special respect to those who have been friends to our family; *Thine own friend, especially if he have been thy father's friend, forsake not; fail not both to serve him, and to use him, as there is occasion. He is a tried friend, he knows thine affairs, he has a particular concern for thee, therefore be advised by him. It is a duty we owe to our parents, when they are gone, to lose their friends, and consult with them. Solomon's son undid himself by forsaking the counsel of his father's friends.

2. A good reason given why we should thus value true friendship, and be choice of it.

(1) Because of the pleasure of it. There is a great deal of sweetness in conversing and consulting with a cordial friend; it is like ointment and perfume, which are very grateful to the smell, and exhilarate the spirits, it rejoices the heart, the breath of life is more refreshing by breathing ourselves to our friend, and it is a great satisfaction to us to have his sentiments concerning our affairs. The sweetness of friendship lies not in hearty mirth, and hearty laughter, but in hearty counsel, faithful advice, sincerely given and without flattery; by counsel of the soul, so the word is; counsel which reaches the case, and comes to the heart; counsel about soul-concerns, Ps. lxvi. 16. We should reckon that the most pleasant company in the world is about spiritual things, and promotes the prosperity of the soul.

(2) Because of the profit and advantage of it, especially in a day of calamity; when we are here advised not to go into a brother's house, not to expect relief from a kinsman, merely for kindred-sake, for the obligation of that commonly goes little further than calling cousin, and fains when it comes to the trial of a real kindness; but, rather, to apply ourselves to our neighbours, who are at hand, and will be ready to help us at an exigence. It is wisdom to oblige them by being neighbourly, and we shall have the benefit of it in distress, by finding them so to us, ch. xviii. 24.

11. My son, be wise, and make my heart glad, that I may answer him that reproacheth me.

Children are here exhorted to be wise and good,

1. That they may be a comfort to their parents, and may make their hearts glad, even when the evil days come, and so recompense them for their care, ch. xxii. 15.

2. That they may be a credit to them; "That I may answer him that reproacheth me with having been over-strict and severe in bringing up my children, and having taken a wrong method with them, in restraining them from the liberties which other young people take. My son, be wise, and then it will appear, in the effect, that I went the wisest way to work with my children. Those that have been blest with religious education, should carry it in their hands every thing as a credit to their education, and to silence those that say, A young saint, an old devil; and to prove the contrary, A young saint, an old angel.

12. A prudent man foreseeth the evil, and hideth himself: but the simple pass on, and are punished.

This we had before, ch. xxi. 3.

Note 1. Evil may be foreseen. Where there is temptation it is easy to foresee, that, if we thrust ourselves into it, there will be sin, and as easy to foresee, that, if we venture upon the evil of sin, there will follow the evil of punishment; and, commonly, God warns before he wounds, having set watchmen over us, Jer. vi. 17.

2. It will be well or ill with us, according as we do, or do not, improve the foresight we have of evil before us; The prudent man, foreseeing the evil, forecasts accordingly, and hides himself, but the simple is either so dull that he does not foresee it, or so wilful and stupid that he will take no care to avoid it, and so he passeth on securely, and is punished. We do well for ourselves when we provide for hereafter.

13. Take his garment that is surety for a stranger, and take a pledge of him for a strange woman.

This also we had before, ch. xx. 16.

1. It shows who they are that are hastening to poverty; those that have so little consideration as to be bound for every body that will ask them, and those that are given to women. Such as these will take up money as far as ever their credit will go, but they will certainly cheat their creditors at last, nay, they are cheating them all along. An honest man may be made a beggar, but he is not hastening his own destruction.

2. It advises us to be so discreet, in ordering our affairs, as not to lend money to those who are manifestly wasting their estates, unless they give very good security for it. Foolish lending is injustice to our families. He does not say, "Get another to be bound with him," for he that makes himself a common voucher will have those to be his security who are as insensit as himself; therefore Take his garment.

14. He that blesseth his friend with a loud voice, rising early in the morning, it shall be counted a curse to him.

Note. 1. It is a great folly to be extravagant in praising even the best of our friends and benefactors; it is our duty to give every one his due praise, to applaud those that excel in knowledge, virtue, and usefulness, and to acknowledge the kindesses we have received with thankfulness; but to do this with a loud voice, rising early in the morning, to always harping on this string, in all companies, even to the most frivolous, or to the friends he may be desteemed to hear it, to do it studiously, as we do that which we rise early to, to magnify the merits of our friends above measure, and with hyperbole, is fulsome, and nauseous, and savours of hypocrisy and design; praising men for what they have done, is only to get more out of them; and every body concludes the parasite will be well paid for his panegyric or epistle dedicatory. We must not give that praise to our friend, that is due to God only, as some think is implied in rising early to do it; for in the morning God is to be praised. We must not make too much haste to praise men, so some understand it; not cry up men too soon for their abilities and performances, but let them first be proved; lest they be lifted up with pride, and hid to sleep in idleness.

2. It is a greater folly to be fond of being ourselves extravagantly praised; a wise man rather courts it a curse, and a reflection in his bosom, not only a signal to his prejudice. Modest praises (as a great man observes) invite such as are present to add to the commendation, but immodest, immoderate praises tempt them to detract rather, and to censure one that they hear over-commended. And besides, over-praising a man makes him the object of envy; every man puts in for a share of reputation, and therefore reckons himself injured, if another monopolise it, or have more given him than his share. And the greatest danger of all, is, that it is a temptation to pride; men are apt to think of themselves above what is meet, when others speak of them above what is meet. See how careful blessed Paul was not to be over-valued, 2 Cor. xii. 6.

15. A continual dropping in a very rainy day, and a contentious woman, are alike.

16. Whosoever hideth her hideth the wind, and the ointment of his right hand which bewrayeth itself.

Here, as before, Solomon laments the case of him that has a peevish, passionate, wife, that is continually chiding, and making herself, and all about her, uneasy.

1. It is a grievance that there is no avoiding, for it is like a continual dropping in a very rainy day. The contents of a neighbour may be, like a sharp shower, troublesome for the time, yet, while it lasts, one may take shelter; but the contents of a wife are like a constant soaking rain, for which there is no remedy but patience. See. ch. xix. 13.

2. It is a grievance that there is no concealing. A wise man would hide it if he could, for the sake both of his own and his wife's reputation, but he cannot, any more than he can conceal the noise of the wind when it blows, or the smell of a strong perfume. Those that are froward and brawling will proclaim their own shame, even when their friends, in kindness to them, would cover it.

17. Iron sharpeneth iron; so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend.

This bespeaks both the pleasure and the advantage of conversation. One man is nobody; nor will poring upon a book in a corner accomplish a man so as reading and studying of men will. Wise and profitable discourse sharpen men's wits; and those that have so much knowledge, may, by conference, have something added to them. It sharpeneth men's looks, and, by cheering the spirits, puts a briskness and liveliness into the countenance, and gives a man such an air as shows he is pleased himself, and makes him pleasing to those about him. Good men's graces are sharpened by converse with those that are good, and bad men's lusts and passions are sharpened by converse with those that are bad, as iron is sharpened by its like, especially by the file. Men are filed, made smooth, and bright, and fit for business, (who were rough, and dull, and inactive,) by conversation. This is designed,

1. To recommend to us this expedient for sharpening ourselves, but with a caution to take heed whom we choose to converse with, because the influence upon us is so great, either for the better or for the worse.

2. To direct us what we must have in our eye in conversation, to improve both others and ourselves, not to pass away time or banter one another, but to provoke one another to love and to good works, and so to make one another wiser and better.

18. Whoso keepeth the fig-tree shall eat the fruit thereof; so he that waiteth on his master shall be honoured.

This is designed to encourage diligence, faithfulness, and constancy, even in mean employments. Though the calling be laborious and despisiable, yet those who keep to it will find there is something to be got by it.

1. Let not a poor gardener, who keeps the fig-tree, be discouraged; though it require constant care and attendance to nurse up fig-trees, and, when they are grown to maturity, to keep them in good order, and gather the figs in their season, he shall be paid for his pains, he shall eat the fruit of it, 1 Cor. ix. 7.

2. Nay, let not a poor servant think himself incapable of thriving and being preferred; for, if he be diligent in waiting on his master, observant of him, and obedient to him; he keep his master, so the word is; if he do all he can for the securing of his master's person and reputation, and take care that his estate be not wasted or damaged, such a one shall be honoured; shall not only get a good word, but be preferred and rewarded. God is a master who has engaged to put an honour on those that serve him faithfully, John xii. 26.

19. As in water, face answereth to face; so the heart of man to man.

This shows us that there is a way,

1. Of knowing ourselves; as the water is a looking-glass, in which we may see our faces by reflection, so there are mirrors by which the heart of man is discovered to a man, to himself. Let a man examine his own conscience, his purposes, and intentions. Let him behold his natural face in the glass of the divine law, (Jam. i. 23.) and he may discern what kind of man he is, and what is his true character, which it will be of great use to every man rightly to know.

2. Of knowing one another by ourselves; for, as there is a similitude between the face of a man and the reflection of it in the water, so there is between one man's heart and another's; for God has fashioned men's hearts alike; and, in many cases, we may judge of others by ourselves, which is one of the foundations on which that rule is built, of doing to others as we would be done by, Exod. xxiii. 9. Nil hil est unum uni tam simile, tam fur, quam omnes inter nossem ipsos sumus. Nai nemo ipse tam similis quam omnes sunt omnium—No one thing is like another as man is to man. No person himself is so like as each person is to all besides. Cic. de Legib. lib. 1.

One cannot discern better than another one's sanctified heart, for the former bears the same image of the earthly, the latter the same image of the heavenly.

20. Hell and destruction are never full; so the eyes of man are never satisfied.

Two things are here said to be insatiable, and they are two things near of kin, death and sin.

1. Death is insatiable; the first death, the second death, both are so. The grave is not clogged with the multitude of dead bodies that are daily thrown into it, but is still an open sepulchre, and cries, Give, give; hell also has enlarged itself, and still has room for the dammed spirits that are committed to that prison. Tophet is deep and large, Isa. xxx. 33.

2. Sin is insatiable; The eyes of man are never satisfied, nor the appetites of the carnal mind toward profit or pleasure; the eye is not satisfied with seeing, nor is he that loves silver satisfied with silver. Men labour for that which surfeits, but satisfies not; nay, it is most satisfying; for a person sometimes have men justly been doomed to, ever since our first parents were not satisfied with all the trees of Eden, but they must meddle with the forbidden tree. Those whose eyes are ever toward the Lord, in him are satisfied, and shall for ever be so.

21. As the fining-pot for silver, and the furnace for gold; so is a man to his praise.

This gives us a touchstone by which we may try ourselves: silver and gold are tried by putting them into the furnace and fining-pot; so is a man tried by prising him. Let him be extolled and prferred, and then he will show him what he is.
1. If a man be made, by the applause that is given him, proud, conceited, and scornful; if he take the glory to himself, which he should transmit to God, as Herod did; if, the more he is praised, the more careless he is of what he says and does, if he lie in bed till noon, because his name is up; whereby it will appear that he is a vain foolish man, and a man who, though he be praised, has nothing in him truly praiseworthy.

2. If, on the contrary, a man is made, by his praise, more thankful to God, more respectful to his friends, more watchful against every thing that may blemish his reputation, more diligent to improve himself, and do good to others, that he may answer the expectations of his friends from him, by this it will appear that he is a wise and good man. He has a good temper of mind who knows how to pass by evil report and good report, and is still the same; 2 Cor. vi. 8.

22. Though thou shouldst bray a fool in a mortar among wheats with a pestle, yet will not his foolishness depart from him.

Solomon had said, (ch. xxi. 15.) The foolishness which is bound in the heart of a child may be driven out by the rod of correction, for then the mind is to be moulded, the vicious habits not having taken root; but here he shows, that, if it be not done then, it will be next to impossible to do it afterward; if the disease be inveterate, there is a danger of its being incurable. Can the Ethiopian change his skin? Obs. 1. Some are so bad, that rough and severe methods must be used with them, after gentle means have been tried in vain; they must be brayed in a mortar. God will take this way with them by his judgments; the magistrates must take this way with them by the rigour of the law. Force must be used with those that will not be ruled by reason, and love, and their own interest.

2. Some are so incorrigibly bad, that even these rough and severe methods do not answer the end, their foolishness will not depart from them; so fully are their hearts set in them to do evil; they are often under the rod, and yet not humbled; in the furnace, and yet not refined; but, like Azah, trespass yet more; (2 Chron. xxviii. 22.) and what remains, then, but they should be rejected as reprobate silver?

23. Be thou diligent to know the state of thy flocks, and look well to thy herds; 24. For riches are not for ever: and doth the crown endure to every generation? 25. The hay appeareth, and the tender grass sheweth itself, and herbs of the mountains are gathered: 26. The lambs are for thy clothing, and the goats are the price of thy field; 27. And thou shalt have goats' milk enough for thy food, for the food of thy household, and for the maintenance of thy maidens.

Here is, 1. A command given us to be diligent in our callings; it is directed to husbandmen and shepherds, and those that deal in cattle, but it is to be extended to all other lawful callings; whatever our business is, within doors or without, we must apply our minds to it. This command intimates, (1.) That we ought to have some business to do in this world, and not to live in idleness. (2.) We ought rightly and fully to understand our business, and know what we have to do, and meddle with that which we do not understand. (3.) We ought to have an eye to it ourselves, and not turn over all the care of it to others; we should, with our own eyes, inspect the state of our flocks; it is the master's eye that makes them fat. (4.) We must be discreet and considerate in the management of our business; know the state of things, and look well to them, that nothing may be lost, no opportunity let slip, but every thing done in proper time and order, and so as to turn to the best advantage. (5.) We must be diligent, and take pains; not only sit down and centrive, but be up and doing; "Set thy heart to thy herds, as one in care; lay thy hands, lay thy bones, to thy business." 28. The reasons to enforce this command. Consider,

(1.) The uncertainty of worldly wealth; (v. 24.) Riches are not for ever. [1.] Other riches are so durable as these are; "Look well to thy flocks and herds, thine estate in the country, and the stock upon that, for these are staple commodities, which, in a succession, will be for ever, whereas riches in trade and merchandise will not be so; the crown itself may, perhaps, not be so sure to Thy family as thy flocks and herds. [2.] Even these riches will go to decay, if they be not well looked after. If a man had an abbey, (as we say,) and should be sullen and wasteful, he may make an end of it; even the crown, and the revenues of it, if care be not taken, will suffer damage, nor will it continue to every generation, without very good management. Though David had the crown entailed on his family, yet he looked well to his flocks, 1 Chron. xxvi. 29, 31.

(2.) The vanity and liberality of nature, or, rather, of the God of nature, and his providence; (v. 25.) The hay appeareth. In taking care of the flocks and herds, [1.] There needs no great labour, no ploughing or sowing, the food for them is the spontaneous product of the ground, thou hast nothing to do but to turn them into it in the summer, when the grass shows itself, and to gather the herbs of the mountains for them against winter. God has done his part, thou art ungrateful to him, and unjustly refusest to serve his providence, if thou dost not do thine. [2.] There is an opportunity to be observed and improved; a time when the hay appeareth; but, if thou let slip that time, thy flocks and herds will fare the worse for it. As for ourselves, so for our cattle, we ought, with the ant, to provide meat in summer.

(3.) The profit of good husbandry in a family; "Keep thy sheep, and thy sheep will help to keep thy house, and thou shalt have begotten of children and servants; goats' milk enough; (v. 27.) and enough of the hay good as a feast. Thou shalt have raiment likewise, the lambs' wool shall be for thy clothing. Thou shalt have money to pay thy rent; the goats thou shalt have to sell shall be the price of thy fields; nay, as some understand it, "Thou shalt become a purchaser, and buy land to leave to thy children," v. 26. Note, [1.] If we have herd and raiment, and wherewithal to give every body his own, we have enough, and ought to be content, but thankful. [2.] Masters of families must provide not only for themselves, but for their families, and see that their servants have a fitting maintenance.

[3.] Plain food and plain clothing, if they be but competent, are all we should aim at. "Reckon thyself well done to, if thou be clothed with homespun cloth, with the fleece of thy own lambs, and fed with goats' milk; let that serve for thy food which sees for the food of thy household, and the maintenance of thy maidens; be not desirous of dainties, for-fetched and dear bought." [4.] This should encourage us to be careful and industrious about our business, that that will bring in a sufficient maintenance for our families; we shall eat the labours of our hands.

CHAP. XXVIII.

1. THE wicked flee when no man pursueth: but the righteous are bold as a lion.
If they flee when none pursues, what will they do when they shall see God himself pursuing them with his armies? Job xx. 24.—xxv. 24. Sec Deut. xxviii. 25. Lev. xxvi. 36.

2. What a holy security and serenity of mind they enjoy who keep conscience void of offence, and so keep themselves in the love of God. The righteous are bold as a lion, as a young lion; in the greatest dangers they have a God of almighty power to trust to; Therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed: whatever difficulties they meet with in the way of their duty, they are not daunted by them; None of those things move me.

The morus antennus esto, nil conscribere siti—
Be this thy brazen bulwark of defence,
Still to preserve thy conscious innocence. Hor.

2. For the transgression of a land many are the princes thereof: but by a man of understanding and knowledge the state thereof shall be prolonged.

Note. 1. National sins bring national disorders, and the disturbances of the public repos: For the transgression of a land, and a general defection from his God to idol religion, to idol understandings, and to immorality, many are the princes thereof, many at the same time pretending to the sovereignty, and contending for it, by which the people are crumbled into parties and factions, biting and devouring one another. Or many, successively, in a little time, one cutting off another, as 1 Kings xvi. 8, &c. or soon cut off by the hand of God, or of a foreign enemy, as 2 Kings xxiv. 5, &c. As the people suffer for the sins of the prince, Delirant regis, plebanator Achaui—
Kings play the madman, and their people suffer for it.
so the government sometimes suffers for the sins of the people.

2. Wisdom will prevent or redress these grievances; By a man, by a people, of understanding, that come again to themselves and their right mind, things are kept in a good order, or, if disturbed, brought back to the old channel again. Or, By a prince of understanding and knowledge, a privy-counsellor, or minister of state, that will restrain or suppress the transgression of the land, and take the right methods of healing the state thereof, the good estate of it will be prolonged. We cannot imagine what a great deal of service one wise man may do to a nation in a critical juncture.

3. A poor man that oppresseth the poor is like a sweeping rain, which leaveth no food.

See here, 1. How hard hearted poor people frequently are to one another; not only not doing such good offices as they might do one to another, but imposing upon, and overreaching, one another. Those who know by experience the miseries of poverty, should be compassionate to those who suffer the like, but they are inexcesously barbarous if they be injurious to them.

2. How imperious and gripping those commonly are, who be indulgent and necessitous, get into power. If a prince prefer a poor man, he forgets that ever he was poor, and none shall be so oppressive to the poor as he, or squeeze them so cruelly. The hungry leech and the dry sponge suck much. Set a beggar on horseback, and he will ride without mercy; he is like a sweeping rain, which washes away the corn in the ground, and lays and beats out that which is grown, so that it leaveth no food.

Princes, therefore, ought not to put those into places of trust, who are poor; and in debt, and behind-hand in the world, nor any who make it their main business to enrich themselves.

4. They that forsake the law praise the wicked: but such as keep the law contend with them.

Note. 1. Those that praise the wicked make it to appear that they do themselves forsake the law, and go contrary to it, for that curses and condemns the wicked. Wicked people will speak well of one another, and so strengthen one another's hands in their wicked ways, hoping thereby to silence the clamours of their own consciences, and to serve the interests of the devil's kingdom, which is not done by any thing so effectually as by keeping vice in reputation.

2. Those that do indeed make conscience of the law of God themselves, will, in their places, vigorously oppose sin, and bear their testimony against it, and do what they can to shame and suppress it; they will reprove the works of darkness, and silence the excurses which are made for those works, and do what they can to bring gross offenders to punishment, that others may hear and fear.

5. Evil men understand not judgment: but they that seek the Lord understand all things.

Note. 1. As the prevalency of men's lusts is owing to the darkness of their understandings, so the darkness of their understandings is very much owing to the dominion of their lusts; Men understand not judgment, discern not between truth and falsehood, right and wrong; they understand not the law of God as the rule either of their duty or of their doings; and, (1.) Therefore it is that they are evil men; their wickedness is the effect of their ignorance and error, Eph. iv. 18. (2.) Therefore they understand not judgment, because they are evil men, their corruptions blind their eyes, and fill them with prejudices, and, because they do evil, they hate the light. It is just with God also to give them up to strong delusions.

2. As men's seeking the Lord is a good sign that they do understand much, so it is a good means of their understanding more, even of their understanding all things needful for them. They that set God's glory before them as their end, his favour as their felicity, his word as their rule, and apply themselves to him upon all occasions by prayer, they seek the Lord, and he will give them the spirit of wisdom. If a man do his will, he shall know his doctrine, John vii. 17. A good understanding they have, and a better they shall have, that do his commandments, Ps. cxii. 10. 1 Cor. ii. 12, 13.

6. Better is the poor that walketh in his uprightness, than he that is perverse in his ways, though he be rich.
Here, 1. It is supposed that a man may walk in his uprightness, and yet be poor in this world; may be poor in the world, which is a temptation to dishonesty, and yet may resist the temptation, and continue to walk in his uprightness: also that a man may be perverse in his ways, injurious to God and man, and yet be rich, and prosper in the world, for a while: he may be rich, and so he under greater obligations, and have great opportunities to do good, and yet be perverse in his ways, and do a great deal of hurt.

2. It is maintained as a paradox to a blind world, that an honest, godly, poor man, is better than a wicked, ungodly, rich man; has a better character, is in a better condition, has more comfort in himself, and is a greater blessing to the world, and is worthy of much more honour and respect. It is not only certain that his case will be better at death, but is better in life. When Aristides was by a rich man upbraided with his poverty, he answered, Thy riches do thee more hurt than my poverty does me.

7. Whoso keepeth the law is a wise son: but he that is a companion of riotous men, shameth his father.

Note, 1. Religion is true wisdom, and it makes men wise in every relation; He that conscientiously keeps the law is wise, and he will be particularly a wise son, will act discreetly toward his parents, for the law of God teaches him to do so.

2. Bad company is a great hindrance to religion: Those that are companions of riotous men, that choose such for their companions, and delight in their conversation, will certainly be drawn from keeping the law of God, and drawn to transgress it, Ps. cxix. 113.

3. Wickedness is not only a reproach to the sinner himself, but to all that are akin to him; He that keeps rakish company, and spends his time and money with them, not only grieves his parents, but shames them, it turns to their discredit, as if they had not done their duty to him. They are ashamed that a child of theirs should be scandalous and abusive to their neighbours.

3. He that by usury and unjust gain increaseth his substance, he shall gather it for him that will pity the poor.

Note, 1. That which is ill got, though it may increase much, will not last long. A man may perhaps raise a great estate, in a little time, by usury and extortion, and an oppression of the poor, but it will not continue: he gathers it for himself, but it shall prove to have been gathered for somebody else that he has no kindness for. His estate shall go to decay, and another man's shall be raised out of the ruins of it.

2. Sometimes God, in his providence, so orders it, that that one who gets unjustly, another uses charitably; it is strange, but it is true, that the hand of one that will fill the poor, and do good with it, and so cut off the entail of the curse which he brought upon it, got it by deceit and violence. Thus, the same Providence that punishes the cruel, and disables them to do any more hurt, rewards the merciful, and enables them to do so much the more good. To him that has the ten pounds give the four which the wicked servant hid in the napkin; for to him that has, and uses it well, more shall be given. Mat. xix. 24. Thus the poor are repaid, the charitable are encouraged, and God is glorified.

9. He that turneth away his ear from hearing the law, even his prayer shall be abomination.

Note, 1. It is by the word and prayer that our communion with God is kept up. God speaks to us by his law, and expects we should hear him, and heed him; we speak to him by prayer, to which we wait for an answer of peace. How reverent and serious should we be, whenever we are hearing from, and speaking to, the Lord of glory.

2. If God's word be not regarded by us, our prayers shall not only be not accepted of God, but they shall be an abomination to him; not only our sacrifices, which were ceremonial appointments, but even our prayers, which are moral duties, and which, when they are put up by the upright, are so much his delight: see Isa. i. 11, 13. The sinner, whose prayers God is thus angry at, is one who wilfully and obstinately refuses to obey God's commandments, who will not so much as give them the hearing that he causes his ear to decline the law, and refuses, when God calls; God will, therefore, justly refuse him when he calls: see Prov. i. 24, 28.

10. Whoso causeth the righteous to go astray in an evil way, he shall fall himself into his own pit: but the upright shall have good things in possession.

Note, 1. These that are rich are apt to think themselves wise, because, whatever else they are ignorant of, they know how to get and save; and still that which is most precious to them, that which they put most to the heart, is a deception to them; they should be regarded as an oracle and a law, and that none should dare to contradict them, but every sheep bow to theirs; this humour is fed by flatterers, who, because, like Jezebel's prophets, they are fed at their table, cry up their wisdom.

2. Those that are poor often prove themselves wiser than they; A poor man, who has taken pains to get wisdom, having no other way (as the rich man has) to preserve a reputation, he searches him out, and makes it appear that he is not such a scholar, nor such a politician, as he is taken to be. See how variously God dispenses his gifts; to some he gives wealth, to others wisdom, and it is easy to say which of these is the best gift, which we should covet most earnestly.

12. When righteous men do rejoice, there is great glory: but when the wicked rise, a man is hidden.

Note, 1. The comfort of the people of God is the honour of the nation in which they live; There is a great glory dwelling in the land when the righteous do rejoice, when they have their liberty, the free exercise of their religion, and are not persecuted; when the government countenances them, and speaks comfortably to them, when they prosper and grow rich, and much more when they are preferred and employed, and have power put into their hands.

The advancement of the wicked is the eclipsing of the beauty of a nation; When the wicked rise, and get head, they make head against all that is sacred, and then a man is hidden, a good man is thrust into obscurity, is necessitated to abscond for his own safety; corruptions prevail so generally, that, as in Elijah's time, there seems to be no good men left, the wicked walk so thick on every side.

13. He that covereth his sins shall not prosper: but whoso confesseth and forsaketh them shall have mercy.

Here is, 1. The folly of indulging sin, of palliating and excusing it, denying or extenuating it, diminishing it, dissembling it, or throwing the blame of it upon others; He that thus covers his sins shall not prosper; let him never expect it; he shall not succeed in his endeavour to cover his sin, for it will be discovered, sooner or later; there is nothing hid which shall not be revealed, a bird of the air shall carry the voice, murder will out, and so will other sins. He shall not prosper, he shall not obtain the pardon of his sin, nor can he have any true peace of conscience. David owns himself to have been in a constant agitation while he covered his sins, Ps. xxvii, 3, 4. When the patient conceals his distemper he cannot expect a cure.

2. The benefit of parting with it, both by a penitent confession, and a universal reformation; He that confesses his guilt to God, and is careful not to return to sin again, shall find mercy with God, and shall have the comfort of it in his own bosom. His conscience shall be eased, and his ruin prevented: see 1 John i. 9. Jer. iii. 12, 13. When we set sin before our face, (as David, My sin is ever before me,) God casts it behind his back.

14. Happy is the man that feareth alway: but he that hardeneth his heart shall fall into mischief.

Here is, 1. The benefit of a holy caution. It sounds strange, but it is very true; Happiness is the man that feareth alway. Most people think that they are happy who never fear; but there is a fear which is so far from having torment in it, that it has in it the greatest satisfaction. Happy is the man who always keeps in his mind a holy awe and reverence of God, his glory, goodness, and government, who is always afraid of offending God, and incurring his displeasure, who keeps conscience tender, and has a dread of the appearance of evil, who is always jealous of himself, distrustful of his own sufficiency, and lives in expectation of troubles and changes, so that, whenever they come, they are no surprise to him. He who keeps up such a fear as this, will live a life of faith and watchfulness, and therefore happiness is he, blessed and holy.

2. The danger of a sinful presumption; He that hardeneth his heart, thatmocks at fear, and sets God and his judgments at defiance, and receives not the impressions of his word or rod, he shall fall into mischief; this presumption will be his ruin, and, whatever sin (which is the greatest mischief) he falls into, it is owing to the hardness of his heart.

15. As a roaring lion, and a raging bear; so is a wicked ruler over the poor people.

It is written indeed, Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people; but, if he be a wicked ruler, that oppresses the people, especially the poor people, robbing them of the little they have, and making a prey of them, whatever we may call him, this scripture calls him a roaring lion, and a raging bear.

1. In respect of his character; he is brutish, barbarous, and blood-thirsty, he is rather to be put among the beasts of prey, the wildest and most savage, than to be reckoned of that noble rank of beings whose glory is reason and humanity.

2. In respect of the mischief they do to their sub jects; they are dreadful as the roaring lion, who makes the forest tremble; they are devouring as a hungry bear, and the more necessitous they are, the more mischief they do, and the more greedy of gain they are.

16. The prince that wanteth understanding is also a great oppressor: but he that hateth covetousness shall prolong his days.

Two things are here intimated to be the causes of the mal-administration of princes;

1. The love of money, that root of all evil; for hating covetousness here stands opposed to oppression, according to Moses's character of good magistrates, men fearing God and hating covetousness, (Exod. xviii. 21.) not only not being covetous, but hating it, and shaking the hands from holding of bribes. A ruler that is covetous will neither do justly nor love mercy, but the people under him shall be bought and sold.

2. Want of consideration; He that hateth covetousness shall prolong his government and peace, shall be happy in the affections of his people, and the blessings of his God. It is as much the interest as the duty of princes to reign in righteousness; oppressors therefore and tyrants are the greatest fools in the world, they want understanding, they do not consult their own honour, ease, and safety, but sacrifice all to their ambition of an absolute and arbitrary power. They might be much happier in the hearts of their subjects, than in their necks or estates.

17. A man that doeth violence to the blood of any person shall fly to the pit; let no man stay him.

This agrees with that ancient law, Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed, (Gen. ix. 6.) and speaks,

1. The doom of the shedder of blood; He that has committed murder, though he flies for his life, shall be continually haunted with terrors, shall himself flee to the pit, betray himself, and torment himself, like Cain, who, when he had killed his brother, became a fugitive and a vagabond, and trembled continually.

2. The duty of the avenger of blood; Whether the magistrate, or the next of kin, or whoever are concerned in making inquisition for blood, let them be close and vigorous in the prosecution, and let it not be bought off. They that acquit the murderer, or do anything to help him off, come in sharers in the guilt of blood; nor can the land be purged from the blood of God by the blood of him that shed it, Numb. xxxv. 33.

18. Whoso walketh uprightly shall be saved: but he that is perverse in his ways shall fall at once.

Note, 1. Those that are honest are always safe. He that acts with sincerity, that speaks as he thinks, has a single eye, in everything, to the glory of God and the good of his brethren, that would not, for a world, do an unjust thing, if he knew it, that in all manner of conversation walks uprightly, he shall be saved hereafter. We find a glorious company of these in whose mouth was found no guile, Rev. xiv. 3. They shall be safe now. Integrity and up-righteousness will preserve men, will give them a holy security in the worst of times; for it will preserve their comfort, their reputation, and all their interests; they may be injured, they cannot be hurt.

2. Those that are false and dishonest are never safe;
He that is perverse in his ways, that thinks to secure himself by fraudulent practices, by dissimulation and treachery, or by an estate ill-get, he shall fall; nay, he shall fall at once, not gradually, and with warning given, but suddenly, without previous notice, for he is least safe when he is most secure. He falls at once, and so has neither time to guard against his ruin, nor to provide for it; and, being a surprise upon him, it will be so much the greater terror to him.

19. He that tilleth his land shall have plenty of bread: but he that followeth after vain persons shall have poverty enough.

Note, 1. Those that are diligent in their callings take the way to live comfortably: He that tills his land, and tends his shop, and minds his business, whatever it is, he shall have plenty of bread, of that which is necessary for himself and his family, and with which he may be charitable to the poor; he shall eat of the labour of his hands.

2. Those that are idle, and careless, and company with rogues, though they indulge themselves in living (as they think) easily and pleasantly, they take the way to live miserably. He that has land, and values himself upon that, but does not till it, neglects his business, will not take pains, but follows after vain persons, drinks with them, joins with them in their frolics and vain sports, and idles away his time with them, he shall have poverty enough, shall be smitten or replenished with poverty, so the word is; he takes those courses which lead so directly to hell, that he seems to court it, and he shall have his fill of it.

20. A faithful man shall abound with blessings: but he that maketh haste to be rich shall not be innocent.

Here, 1. We are directed in the true way to be happy, and that is to be holy and honest; He that is faithful to God and man shall be blessed of the Lord, and he shall abound with blessings of the upper and nether springs. Men shall praise him, and pray for him, and be ready to do him any kindness. He shall abound in doing good, and shall himself be a blessing to the place where he lives. Usefulness shall be the reward of faithfulness, and it is a good reward.

2. We are cautioned against a false and deceitful way to happiness, and that is, right or wrong, raising an estate suddenly. Say not, This is the way to abound with blessings; for he that makes haste to be rich, more haste than good speed, he shall not be innocent; and if he be not, he shall not be blessed of God, but, rather, bring a curse upon what he has;
or, if he be not innocent, can he long be easy to himself; he shall not be accounted innocent by his neighbours, but shall have their ill-will and ill-word.
He does not say that he cannot be innocent, but there is all the probability in the world that he will not prove so; He that hasteth with his feet, sinneth, stumbleth, falleth. Sed quae reverentia legum, quis metus, aut judex, est unquam prohiberatis avari?—What reverence for law, what fear, what shame, was ever indicated by an avaricious man having to be rich?

21. To have respect of persons is not good; for, for a piece of bread that man will transgress.
24. Whoso robbeth his father or his mother, and saith, It is no transgression: the same is the companion of a destroyer.

As Christ shows the absurdity and wickedness of those children who think it is no duty, in some cases, to maintain their parents, (Matth. xx. 5.) so Solomon here shows the absurdity and wickedness of those who think it is no sin to rob their parents, either by force or secretly, by wheeling them or threatening them, or by wasting what they have, and (which is no better than robbing them,) running into debt, and leaving them to pay it. Now,

1. This is commonly made light of by untoward children; they say, “It is no transgression, for it will be our own shortly, our parents can well enough spare it, we have occasion for it, we cannot live as gentlemen upon the allowance our parents give us; it is too strait for us.” With such excuses as these they endeavour to shift off the conviction. But,

2. How dignified an unconquered youth makes of it, it is a very great sin; he that does it is the companion of a destroyer; no better than a robber on the highway. What wickedness will he scruple to commit, who will rob his own parents?

25. He that is of a proud heart stirreth up strife: but he that putteth his trust in the Lord shall be made fat.

Note. 1. Those make themselves lean, and continually unquiet, that are haughty and quarrelsome, for they are opposed to those that shall be made fat; He that is of a proud heart, that is conceited of himself, and looks with contempt upon all about him, that cannot bear either competition or contradiction, he stirs up strife, makes mischief, and creates disturbance to himself and every body else.

2. Those make themselves fat, and always easy, that live in a continual dependence upon God and his grace; He who putteth his trust in the Lord, who, instead of struggling for himself, commits his cause to God, he shall be made fat; he saves the money which others spend upon their pride and contentiousness, he enjoys himself, and has abundant satisfaction in his God; and thus his soul dwells at ease, and he is most likely to have plenty of outward good things. None live so easily, so pleasantly, as those who live by faith.

26. He that trusteth in his own heart is a fool: but whoso walketh wisely, he shall be delivered.

Here is, 1. The character of a fool; he trusteth to his own heart, to his own wisdom and counsels, his own strength and sufficiency, his own merit and righteousness, and the good opinion he has of himself; he that does so is a fool, for he trusts to that, not only which is deceitful above all things, (Jer. xviii. 9.) but which has often deceived him. This implies, that it is the character of a wise man (as before, v. 25.) to put his trust in the Lord, and in his power and promise, and to follow his guidance, Prov. iii. 5-9.

2. The comfort of a wise man; He that walks wisely, that trusts not to his own heart, but is humble and self-diffident, and goes on in the strength of the Lord God, he shall be delivered; when the fool, that trusts in his own heart, shall be destroyed.

27. He that giveth unto the poor shall not lack: but he that hideth his eyes shall have many a curse.

Here is, 1. A promise to the charitable; He that gives to the poor shall himself be never the poorer for so doing, he shall not lack; if he have but little, and so be in danger of lacking, let him give out of his little, and that will prevent it from coming to nothing; as the bounty of the widow of Sarepta to Elijah, for whom she made a little cake first, when what she had was reduced to a handful of meal. If he have much, let him give much out of it, and that will prevent its growing less; he and his shall not want what is given in pious charity. What we gave we lose.

2. A threatening to the uncharitable; He that hides his eyes, that he may not see the miseries of the poor, nor read their petitions, lest his eye should affect his heart, and exert some relief from him, he shall have many a curse, both from God and man, and neither causeless, and therefore they shall come. Woful is the condition of that man who has the word of God, and the prayers of the poor, against him.

28. When the wicked rise, men hide themselves: but when they perish, the righteous increase.

This is to the same purport with what we had, v. 12.

2. When bad men are preferred, that which is good is clouded and run down; When power is put into the hands of the wicked, men hide themselves, wise men retire into privacy, and decline public business, not caring to be employed under them; rich men get out of the way, for fear of being squeezed for what they have; and, which is worst of all, good men abscond, despairing to do good, and fearing to be persecuted and ill-treated.

2. When bad men are displaced, degraded, and their power taken from them, then that which is good rises again, then the righteous increase; for, when they perish, good men will be put in their room, who will, by their example and interest, counteract religion and righteousness. It is well with a land when the number of good people increases in it; and it is therefore the policy of all princes, states, and potentates, to encourage them, and to take special care of the good education of youth.

CHAP. XXIX.

1. He that, being often reproved, hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy.

Here, 1. The obstinacy of many wicked people in a wicked way is to be greatly lamented. They are often reproved by parents and friends, by magistrates and ministers, by the providence of God, and by their own consciences, have hid their sins set in order before them, and fair warnings given them of the consequences of them, but all in vain, they harden their necks, perhaps they fling away, and will not so much as give the reproof a patient hearing; or, if they do, yet they go on in the sins for which they are reproved, they will not bow their necks to the yoke, but are children of Belial, they refuse reproof, (ch. x. 17.) despise it, (ch. v. 12.) hate it, (ch. xii. 1.)

2. The issue of this obstinacy is to be greatly dreaded; They that go on in sin, in despite of admonition, shall be destroyed; those that will not be reformed must expect to be ruined; if the rods answer not the end, expect the axes; they shall be suddenly destroyed, in the midst of their security, and without remedy; they have sinned against the preventing remedy, and therefore let them not expect any recovering remedy. Hell is remediless destruction; they shall be destroyed, and no healing, so the word is. If God wounds, who can heal?

2. When the righteous are in authority, the people rejoice: but when the wicked beareth rule, the people mourn.

This is what was said before, ch. xxviii. 12, 28.

1. The people will have cause to rejoice, or mourn, according as their rulers are righteous, or wicked; for if the righteous be in authority, sin will be punished and restrained, religion and virtue will be supported and kept in reputation; but if the wicked get power in their hands, wickedness will abound, religion and religious people will be persecuted, and so the ends of government will be perverted.

2. The people will actually rejoice, or mourn, according as their rulers are righteous, or wicked. Such a conviction are even the common people under the Excellency of virtue and religion, that they will rejoice when they see it preferred and countenanced; and, on the contrary, let men have ever so much honour and power, if they be wicked and vicious, and use it ill, they make themselves contemptible and base before all the people, (as those priests, Mal. ii. 9,) and subjects will think themselves miserable under such a government.

3. Whoso loveth wisdom rejoiceth his father: but he that keepeth company with harlots spendeth his substance.

Both the parts of this verse repeat what has been often said, but, on comparing them together, the sense of them will be enlarged from each other.

1. Be it observed, to the honour of a virtuous young man, that he loves wisdom, he is a philosopher, (for that signifies a lover of wisdom,) for religion is the best philosophy; he avoids bad company, and especially the company of low people; whereby he rejoices his parents, and has the satisfaction of being a comfort to them, and increases his estate, and is likely to be comfortably.

2. Be it observed, to the reproach of a vicious young man, that he hates wisdom, he keeps company with scandalous women, who will be his ruin, both in soul and body; he grieves his parents, and, like the prodigal son, devours their living with harlots. Nothing will beggar men sooner than the lusts of uncleanness; and the best preservative from those ruinous lusts is wisdom.

4. The king by judgment establisheth the land: but he that receiveth gifts overthroweth it.

Here is, 1. The happiness of a people under a good government. The care and business of a prince should be to establish the land, to maintain its fundamental laws, to settle the minds of his subjects, and make them easy, to secure their liberties and properties from hostilities, and for posterity, and to set in order the things that are wanting; this he must do by judgment, by wise counsels, and by the steady administration of justice, without respect of persons, which will have these good effects.

2. The misery of a people under a bad government: A man of obligations, (so it is in the margin,) overthrows the land; a man that is either sacrilegious or superstitious, or that invades the priest’s office, as Saul and Uzziah; or a man that aims at nothing but getting money, and will, for a good bribe, comine at the most guilty, and, in hope of one, persecute the innocent; such governors as these will ruin a country.

5. A man that flattereth his neighbour spreadeth a net for his feet.

Those may be said to flatter their neighbours, who commend and applaud that good in them, (the good they do, or the good they have,) which really either is not, or is not such as they represent it, and who profess that esteem and that affection for them, which really they have not; these spread a net for their feet.

1. For their neighbour’s feet, whom they flatter; they have an ill design in it, they would not speak thus fair, but that they hope to make an advantage of them; and it is therefore wisdom to suspect those who flatter us, that they are secretly laying a snare for us, and to stand on our guard accordingly. Or it has an ill effect on those who are flattered; it puffs them up with pride, and makes them conceited and confident of themselves, and so proves a net that entangles them in sin.

2. For their own feet; so some understand it. He that flatters others, in expectation that they will return his compliments, and flatter him, does but make himself ridiculous and odious even to those he flatters.

6. In the transgression of an evil man there is a snare: but the righteous doth sing and rejoice.

Here is, 1. The peril of a sinful way; there is not only a punishment at the end of it, but a snare in it; one sin is a temptation to another, and there are troubles which, as a snare, come suddenly upon evil men in the midst of their transgressions; may, their transgression itself often involves them in vexations, their sin is their punishment, and they are held in the cords of their own iniquity, ch. v. 22.

2. The pleasantness of the way of holiness. The snare that is in the transgression of evil men spells all their mirth, but righteous men are kept from those snares, or delivered out of them; they walk at liberty, walk in safety, and therefore they sing and rejoice; they that make God their chief Joy, have him for their exceeding Joy, and it is their own fault if they do not rejoice evermore. If there be any true joy on this side heaven, doubtless they have it whose conversation is in heaven.

7. The righteous considereth the cause of the poor: but the wicked regardeth not to know it.

It is pitiful that every one who sues sub forma pauperis—as a pauper, should have an honest cause, (they are of all others inexcusable, if they have not,) because the scripture has so well provided that it should have a fair hearing, and that the judge himself should be of counsel, as for the prisoner, so for the pauper.

1. It is here made the character of a righteous judge, that he considers the cause of the poor; it is every man’s duty to consider the poor, (Ps. xli. 1,) but the judgment of the poor is to be considered by those that sit in judgment; they must take as much pains to find out the right in a poor man’s cause, as in a rich man’s. Sense of justice must make both judge and advocate as solicitous and industrious in the poor man’s cause, as if they hoped for the greatest advantage.

2. It is made the character of a wicked man, that because it is a poor man’s cause, which there is nothing to be got by, he regards not to know it, in the true state of it, for he cares not which way it goes, right or wrong. See Job xxix. 16.

3. Scornful men bring a city into a snare: but wise men turn away wrath.

See here, 1. Who are the men that are dangerous to the public; scornful men; when such are employed in the business of the state, they do things with precipitation, because they scorn to deliberate, and will not take time for consideration and consultation; they do things illegal and unjustifiable, because they scorn to be hampered by laws and constitutions; break their faith, because they scorn to be bound by their word; provoke the people, because they scorn to please them; thus they bring a city into a snare by their ill conduct, or, as the margin reads it, they set a city on fire, they saw discord among the citizens, and ran them into confusion. Those are severe men who use the oblations of conscience, the likes of another world, and every thing that is sacred and serious; such men are the plagues of their generation, they bring God's judgments upon a land, set men together by the ears, and so bring all to confusion.

2. Who are the men that are the blessings of a land; the wise men, who, by promoting religion, which is true wisdom, turn away the wrath of God, and who, by prudent counsels, reconcile contending parties, and prevent the mischievous consequences of divisions. Proud and foolish men kindle the fires which wise and good men must extinguish.

9. If a wise man contendeth with a foolish man, whether he rage or laugh, there is no rest.

A wise man is here advised not to set his wit to a fool's, not to dispute with him, or, by contending with him, to think either of fastening reason upon him, or gaining right from him; If a wise man contend with a wise man, he may hope to be understood, and, as far as he has reason and equity on his side, to carry his point, at least, to bring the controversy to a head, and make it; but if he contend with a foolish man, there is no rest; he will see no end of it, nor will he have any satisfaction in it, but must expect to be always uneasy.

1. Whether the foolish man he contends with, rage or laugh, whether he take angrily or scornfully, what is said to him, whether he rail at it or mock at it, one of the two he will do, and so there will be no rest. However it is given, it will be ill taken, and the wisest man must expect to be either scolded or ridiculed, if he contend with a fool. He that fights with a dunghill, whether he be conqueror or conquered, is sure to be defiled.

2. Whether the wise man himself rage or laugh, whether he take the serious or the jocular way of dealing with the fool, whether he be severe or pleasant with him, whether he come with a rod or with the spirit of meekness, (1 Cor. iv. 21.) it is all alike, no good is done. We have fished unto you, and ye have not danced, mourned unto you, and ye have not lamented.

10. The blood-thirsty hate the upright, but the just seek his soul.

Note. 1. Bad men hate their best friends; The blood-thirsty, all the seed of the old serpent, who was a murderer from the beginning, and inherit his enmity against the seed of the woman, they hate the upright, they seek the ruin of good men, because they condemn the wicked world, and witness against it. Christ told his disciples that they should be hated of all men. Bloody men do especially hate upright magistrates, who would restrain and reform them, and put the laws in execution against them, and so really do them a kindness.

2. Good men love their worst enemies: The just, whom the bloody men hate, seek their soul, pray for their conversion, and would gladly do any thing for their salvation. This Christ taught us, Par. 5. But he that seeketh his soul, the soul of the upright, whom the bloody hate, so it is commonly understood; seek to protect it from violence, and save it from, or avenge it at, the hands of the blood-thirsty.

11. A fool uttereth all his mind: but a wise man keepeth it till afterwards.

Note. 1. It is a piece of weakness to be very open; He is a fool who utters all his mind, who tells every thing he knows, and has in his mouth instantly whatever he has in his thoughts, and can keep no counsel; who, whatever is started in discourse, shoots his bolt; who, when he is provoked, will say any thing, and do any thing; who, when he is not himself in a continued speech, or stanch discourse, but with pauses, that he may hear what is to be objected, and answer it. Von minus interdum oratorum est tacere quam dicere—True oratory requires an occasional pause. Phil. Ep. 7. 6.

12. If a ruler hearken to lies, all his servants are wicked.

Note. 1. It is a great sin in any, especially in rulers, to hearken to lies; for thereby they not only give a wrong judgment themselves of persons and things, according to the lies they give credit to, but they encourage others to give them wrong informations. Lies will be told to those that will hearken to them; but the receiver, in this case, is as bad as the thief.

2. Those that do so will have all their servants wicked; all their servants will appear wicked, for they will have lies told of them; and they will be wicked, and what they will tell lies to them. All that have their ear will fill their ear with slanderers, and false characters and representations; and so, if princes, as well as people, will be deceived, they shall be deceived, and, instead of devolving the guilt of their own false judgments upon their servants that misinformed them, they must share in their servants' guilt, and on them will much of the blame lie for encouraging such misinformations, and giving countenance and ear to them.

13. The poor and the deceitful man meet together: the Lord lighteneth both their eyes.

This shows how wisely the great God serves the designs of his providence, by persons of very different temperaments, capacities, and conditions in the world; even,

1. By those that are contrary the one to the other. Some are poor, and forced to borrow, others are rich, have a great deal of the mammon of unrighteousness, (deceitful riches they are called,) and they are creditors, or usurers, as it is in the margin. Some are poor and honest, and laborious, others rich, slothful, and deceitful; they meet together in the business of this world, and have dealings with one another, and the Lord enlightens their eyes, he causes his sun to shine upon both, and gives them both the comforts of this life; to some of both sorts he gives his grace; he enlightens the eyes of the poor, by giving them patience, and of the deceitful, by giving them repentance, as Zacheus.

But the comfort of that sort of thing that can profit, things that can profit, would be best spared. The poor and the deceitful we are ready to lock upon as blasphemers of Providence, but God makes even them to display the beauty of Providence; he has wise ends not only in leaving the poor always with us, but in permitting the deceived and the deceiving to live and work together, and in giving the sunshine of grace and blessing upon both. All the deceitful are not wicked, and all the poor are not destitute and in want of assistance. Some of the poor have money, and are able to relieve the needful, and to give charity to the poor, who have nothing, to make them happy, and to comfort them, and to give them that grace which is better than wealth.
ceiver, for both are his, (Job xii. 16.) and turn to his praise.

14. The king that faithfully judgeth the poor, his throne shall be established for ever.

Here is, 1. The duty of magistrates, and that is, to judge faithfully between man and man, and to determine all causes brought before them, according to truth and equity; particularly to take care of the poor; not to countenance them in an unjust cause, for the sake of their poverty, (Exod. xxii. 3.) but to see that their poverty do not turn to their prejudice, if they have a just cause. The rich will seek them themselves, but the poor, and needy the prince must defend, (Ps. lxxxii. 7.) and plead for, Prov. xxxi. 9.

2. The happiness of those magistrates that do their duty; their throne of honour, their tribunal of judgment, shall be established for ever. This will secure to them the favour of God, and strengthen their interest in the affections of their people, both which will be the establishment of their power, and help to transmit it to posterity, and perpetuate it in the family.

15. The rod and reproof give wisdom: but a child left to himself bringeth his mother to shame.

Parents, in educating their children, must consider,

1. The benefit of due correction. They must not only tell their children what is good and evil, but they must chide them, and correct them too, if need be, when they either neglect that which is good, or do that which is evil. If a reproof will serve without the rod, it is well, but the rod must never be used without a rational and grave reproof; and then, though it may be a present uneasiness both to the father and to the child, yet with much wisdom, Vexatio dat intellectum—Vexatio sharpeneth the intellect. The child will take warning, and so will get wisdom.

2. The mischief of undue indulgence; A child that is not restrained or reproofed, but is left to himself, as Adonijah was, to follow his own inclinations, he may do well if he will, but if he take to ill courses, nobody will hinder him, it is a thousand to one to the child bringing a disgrace to his family, and brings his mother, who fondled him, and humored him in his licentiousness, to shame, to poverty, to reproach, and perhaps will himself be abusive to her, and give her ill language.

16. When the wicked are multiplied, transgression increaseth: but the righteous shall see their fall.

Note, 1. The more sinners there are, the more sin there is; When the wicked, being countenanced by authority, grow numerous, and walk on every side, no marvel if transgression increases, as a plague in the country is said to increase, when still more and more are infected with it. Transgression grows more impudent and bold, more imperious and threatening, when there are many to keep it in countenance. In the old world, when men began to multiply, they began to degenerate, and to corrupt themselves and one another.

2. The more sin there is, the nearer is the ruin threatened. Let not the righteous have their faith and hope shocked by the increase of sin and sinners; let them not say that they have cleaned their hands in vain, or that God has forsaken the earth, but wait with patience; the transgressors shall fall, the measure of their iniquity will be full, and then they shall fall from their dignity and power; and fall into dis-grace and destruction; and the righteous shall have the satisfaction of seeing their fall, (Ps. xxxix. 24.) perhaps in this world, at furthest, in the judgment of the great day, when the fall of God's implacable enemies will be the joy and triumph of glorified saints. See Isa. lxvi. 24. Gen. xix. 28.

17. Correct thy son, and he shall give thee rest: yea, he shall give delight unto thy soul.

Note, 1. It is a very happy thing when children prove the comfort of their parents; good children are so; they give them rest, make them easy, and free from the many cares they have had concerning them; yea, they give delight unto their souls. It is a pleasure to parents, which none know but those that are blessed with it, to see the happy fruit of their good education thrice, but should then the children cease, and to have a prospect of their well-doing for both worlds; it gives delight proportionable to the many thoughts of heart that have been concerning them.

2. In order to this, children must be trained up under a strict discipline, and not suffered to do what they will, and to go without rebuke when they do amiss. The foolishness bound up in their hearts must by correction be driven out, when they are young, or it will break out, to their own and their parents' shame, when they are grown up.

18. Where there is no vision, the people perish: but he that keepeth the law, happy is he.

See here, 1. The misery of the people that want a settled ministry; Where there is no vision, no prophet to expound the law, no priest or Levite to teach the good knowledge of the Lord, no means of grace, the word of the Lord is scarce, there is no open vision; (1 Sam. iii. 1.) where it is so, the people perish; the word has many significations, any of which will apply here; (1.) The people are made naked, stripped of their ornaments, and so exposed to shame; stripped of their armour, and so exposed to danger. How bare does a place look, without Bibles and ministers, and what an easy prey is it to the enemy of souls! (2.) The people rebel, not only against God, but against their prince; good preaching would make people good subjects, but, for want of it, they are turbulent and factious, and despire dominions, because they know no better. (3.) The people are idle, or they play, as the scholars are apt to do when the master is absent; they do nothing to any good purpose, but stand all the day idle, and sporting in the market-place, for want of instruction what to do, and how to do it. (4.) They are scattered as sheep having no shepherd, for want of the masters of assemblies to call them and keep them together, Mark vi. 34. They are scattered from God and their duty by apostacies, from one another by divisions; God is provoked to scatter them by his judgments, 2 Chron. xxv. 3. (5.) They perish; they are destroyed for lack of knowledge, Hos. iv. 6. See what reason we have to be thankful to God for the plenty of open vision which we enjoy!

2. The felicity of a people that have not only a settled, but a successful, ministry among them; the people that hear and keep the law, among whom religion is uppermost; happy is such a people, and every particular person among them. It is not having the law, but obeying it, and living up to it, that will entitle us to blessedness.

19. A servant will not be corrected by words; for though he understand, he will not answer.
Here is the description of an unprofitable, slothful, wicked, servant; a slave that serves not from conscience, or love, but purely from fear. Let those that have such servants put on patience to bear the vexation, and not disturb themselves at it. See their character.

1. No rational words will work upon them; they will not be corrected and reformed, not brought to their business, nor cured of their idleness and laziness, by fair means, no, nor by foul words; even the most gentle master will be forced to use severity with them; no reason will serve their turn, for they are unreasonable.

2. No rational words will be got from them; they are dogged and sullen; and though they understand the questions you ask them, they will not give you an answer; though you make it ever so plain to them, what you expect from them, they will not promise to mend what is amiss, or to mind their business. See the folly of those servants whose mouth by their silence calls for strokes; they might be corrected by words, and save blows, but they will not.

20. Seest thou a man that is hasty in his words? there is more hope of a fool than of him.

Solomon here shows that there is little hope of bringing a man to wisdom that is hasty, either,

1. Through rashness and inconsideration; Seek thou a man that is hasty in his matters, that is of a light, desultory, wit, that seems to take a thing quick, but takes it by the halves, gallops over a book or science, but takes no time to digest it, no time to pause or muse upon a business. There is more hope of making a scholar, and a wise man, of one that is dull and heavy, and slow in his studies, than of one that has such a mercurial genius, and cannot fix.

2. Through pride and conceit; Seek thou a man that is forward to speak to every matter that is started, and affects to speak first to it, to open it, and speak last to it, to give judgment upon it, as if he were an oracle? There is more hope of a modest fool, who is sensible of his folly, than of such a self-conceited one.

21. He that delicately bringeth up a servant from a child, shall have him become his son at the length.

Note, 1. It is an im prudent thing in a master to be too fond of a servant, to advance him too fast, and admit him to be too familiar with him; to suffer him to be over-nice and curious in his diet, and clothing, and lodging, and so to bring him up delicately, because he is a favourite, and an agreeable servant; it should be remembered that he is a servant, and, by being thus indulged, will be spoiled for any other place. Servants must endure hardness.

2. It is an ungrateful thing in a servant, but what is very common, to behave himself insolently, because he has been used tenderly. The humble prophet thinks himself unworthy to be called a son, and is content to be a servant; the pampered slave thinks himself too good to be called a servant, and will be a son at the length, will take his ease and liberty, will be on a par with his master, and perhaps pretend to the inheritance. Let masters give their servants that which is equal and fit for them, and neither more nor less. This is very applicable to the body, which is a servant to the soul; those that delicately bring up the body, that humour it, and are over-tender of it, will find that at length it will forget its place, and become a son, a master, a perfect tyrant.

22. An angry man stirreth up strife, and a furious man aboundeth in transgression.

See here the mischief that flows from an angry, passionate, furious disposition.

1. It makes men provoking to one another; An angry man stirreth up strife, is troublesome and quarrelsome in the family and in the neighbourhood, blows the coals, and even forces those to fall out with him that would live peaceably and quietly by him.

2. It makes men provoking to God; A furious man, which is wedded to his humors and passions, which but brings him in transgressions; that is a sin which is the case of many; not only hinges men from calling upon God's name, but it occasions their swearing and cursing, and profaning God's name.

23. A man's pride shall bring him low: but honour shall uphold the humble in spirit.

This agrees with what Christ said more than once. That those who exalt themselves shall be abased. They that think to gain respect by lifting up themselves above their rank, by looking high, talking big, appearing fine, and upholding themselves, will, on the contrary, expose themselves to contempt, lose their reputation, and provoke God by humbling providences to bring them down and lay them low.

2. That those who humble themselves shall be exalted, and shall be established in their dignity; Honour shall uphold the humble in spirit; their humility is their honour, and that shall make them truly and safely great, and recommend them to the esteem of all that are wise and good.

24. Whoso is partner with a thief hateth his own soul: he heareth cursing, and bewrayeth it not.

See here what sin and ruin they involve themselves in, who are drawn away by the enticements of sinners.

1. They incur a great deal of guilt; He docth so, that goes partner with such as rob and defraud, and casts in his lot among them, ch. 1. 11, &c. The receiver is as bad as the thief; and, being drawn in to join with him in the pursuit of the sin, he cannot escape joining with him in the concealment of it, though it be with the most horrid perjuries and execrations. They hear cursing, when they are sworn to tell the whole truth, but they will not confess.

2. They hasten to utter ruin; they even hate their own souls, for they wilfully do that which will be the inevitable destruction of them. See the absurdities sinners are guilty of; they love death, than which nothing is more dreadful, and hate their own souls, than which nothing is more dear.

25. The fear of man bringeth a snare: but whoso putteth his trust in the Lord shall be safe.

Here, 1. We are cautioned not to dread the power of man; neither the power of a prince, nor the power of the multitude; both are formidable enough, but the slavish fear of either brings a snare, exposes men to many insults; (some take a pride in terrifying the timorous;) or, rather, exposes men to many temptations. Abraham, for fear of man, denied his wife, and Peter his Master, and, in one case God was appearing in the clouds, and in the other God was appearing in the flesh; Dan. iii. 16. Ps. cxviii. 6. He must himself die, (Isa. li. 12) and can but kill our body, Luke xii. 5.
2. We are encouraged to depend upon the power of God, which would keep us from all that fear of man, which has either torment or temptation in it. Whoso puts his trust in the Lord, for protection and supply in the way of duty, he shall be set on high, above the counsel of man, and above the fear of that power. A holy confidence in God makes a man both great and easy, and enables him to look with a gracious contempt upon the most formidable designs of hell and earth against him. If God be my Salvation, I will trust, and not be afraid.

26. Many seek the ruler’s favour; but every man’s judgment cometh from the Lord.

See here, 1. What is the common course men take to advance and enrich themselves, and make themselves great; they seek the ruler’s favour, and, as if all their judgment proceeded from him, to him they make all their court. Solomon was himself a ruler, and knew what seductivity men made their application to him, some on one count, others on another, but all for his favour. It is the way of the world to make interest with great men, and expect much from the smiles of second causes, which yet are uncertain, and frequently disappoint them. Many take a great deal of pains in seeking the ruler’s favour, and yet cannot have it; many have it for a little while, but they cannot keep themselves in it, by some little turn or other they are brought under his displeasure; many have it, and keep it, and yet it does not answer their expectation, they cannot make that hand of it, that they promised themselves they should. Haman had the ruler’s favour, and yet it availed him nothing.

2. What is the wisest course men can take to be happy; let them look up to God, and seek the favour of the Ruler of rulers; for every man’s judgment proceedeth from the Lord. It is not with us as with the ruler pleases; his favour cannot make us happy; his frowns cannot make us miserable; but it is as God pleases; every creature is that to us that God makes it to be, no more and no other; he is the first Cause on which all second causes depend; if he help not, they cannot, 2 Kings vi. 27. Job xxxiv. 29.

27. An unjust man is an abomination to the just; and he that is upright in the way, is abomination to the wicked.

This bespeaks not only the innate contrariety that there is between virtue and vice, as between light and darkness, fire and water, but the old enmity that has always been between the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent, Gen. iii. 15.

1. All that are sanctified have a rooted antipathy to wickedness and wicked people. They have a good will to the souls of all; (God has so, and would have none perish;) but they hate the ways and practices of those that are impious toward God, and injurious toward him, they cannot help of them, or speak of them, without a holy indignation, because they do naught the society of the ungodly and unjust, and dread the thought of giving them any countenance, but do all they can to bring the wickedness of the wicked to an end. Thus an unjust man makes himself odious to the just, and it is one part of his present shame and punishment, that good men cannot endure him.

2. All that are unsanctified have a like rooted antipathy to godliness and godly people; He that is upright in the way, that makes conscience of what he says and does, is an abomination to the wicked, whose wickedness is restrained perhaps, and suppressed, or, however, shamed and condemned, by the uprightness of the upright. Thus Cain did, who was of his father the devil. And this is not only the wickedness of the wicked, that they hate those whom God loves, but their misery too, that they hate those whom they shall shortly see in everlasting bliss and honour, and who shall have dominion over them in the morning, Ps. xlix. 14.

CHAP. XXX.

This and the following chapter are an appendix to Solomon’s proverbs; but they are both expressly called prophesies, in the first verses of both; by which it appears that the penmen of them, whoever they were, were divinely inspired. This chapter is penned by one that bears the name of Agur Ben Jakeh. What tribe he was of, or when he lived, we are not told; what he wrote, being ended by the Holy Ghost, is here kept upon record. We have here, I. His confession of faith, v. 1–2. II. His injuries, v. 3–5. III. His judgments, v. 6–9. IV. His advice, v. 10–19. V. Words of wisdom, v. 10–31. Sermons to the rich, v. 10–14. IV. Wicked generations, v. 11–14. V. Four things insatiable, (v. 15, 16,) to which is added, fair warning to undutiful children, v. 17. VI. Four things unsearchable, v. 18–20. VII. Four things intolerable, v. 21–23. VIII. Four things little and wise, v. 24–25. IX. Four things stately, v. 29 to the end.

1. THE words of Agur the son of Jakeh, even the prophecy: The man spake unto Ithiel, even unto Ithiel and Ucal.

2. Surely I am more brutish than any man, and have not the understanding of a man. 3. I neither learned wisdom, nor have the knowledge of the holy. 4. Who hath ascended up into heaven, or descended? who hath gathered the wind in his fists? who hath bound the waters in a garment? who hath established all the ends of the earth? what is his name, and what is his son’s name, if thou canst tell? 5. Every word of God is pure; he is a shield unto them that put their trust in him. 6. Add thou not unto his words, lest he reprove thee, and thou be found a liar.

Some make Agur to be not the name of this author, but his character; he was a collector, so it signifies; a gatherer; one that did not compose things himself, but collected the wise sayings and observations of others; made abstracts of the writings of others; which some think is the reason why he says, I have not learned wisdom myself, but have been a scribe, or amanuensis, to other wise and learned men.” Note, We must not bury our talent, though it be but one, but, as we have received the gift, so minister the same, if it be but to collect what others have written. But we rather suppose it to be his name, which, no doubt, was well known then, though not mentioned elsewhere in scripture.

Ithiel and Ucal are mentioned, either,

As the names of his pupils, whom he instructed, or who consulted him as an oracle, having a great opinion of his wisdom and goodness. Probably, they wrote from him what he dictated, as Baruch wrote from the mouth of Jeremiah, and by their means it was preserved, and they were ready to attest it to be his, for it was spoken to them; they were two witnesses of it. Or,

2. As the subject of his discourse. Ithiel signifies God with me, the application of Immortal, God with us. The word calls him God with us, faith appropriates this, and calls him “God with me, who loved me, and gave himself for me, and into union and communion with whom I am admitted.” Ucal signifies The Mighty One, for it is upon one that is mighty, that help is laid for. Many good interpreters therefore apply this to the Messiah, for to him all the prophecies bear witness, and why not this then? It is what Agur spake concerning Ishiel, even concerning Ishiel (that is the name on which the stress is laid) and Ucal. The mighty God, (Isa. ix. 6.) with us, Isa. vii. 14.

Three things the prophet here aims at,
1. To absolve himself. Before he makes confession of his faith, he makes confession of his folly, and the weakness and deficiency of reason, which make it so necessary that we be guided and governed by faith. Others, when concerning the Saviour, he speaks of himself as needing a Saviour, and as nothing without him; we must go out of ourselves before we go into Jesus Christ.

2. He speaks of himself as wanting a righteousness, and having done foolishly, very foolishly. When he reflects upon himself, he owns, Surely I am more brutish than any man. Every man is become brutish, Jer. x. 14. But he that knows his own heart, knows as much more evil of himself than he does of any other, that he cries out, "Surely I cannot but think that I am more brutish than any man, surely no man has such a corrupt deceitful heart as I have. I have acted as one that has not the understanding of Adam, as one that is wretchedly degenerated from the knowledge and righteousness in which man was at first created; may, I have not the common sense and reason of a man, else I had not done as I have done." Agur, when he was apparelled in glory, as wiser than most, acknowledges himself more foolish than any. Whatever high opinions others may have of us, it becomes us to have low thoughts of ourselves.

3. He speaks of himself as wanting a revelation to guide him in the ways of truth and wisdom. He owns, (v. 3.) "I neither learned wisdom by any power of my own, the depths of it cannot be fathomcd by my line and plummet, nor know I the knowledge of the holy ones, the angels, our first parents in innocency, nor of the holy things of God, I cannot get no insight into them, nor make any judgment of them, further than God is pleased to make them known to me." The natural man, the natural powers, perceive not, nor they receive not, the things of the Spirit of God. Some suppose Agur to be asked, as Apollo's oracle was of old, Who was the wisest man? The answer is, He that is sensible of his own ignorance, especially in divine things. Hoc tantum sed, me nihil scire—All that I know is, that I know nothing.

II. To advance Jesus Christ, and the Father in him; (v. 4.) Who hath ascended up into heaven, &c.

1. Some understand this of God, and of his works, which are both incomparable and unsearchable. He challenges all mankind to give an account of the heavens above, of the winds, the waters, the earth; "Who can pretend to have ascended up to heaven, to take a view of the orbs above, and then to have descended, to give an account of them? Who can pretend to have had the command of the winds, to have grasped them in his hand, and managed them, as God does, or to have bound the waves of the sea with a swelling band, as God has done? Who has established the ends of the earth, or can describe the strength of its foundations, or the extent of its limits? Tell me what is the man's name who can undertake to vie with God, or to be of his cabinet counsellor, if he be not the end to whom God has added this great secret.

2. Others refer it to Christ, to Ishiel and Ucal, the Son of God, for it is the Son's name, as well as the Father's, that is here inquired after, and a challenge given to any to compare with him. We must now exalt Christ as one revealed, they then magnified him as one concealed; as one they had heard something of, but had very dark and defective ideas of. We have heard the fame of him with our ears, but cannot describe him; (Job xxxviii. 22.) certainly it is God that has gathered the wind in his fists, and bound the waters as in a garment; but what is his name? It is, I am that I am, (Exod. iii. 14.) a name to be adored, not to be understood. What is his Son's name, by whom he doth all these things? The Old-Testament saints expected the Messiah to be the Son of the Blessed, and he is here spoken of as a Person distinct from the Father, but his name as yet secret. Note, The great Redeemer, in the glories of his own person, can neither be paralleled, nor found out to perfection. (1.) The glories of the kingdom of his grace are unsearchable and unparalleled; for who besides has ascended into heaven, or descended? Who besides is perfectly acquainted with both worlds, and has himself a free correspondence with both, and is therefore fit to settle a correspondence between them, as Mediator, as Jacob's ladder? He was in heaven in the Father's bosom, (John i. 1, 18.) thence he descended to take our nature upon him; and never was there such condescension! In that nature he again ascended, (Eph. iv. 9.) to receive the promised glories of his exalted state; and who besides has done this? Rom. x. 6. (2.) The glories of the kingdom of his providence are likewise unsearchable and unparalleled. The same that reconciles heaven and earth was the Creator of both, and governs and dispenses all. He specifies in his government the three lesser elements of creation, air, earth, and water, (Gen. i. 7.) and the motions of the air are of his directing. Satan pretends to be the prince of the power of the air, but even there Christ has all power, he rebuked the winds, and they obeyed him. (2.) The bounds of the water are of his appointing; He binds them as in a garment; hitherto shall they come, and no further, Job xxxviii. 9. [3.] The foundations of the earth are of his establishing; he founded it at first, he upholds it still; if Christ had not interposed, the earth would have sunk under the load of the curse upon the ground, for man's sin. Who, and what, is the mighty He that doeth all this? We cannot find out God, nor the Son of God, unto perfection. Oh the depth of that knowledge!

III. To assure us of the truth of the word of God, and to recommend it to us, v. 5, 6. Agur's pupils expect to be instructed by him in the things of God; Alas," says he, "I cannot undertake to instruct you; go to the word of God, see what he has there revealed to himself, and to the world for you, and you shall need know no more than what that will teach you, and that you may rely upon, as sure and sufficient. Every word of God is pure; there is not the least mixture of falsehood and corruption in it." The words of men are to be heard and read with jealousy, and with allowance, but there is not the least ground to suspect any deficiency in the Word of God; it is as silver purified seven times, (Ps. xii. 6.) without any mixture of alloy; Thy word is very pure, Ps. cxix. 140.

1. It is sure, and therefore we must trust to it, and venture our souls upon it. God in his word, God in his promise, is a Shield, a sure Protection, to all them that put themselves under his protection, and put their trust in him. The word of God, applied by faith, will make us easy in the midst of the greatest dangers, Ps. lxi. 1, 2.

2. It is true, and therefore we must not add to it; (v. 6.) Add thou not unto his words, because they are pure and perfect. This forbids the advancing of any thing, not only in contradiction to the word of God, but in competition with it; though it be under the plausible pretence of explaining it, yet if it pretend to be of equal authority with it, it is adding to his words, which is not only a reproach to them as insufficient, but opens a door to all manner of errors and corruptions; for, that one absurdi-

7. Two things have I required of thee; deny me them not before I die: 3. Remove far from me vanity and lies; give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me; 9. Lest I be full, and deny thee, and say, Who is the Lord? or lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain.

After Agur's confession and creed, here follows his litany; where we may observe,
I. The preface to his prayer; Two things have I required, that is, requested, of thee, O God.
Before we pray to pray, it is good to consider what we need, and what the things are which we have to ask of God. What does our case require? What do our hearts desire? What would we that God should do for us? That we may not be seek for our petition and request, when we should be presenting it.
He begs, Deny me not before I die. In praying, we should think of dying, and pray accordingly. "Lord, give me pardon, and peace, and grace, before I die, before I go hence, and be no more; for if I be not renewed in grace before I die, it will not be done after; if I do not prevail in prayer before I die, prayers after will not prevail, no, not Lord, Lord.
There is none of this wisdom or working in the grace. Deny me not thy grace, for thou do, I die; I perish, if thou be silent to me, I am like them that go down to the pit, Ps. xxviii. 1. Deny me not before I die; as long as I continue in the land of the living, let me continue under the conduct of thy grace and good providence."

II. The prayer itself; the two things he requires, grace sufficient, and food convenient.
1. Grace sufficient for his soul; "Remove from me vanity and lies; deliver me from sin, from all corrupt principles, practices, and affections, from crime and mistake, which are at the bottom of all sin; from the love of the world and the things of it, which are all vanity and a lie." Some understand it as a prayer for the pardon of sin; an when God forgets sin, he removes it, he takes it away. Or rather, it is a prayer of the same import with that, Lead us not into temptation. Nothing is more mischievous to us than sin, and therefore there is nothing which we should more earnestly pray against than that we may do no evil.

2. Food convenient for his body. Having prayed for the operations of divine grace, he here begs the provisions of the body, that we may live as extend to the good, and not to the prejudice of the soul.

(1.) He prays, that, of God's free gift, he might receive a competent portion of the good things of this life; "Feed me with the bread of my allowance; such bread as thou finitest fit to allow me." As to all the gifts of the Divine Providence, we must refer ourselves to the Divine Wisdom. Or, "the bread that is fit for me, as a man, a master of a family; that which is agreeable to my rank and condition in the world." For as is the man, so is his competency.
Oft he seems to refer to this, when he teaches us to pray, and grants us the spirit that is, as this seems to refer to Jacob's vow, in which he wished for no more than bread to eat, and rainment to put on. Food convenient for us is what we ought to content with, though we have not dainties, va-ricies, and superfluities; what is for necessity, though we have not for delight and ornament; and it is what we may in faith pray for, and depend upon God for.

(2.) He prays that he may be kept from every condition of life that would be a temptation to him.
[1.] He prays against the extremes of abundance and want; Give me neither poverty nor riches. He does not hereby prescribe to God, nor pretend to 教 him what condition he shall allot to him, nor does he pray against poverty or riches absolutely, as in themselves evil, for either of them, by the grace of God, may be sanctified, and be a means of good to us. Lest I be full, God hereby intends to express the value which wise and good men have for a middle state of life, and, with submission to the will of God, desires that that might be his state; neither great honour, nor great contempt. We must learn how to manage both. (as St. Paul. Phil. iv. 12.)
but rather wish to be always between both. Optimus peccuniae modus qui nec in pamperturit eedit, nec procurat a pauperture discidit.—The best condition is that which neither is too favours, nor there is a recrudescence. Secondly, He here intimates a holy jealousy he had of himself, that he could not keep his ground against the temptations either of an afflicted, or a prosperous, condition. Others may preserve their i nTEGRITY in either, but as he is afraid of both, and dependence grace teaches him to pray against riches, as much as nature against poverty; but the will of the Lord be done.

[2.] He gives a pious reason for his prayer; (v. 9.)
He does not pray for such a supply as will be in a manner burdensome, and envied by his neighbours, and eaten up with a multitude of servants; as, "Lest I be poor, and trampled on, and forced to work hard, and fare hard;" but, "Lest I be rich, and sin, and poor, and sin." Sin is that which a good man is afraid of in every condition, and under every event; witness Nehemiah, (ch. vi. 13.)
that he should be afraid, and do so, and sin.

First. He dreads the temptations of a prosperous condition, and therefore even deprecates that; Lest I be full, and deny thee, (as Jeshurun, who wazed fat, and kicked, and forsook God who made him, Deut. xxxii. 15.) and say, as Pharaoh in his pride,
Who is the Lord, that I should obey his voice? Prosperity makes people proud, and forgetful of God, as if they had no need of him, and were therefore under no obligation to him. What can the Almighty do with him to whom he aught? and what will they do for him? Even good men are afraid of the worst sins, so deceitful do they think their own hearts to be; and they know that the greatest gains of the world will not balance the least guilt.

Secondly, He dreads the temptations of a poor condition, and for that reason, and no other, deprecates that, Lest I be poor, and steal. Poverty is a strong temptation to sin. Lest I steal. Riches are overcome by, who are also ready to think it will be their excuse; but it will not bear them out at God's bar, any more than at men's, to say, "I stole because I was poor;" yet if a man steal for the satisficing of his soul when he is hungry, it is a case of compassion, (ch. vi. 30.) and what even those that have some principles of honesty in them may be drawn to. But observe why Aguare dreads this; not because he should endanger himself by it, "Lest I steal, and be hanged for it, while, put into the stocks, or sold for a bondman; and as among the Jews poor thieves were, who had not wither-where to make restitution; but lest he should dishonour God by it; "Lest I should steal, and take the name of my God in vain, discredit my professorship of religion by practices disagreeable to it." Or, "Lest I steal, and, when I am charged with it, for-wear myself." He therefore dreads one sin, because it would draw on another, for the way of sin is downward. Oh, sirs! He calls God his God, and therefore he is afraid of doing any thing to offend him, because of the relation he stands in to him.

10. Accuse not a servant unto his master, lest he curse thee, and thou be found guilty. 11. There is a generation that cureath their father, and doth not bless their mother. 12. There is a generation that are pure in their own eyes, and yet is not washed from their filthines. 13. There is a generation, O how lofty are their eyes! and their eye-lids are lifted up. 14. There is a generation whose teeth are as swords, and their jaw-teeth as knives, to devour the poor from off the earth, and the needy from among men.

Here is, 1. A caution not to abuse other people's servants any more than our own, nor to make mischief between them and their masters, for it is an ill office, invidious, and what will make a man odious, v. 10. Consider, (1.) It is an injury to the servant, whose poor condition makes him an object of pity, and therefore it is barbarous to add affiliation to him that is afflicted; "Hurt not a servant with thy tongue, so the margin reads it; for it argues a sordid disposition to snite any body secretly with the scourge of the tongue, especially a servant, who is not a match for us, and whom we should rather protect, if his master be severe with him, than exasperate him more. (2.) "It will perhaps be an injury to thyself; if a servant be thus provoked, perhaps he will curse thee, and bring thee into trouble; or give thee an ill word, and blemish thy reputation; or appeal to God against thee, and imprecate his wrath upon thee, who is the Patron and Protector of oppressed innocence."

2. An account, upon occasion of this caution, of some wicked generations of men, that are justly abominable to all that are virtuous and good.

(1.) Such as are abusive to their parents, give them bad language, and wish them ill; call them beggars, and actually injure them; as is the generation of such; young men of that black character commonly herd together, and irritate one another against their parents; a generation of vipers they are, who curse either their natural parents, or their magistrates, or their ministers, because they cannot endure the yoke; and they are near of kin to them, who, though they are not yet arrived at such a pitch of wickedness as to curse their parents, yet do not love them, cannot give them a good word, and will not pray for them.

(2.) Such as are conceited of themselves, and, under a show and pretence of sanctity, hide from others, and perhaps from themselves too, abundance of reigning wickedness in secret; (v. 12.)

they are pure in their own eyes, as if they were in all respects such as they should be: they have a very good opinion of themselves and their own character, that they are not only righteous, but rich and increased with goods, (Rev. iii. 17.) and yet are not cleansed from their filthiness, the filthiness of their hearts, which they pretend to be the best part of them; they are, it may be, swept and garnished, but they are not washed, not sanctified; as the Pharisees that within were full of all uncleanness, Matth. xxiii. 25, 26.

(3.) Such as are haughty and scornful to those about them, v. 13. He speaks of them with amazement at their intolerable pride and insolence; O how lofty are their eyes! With what disdain do they look upon their neighbours, as not worthy to be set with the dogs of their flock! What a distance do they expect every body should keep; and when they look upon themselves, how do they strut and vault, like the peacock, thinking they make themselves illustrious, when really they make themselves ridiculous! There is a generation of such,

on whom he that resists the proud will pour con-

(4.) Such as are cruel to the poor, and barbarous to all that lie at their mercy; (v. 14.) their teeth are iron and steel, swords and knives, instruments of cruelty, with which they devour the poor with the greatest pleasure imaginable, and as greedily as hungry men cut their meat, and eat it. God has so ordered it, that the poor we shall have always with us, that they shall never cease out of the land;

but there are those who, because they hate to receive the poor should, if they could, abolish them from the earth, from among men; especially God's poor.

Some understand it of those who wound and ruin others by slanders and false accusations, and severe censures of their everlasting state; their tongues, and their teeth too, (which are likewise organs of speech,) are as swords and knives, Ps. lvi. 4.

15. The horse-leech hath two daughters, crying, Give, give. There are three things that are never satisfied, no, four things say not. It is enough: 16. The grave; and the barren womb; the earth that is not filled with water; and the fire, that saith not, It is enough. 17. The eye that mocketh at his father; and despiseth to obey his mother, the ravens of the valley shall pick it out, and the young eagles shall eat it.

He had spoken before of these that devoured the poor, (v. 14.) and had spoken of them last, as the worst of all the four generations there mentioned;

now here he speaks of their insatiableness in doing this. The temper that puts them upon it is made up of cruelty and covetousness; these are two daughters of the horse-leech. his genuine offspring, that still cry, "Give, give, give more blood, give more money;" for the bloody are still blood-thirsty; yet, drunk with blood, they add thirst to their drunkenness, and will seek it yet again. They also that love silver shall never be satisfied with silver.

Thus, while from these two principles they are devouring the poor, they are continually uneasy to themselves, as David's enemies, Ps. lxx. 14, 15.

Now, 1. For the further illustration of this, he specifies four other things which are insatiable, to which these devourers are compared, which say not, It is enough; or, It is wealth. These are never rich that are always coveting. Now these four things that are always craving, are, (1.) The grave in which multitudes fall, and yet still more will fall, and it swallows them all up, and returns none. Hell and destruction are never full, ch. xxvi. 20. When it comes to our turn, we shall find the grave ready for us, Job xvi. 1. (2.) The barren womb, which is impatience of its affliction in being barren, and cries, as Rachel did, Give me children. (3.) The parched ground in time of drought, (especially in those hot countries,) which still soaks in the rain that comes in abundance upon it, and in a little time it wants for any more rain. For the rain has consumed abundance of fuel, yet still devours all the combustible matter that is thrown into it. So insatiable are the corrupt desires of sinners, and so little satisfaction have they even in the gratification of them.

2. He adds a terrible threatening to disobedient children, (v. 17) for warning to the first of those four wicked generations that curse their parents, (v. 11) and shows here, (1.) Who they are that belong to that generation, not only they that curse their parents in heat and passion, but, [1.] They that mock at them, though it be but with a scornful eye, looking with disdain upon them, because of their bodily infirmities, or looking sour or dogged at them when they instruct or command, impatient at their checks, and angry at them. God takes notice with what eye children look upon their parents, and will reckon for the heering look and the cast of an evil eye, as well as for bad language given them. [2.] They that despise to obey them, that think it a thing below them to be dutiful to their parents, especially to the mother, they scorn to be controlled by her; and thus she that bare them in sorrow, in greater sorrow bears their manners. (2.) What their doom will be. They that dishonour their parents shall be set up as monuments of God’s vengeance; they shall be hanged in chains, as it were, for the birds of prey to pick out their eyes, those eyes with which they looked so scornfully on their good parents. The dead bodies of malefactors were not to hang all night, but before night the ravens would have picked out their eyes. If men do not punish undutiful children, God will, and will load those with the greatest infamy that conduct themselves haughtily toward their parents. Many who have come to an ignominious end, have owned that the wicked courses that brought them to it began in contumacy of their parents’ authority.

18. There be three things which are too wonderful for me, yea, four which I know not: 19. The way of an eagle in the air, the way of a serpent upon a rock, the way of a ship in the midst of the sea, and the way of a man with a maid. 20. Such is the way of an adulterous woman; she eateth, and wipeth her mouth, and saith, I have done no wickedness. 21. For three things the earth is disquieted, and for four which it cannot bear: 22. For a servant when he reigneth, and a fool when he is filled with meat; 23. For an odious woman when she is married, and a handmaid that is heir to her mistress.

1. An account of four things that are unsavourable, too wonderful to be fully known. And here,
2. The three first are natural things, and are only designed as comparisons for the illustration of the last, which is not without meaning. (1.) An eagle in the air; which way shall she fly? (2.) A serpent upon a rock. The way of a serpent in the sand we may find by the track, but not of a serpent upon the hard rock; nor can we describe how a serpent will, without a little time creep to the top of a rock. (3.) A ship in the midst of the sea. The leviathan, indeed, makes a path to shine after him, one would think the deep to be hoary, (Job xii. 22.) but this ship is moved by the winds; it is so tossed upon the waves, that one would wonder how it lives at sea, and gains its point. The kingdom of nature is full of wonders; marvellous things which the God of nature does, past finding out.

2. The fourth is a mystery of iniquity, more unaccountable than any of these; it belongs to the depths of Satan, that deceitfulness and that desparate wickedness, which none can know, Jer. xvii. 9. It is twofold:

(1.) The cursed arts which a vile adulterer has to debauch a maid, and to persuade her to yield to his wicked and abominable lust; this is what a wanton poet wrote a whole book of, long since, De arte amandi—On the art of love. By what pretensions and protestations of love, and all its powerful charms, promises of marriage, assurances of secrecy and reward, is many an unwary virgin beguiled to her destruction, thereby spoiling her mind and soul, and all to a base traitor; for so all sinful lust is in the kingdom of love. The more artfully the temptation is managed, the more watchful and resolute ought every pure heart to be against it.

(2.) The cursed arts which a vile adulteress has to conceal her wickedness, especially from her husband, from whom she treacherously departs; so close are her intrigues with her lewd companions, and so cleverly she so manages that although you should discover her as to track an eagle in the air. She eats the forbidden fruit, after the similitude of Adam’s transgression, and then wipes her mouth, that it may not betray itself, and, with a bold and impudent face, says, I have done no wickedness. [1.] To the world she denies the fact, and is ready to swear it, that she is as chaste and modest as any woman, and never did the wickedness she is suspected of. They are works of darkness, which are disobedient to the light of nature. To her own conscience (if she have any left) she denies the fault, and will not own that that great wickedness is any wickedness at all, but an innocent entertainment. See Hos. xii. 7, 8. Thus multitudes ruin their souls by calling evil good, and out-facing their convictions with a self-justification.

II. An account of four things that are intolerable, that is, four sorts of persons that are very troublesome to the places where they live, and the relations and companies they are in; the earth is disquieted for them, and groans under them as a burden it cannot bear, and they are all much alike.

1. A servant when he is advanced, and intrusted with power, who is, of all others, most insolent and impetuous; witness Tobiah the servant, the Ammonite, Neh. ii. 10. 2. A fool, a silly, rude, boisterous, vicious, man, when he is grown rich, and is partaking of the pleasures of the table, will disturb all the company with his eating, and the affairs he will put upon those about him. 3. An ill-natured, cross-grained, woman, when she gets a husband; who, having made herself Odysseus by her pride and sourness, so that one would not have thought any body should have loved her, yet, if at last she be married, that honourable estate makes her more intolerably scornful and spiteful than ever. It is a pity that which should sweeten the disposition, should have a contrary effect. A good-natured woman, when she is married, will be yet more obliging. 4. An old maid- servant that has prevailed with her mistress, by humouring her, and, as we
4. The spider; an insect, but as great an instance of industry in our houses as the ants are in the field. Spiders are very ingenious in weaving their webs, with a fineness and exactness, such as no art can pretend to come near; They take hold with their hands, and spin a fine thread out of their own bowels, with a great deal of art; and they are not only in poor men's cottages, but in kings' palaces, notwithstanding all the care that is there taken to destroy them. Providence wonderfully keeps up those kinds of creatures, not only which men provide not for, but which every man's hand is against, and seeks the destruction of. These that will mind their business, and take hold of it with their hands, shall be in king's palaces; sooner or later, they will get preferment, and may go on with it, notwithstanding the difficulties and discouragements they must meet with. If one well-spun web be swept away, it is but making another.

29. There be three things which go well, yea, four are come in going: 30. A lion, which is strongest among beasts, and turneth not away for any; 81. A greyhound; a he-goat also; and a king, against whom there is no rising up. 32. If thou hast done foolishly in lifting up thyself, or if thou hast thought evil, lay thy hand upon thy mouth. 33. Surely the churning of milk bringeth forth butter, and the wringing of the nose bringeth forth blood; so the forcing of wrath bringeth forth strife.

Here is, 1. An enumeration of four things which are majestic and stately in their going, which look great.

1. A lion, the king of beasts, because strongest among beasts; among beasts it is strength that gives the pre-eminence, but it is pity that it should do so among men, whose wisdom is their honour, not their strength and force. The lion turns not away, nor alters his pace, for fear of any pursuers, since he knows he is too hard for them. Herein the righteous are bold as a lion, that they turn not away from their duty for fear of any difficulty they meet with in it.

2. A greyhound that is girt in the loins, and fit for running; or, as the margin reads it, a horse, which ought not to be omitted among the creatures that are comely in going, for so he is, especially when he is dressed up in his harness, or trappings.

3. A he-goat, the comeliness of whose going is when he goes first, and leads the flock; it is the comeliness of a Christian's going, to go first in a good work, and to lead others in the right way.

4. A king, who, when he appears in his majesty, is looked upon with reverence, awe, and admiration; and all nations that there is no rising up against him, none can compare with him, none can contend with him, whoever does it, it is at his peril. And if there is no rising up against an earthly prince, so to him then that strives with his Maker. It is intended that we should learn courage and fortitude in all virtues actions from the lion, and not to turn away from any difficulty we meet with; from the greyhound we may learn quickness and dispatch; from the he-goat, the care of our family, and those under our charge; and from a king, to have our children in subjection with all gravity; and from them all, to go well, and to order the steps of our conversation, so as that we may not only be safe, but comely, in going.

2. A caution to us to keep our temper at all times and under all provocations, and to take heed of car ry our resentments too far upon any occasion, especially when there is a king in the case, against whom there is no rising up; when it is a ruler, or one much our superior, that is offended; nay, the rule is always the same.

(1.) We must bridle and suppress our own passion, and take shame to ourselves, whenever we are justly charg'd and not with our own innociency; if we have lifted up ourselves, either in a proud conceit of ourselves, or a peevish opposition to those that are over us, if we have transgressed the laws of our place and station, we have therein done foolishly. Those that magnify themselves over others, or against others, that are haughty and insolent, they do shame themselves, and betray their own weakness; nay, if we have but thought evil, if we are conscious to ourselves, that we have harboured an ill design in our minds, or it has been suggested to us, we must lay our hand upon our mouth, [1.] We must humble ourselves for what we have done amiss, and even lie in the dust before God, in sorrow for it, as Job did, when he repented of what he had said foolishly; (ch. xli. 4.) I will lay my hand upon my mouth; and as the convicted leper, who put a covering upon his unclean self, if we have done foolishly, we must not stand to it before men, but by silence own our guilt, which will be the best way of appeasing those we have offended. [2.] We must keep the evil thought we have conceived in our minds from breaking out in any evil speeches; Do not give the evil thought an imprimitur—a license; allow it not to be published, but lay thy hand upon thy mouth; use a holy silence with thyself, if need be, and enjoin thyself silence; as Christ suffered not the evil spirit to speak. It is bad to think ill, but it is much worse to speak it; for that implies a consent to the evil thought, and a willingness to infect others with it.

(2.) We must not irritate the passions of others. Some are so very provoking in their words and conduct, that they even force wrath, they make those about them angry, whether they will or no, and put them into a passion, who are not only not inclined to it, but resolved against it. Now, this forcing of wrath by them, and our being forced into a passion, brings with it confusion and every evil work. As the violent agitation of the cream fetches all the good out of the milk, and the hard wringing of the rose will extort blood from it, so this forcing of wrath wastes both the body and spirits of a man, and robs him of all the good that is in him. Or, as it is in the churning of milk, and the wringing of the rose, that is done by force, which otherwise would not be done; so the spirit, that is the effusion of the wine, the angry word begets another, and that a third, one passionate debate makes work for another, and so it goes on, till it ends at length in irreconcilable feuds; let nothing, therefore, be said or done with violence, but every thing with softness and calmness.

CHAP. XXXI.

This chapter is added to Solomon's proverbs, some think, because it is of the same author, supposing king Lemuel to be king Solomon; others, only because it is of the same nature, though left, in writing by another author, called Lemuel; however it be, it is a prophecy, and therefore given by inspiration and direction of God, which Lemuel was under in the writing of it, and putting it into this form, as an admonition to him in particular. Here is 1. An exhortation to Lemuel, a young prince, to take heed of the sins he would be tempted to, and to do the duties of the place he was called to, v. 1. 2. The description of Lemuel's character, in the relation of a wife, and the mistress of a family, which Lemuel's mother drew up, not as an encomium of herself, though, no doubt, it was her own true picture, but is narrated by degrees when stronger as the foregoing verses were to her son, or as a direction to her son in the choice of a wife; she must be chaste and modest, diligent and frugal, dutiful to her husband, careful of her family, discreet in her discourse, and in the education of her children, and, above all, conscientious in her duty to God; such a one as this, if he can find her, will make him happy; v. 10.-31.

1. THE words of king Lemuel, the pro- phecy that his mother taught him. 2. What, my son? and what, the son of my womb? and what, the son of my vows? 3. Give not thy strength unto women, nor thy ways to that which destroyeth kings. 4. It is not for kings, O Lemuel, it is not for kings to drink wine, nor for princes strong drink; 5. Lest they drink, and forget the law, and pervert the judgment of any of the afflicted. 6. Give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish, and wine unto those that be of heavy hearts. 7. Let him drink, and forget his poverty, and remember his misery no more.

3. Open thy mouth for the dumb in the cause of all such as are appointed to destruc- tion. 3. Open thy mouth, judge righteously, and plead the cause of the poor and needy.

Most interpreters are of opinion that Lemuel is Solomon; the name signifies one that is for God, or devoted to God; and so it agrees well enough with that honourable name which, by divine appointment, was given to Solomon, (2 Sam. xii. 23.) Je- dediah, beloved of the Lord. Lemuel is supposed to be a pictur'd, under this character, those women to whom his mother used to call him; and so much did he value himself upon the interest he had in his mother's affections, that he was not ashamed to call himself by it. One would the rather incline to think it is Solomon that here tells us what his mother taught him, because he tells us, (ch. iv. 4.) what his father taught him. But some think, (and the conjecture is not improbable,) that Lemuel was a prince of some importance in the land of Israel, perhaps a son of David, and taught him these good lessons. Note, 1. It is the duty of mothers, as well as fathers, to teach their children what is good, that they may do it, and what is evil, that they may avoid it; when they are young and tender, they are most under the mother's eye, and she has then an opportunity of molding and fashioning their minds well, which she ought not to let slip. 2. Even kings must be catechised; the greatest of men is less than the least of the ordinances of God. 3. Those that are grown up to maturity should often call to mind, and make mention of, the good instructions they received when they were children, for their own admonition, the edification of others, and the honour of those who were the guides of their youth.

Now, in this mother's (this queen mother's) catechism, observe, 1. Her expectation with the young prince, by which she lays hold of him, claims an interest in him, and awakens his attention to what she was about to say; (v. 2.) "What, my son? What shall I say to thee?" She speaks as one considering what advice to give him, and choosing out words to reason with him; so full of concern is she for his welfare! Or, What is this that thou dost? It seems to be a chiding question. She observed, when he was young, that he was too much inclined to women and wine, and therefore she found it necessary to take him to task, and deal roundly with him. "What, my son? Is this the course of life thou intendest to lead? Have I taught thee no better than this? I must reprove thee, and reprove thee sharply, and thou must take it well, for,

1. "Thou art descended from me, thou art the son of my womb, and therefore, what I say comes from the authority and affection of a parent, and cannot be suspected to come from any ill-will; thou art a piece of myself, I bare thee with sorrow, and I expect no other return for all the pains I have taken with thee, and undergone for thee, than this, be wise and good, and then I am well paid.

2. "Thou art devoted to my God; thou art the son of my vows, the son I prayed to God to give me, and promised to give back to God, and did so;" (thus Samuel was the son of Hannah's vows); "thou art the son I have often prayed to God to give his grace to;" (Ps. lxxii. 1.) and shall a child of so many prayers miscarry? And shall all my hopes concerning thee be disappointed?" Our children that by baptism are dedicated to God, for them, and whose name, we covenanted with God, may well be called the children of our vows; and as this may be made a good plea with God in our prayers for them, so it may be made a good plea with them in the instructions we give them; we may tell them, they are baptized, are the children of our vows, and it is at their peril if they break those bonds in sundri, which, in their infancy, they were solemnly brought under.

1. Against uncleanliness; (v. 3.) Give not thy strength unto women, unto strange women. He must not be soft and effeminate, nor spend that time in a vain conversation with the ladies, which should be spent in getting knowledge and despatching business; nor employ that wit which is the strength of the man in courting and complimenting them, which he should employ about the affairs of his government.

"Especially shun all adultery, fornication, and lasciviousness, which waste the strength of the body, and bring into it dangerous diseases. Give not thy ways, thy affections, thy conversation, to that which destroys kings, which has destroyed many, which gave such a shock to the kingdom, even of David himself, in the matter of Uriah. Let the sufferings of others be thy warnings. It lessens the value of all of them when we shun them mean. Are those fit to govern others, that are themselves slaves to their own lusts? It makes them unfit for business, and fills their court with the basest and worst of animals. Kings lie exposed to temptations of this kind, having wherewith both to please the humours, and to bear the charges of the sin, and therefore they ought to double their guard; and if they would preserve their people from the unclean spirit, they must themselves be patterns of purity. Men of people many times do the same to themselves. Let none give their strength to that which destroys souls.

2. Against drunkenness, v. 4, 5. He must not drink wine, or strong drink, to excess; he must never sit to drink as they used to do in the day of their kings, when the princes made him sick with bottles of wine, Hos. vii. 5. Whatever temptation he might be in from the excellency of the wine, or the charms of the company, he must deny himself, and be sober-minded.

(1.) The indecency of drunkenness in a king; However some may call it a fashionable accomplishment and entertainment, it is not for kings, O Lemuel, it is not for kings, to allow themselves that liberty; it is a disparagement to their dignity, and profanes their crown, by confusing the head that wears it; that which for the time unmans them, does for the time unking them. Shall we say, They are gods? No, they are worse than the beasts that perish. All Christians are made to our God kings and priests, and must apply this to themselves. It is not for Christians, to drink to excess, they degrade themselves if they do; it ill becomes the heirs of the kingdom, and the spiritual priests, Lev. x. 9.

(2.) The ill consequences of it; (v. 5.) Lastesth drink and make their understandings and memories, drink, and forget the law by which they are to govern; and so, instead of doing good with their power, do hurt with it, and pervert, or alter the judgment of all the sons of affliction, and, when they should right them, wrong them, and add to their affliction. It is a sad complaint which is made of the priests and prophets, (Isa. xxviii. 7.) that they have erred through wine, and through strong drink they are out of the way; and the effect is as bad in kings, who, when they are drunk, or affected with the love of wine, cannot but stumble in judgment. Judges must have clear heads, which those cannot have, who so often make themselves giddy, and incapacitate themselves to judge of the most common things.

III. The counsel she gives him to do good.

1. He must do good with his wealth. Great men must not think that they have their abundance, only that out of it they may make provision for the future, to fulfill the duties of the present, and make them the more likely to have it; but that with it they may relieve such as are in distress, v. 6, 7. "Thou hast wine and strong drink at command; instead of doing thyself hurt with it, do others good with it, let them have it that need it." Those that have wherewithal must not only give bread to the hungry, and water to the thirsty, but they must give strong drink to him that is ready to perish through sickness or pain, and wine to those that are melancholy and of heavy heart; for it was appointed to cheer and revive the spirits, and make glad the heart, (as it does where there is need of it,) not to burden and oppress the spirits, as it does where there is no need of it. We must deny our selves in the gratifications of sense, that we may have to spare for the relief of the miseries of others, and be glad to see our superfluities and dainties better bestowed upon those whom they will be a real kindness to, than upon ourselves whom they will be a real injury to. Let those that are ready to perish drink and sing, and it will be a mercy to revive their drooping spirits, that they will forget their poverty for the time, and remember their misery no more, and so they will be the better able to bear it. The Jews say, that upon this was grounded the practice of giving a stupifying drink to condemned prisoners when they were going to execution, as they did to our Saviour. But the scope of the place is to show that wine is a cordial, and therefore, when a man is used for comfort and sustenance, by those only that need cordials, as Timothy, who is advised to drink a little wine, only for his stomach's sake, and his often infirmities, 1 Tim. v. 23.

2. He must do good with his power, his knowledge, and interest; must administer justice with care, courage, and compassion, v. 8, 9. (1.) He must himself take cognizance of the causes of his subjects, and have a particular care of the poor and destitute, so that he may not only support those that do their duty, and lay those aside that neglect it, or are partial. (2.) He must, in all matters that come before him, judge righteously, and, without fear of the face of man, boldly pass sentence according to equity; Open thy mouth; which denotes the liberty of speech that princes and judges ought to use in passing sentence. Some observe, that wise men only often their mouths, for fools have their mouths always open, are full of words. (5.) He must especially look upon himself as obliged to be the patron of oppressed innocency; the inferior magistrates perhaps had not zeal and tenderness enough to plead the cause of the poor and needy, and therefore the king himself must interpose and appear as an advocate, [1.] For those that were unjustly charged with capital crimes, as Naboth was; that were appointed to destruction, to gratify the malice either of a particular person, or of a party. It is a case which it well befits a king to appear in, for the preserving of innocent blood. [2.] For those that had actions unjustly brought against them, to defend them of their right, because they were poor and needy, and unable to defend it, not having wherewithal to fee counsel; in such a case also kings must be advocates for the poor. Especially, [3.] For those that were dumb, and knew not how to speak for themselves, either through weakness or being over-talked by the prosecutor, or overawed by the court. It is generous to speak for those that cannot speak for themselves, that are absent, or have not words at command, or are timorous. Our law appoints the judge to be of counsel for the prisoner.

10. Who can find a virtuous woman? for her price is far above rubies. 11. The heart of her husband doth safely trust in her, so that she shall have no need of spoil. 12. She will do him good, and not evil, all the days of her life. 13. She seeketh wool and flax, and worketh willingly with her hands. 14. She is like the merchants’ ships, she bringeth her food from afar. 15. She riseth also while it is yet night, and giveth meat to her household, and a portion to her maidens. 16. She considereth a field, and buyeth it; with the fruit of her hands she planteth a vineyard. 17. She girdeth her loins with strength, and strengtheneth her arms. 18. She perceiveth that her merchandise is good: her candle goeth not out by night. 19. She layeth her hands to the spindle, and her hands hold the distaff. 20. She stretcheth out her hand to the poor; yea, she reacheth forth her hands to the needy. 21. She is not afraid of the snow for her household; for all her household are clothed with scarlet. 22. She maketh herself coverings of tapestry; her clothing is silk and purple. 23. Her husband is known in the gates, when he sitteth among the elders of the land. 24. She maketh fine linen, and selleth it; and delivereth girdles unto the merchant. 25. Strength and honour are her clothing; and she shall rejoice in time to come. 26. She openeth her mouth with wisdom; and in her tongue is the law of kindness. 27. She looketh well to the ways of her household, and eateth not the bread of idleness. 28. Her children rise up, and call her blessed; her husband also, and he praizeth her. 29. Many daughters have done virtuously, but thou excellest them all.

but a woman that searcheth the Lord, she shall be praised. 31. Give her of the fruit of her hands; and let her own works praise her in the gates.

This description of the virtuous woman is designed to show what wise the women should make, and what wives the men should choose; it consists of twenty-two verses, each beginning with a letter of the Hebrew alphabet in order, as some of the Psalms; which makes some think it was no part of the lesson which Lemuel’s mother taught him, that he himself, written by some other hand, and perhaps had been commonly repeated among the pious Jews, for the case of which it was made alphabetical. We have the abridgment of it in the New Testament, (1 Tim. ii. 9, 10. 1 Pet. iii. 1.) where the duty prescribed to wives agrees with this description of a good wife; and with good reason is so much stress laid upon it, since it contributes as much as any one thing to the keeping up of religion in families, and the entail of it upon posterity, that the mothers be wise and good; and of what consequence it is to the wealth and outward prosperity of a house, every one is sensible. He that will thrive must ask his wife leave.

Here is,

1. A general inquiry after such a one; (v. 10.) where observe, 1. The person inquired after, and that is, a virtuous woman; a woman of strength, so the word is; though the weaker vessel, yet she strong by wise words, and grace, and the fear of God; it is the same word that is used in the character of good judges, (Exod. xviii. 21.) that they are able men, men qualified for the business to which they are called, men of truth, fearing God. So it follows, A virtuous woman is a woman of spirit, who has the command of her own spirit, and knows how to manage other people’s; one that is pious and industrious, and a help meet for a man. In opposition to this strength, we read of the weakness of the heart of an imperious, scolding, woman, Ezek. xvi. 30. A virtuous woman is a woman of resolution, who, having espoused good principles, is firm and steady to them, and will not be frightened with winds and clouds from any part of her duty. 2. The difficulty of meeting with such a one; Who can find her? Which intimates that good women are very scarce; many that seem to be so, do not prove so; he that thought he had found a virtuous woman was deceived; Behold it was Leah, and not the Rachel he expected. But he that designs to marry ought to seek diligently for such a one, to have this principally in his eye, in all his inquiries, and to take heed that he be not biased by beauty or gaiety, wealth or parentage, dressing well or dancing well, for all these may be, and yet the woman not be virtuous; and there is many a woman truly virtuous, who yet is not recommended by these advantages. 3. The enviable attributes of such a one, and the value which he that has such a wife ought to put upon her, showing it by his thankfulness to God, and his kindness and respect to her, whom he must never think he can do too much for; her price is far above rubies, and all the rich ornaments with which vain women adorn themselves. The more rare such good wives are, the more they are to be valued.

II. A particular description of her, and of her excellent qualities:

1. She is very industrious to recommend herself to her husband’s esteem and affection. Those that are good really, will be so relatively. A good woman, if she be brought into the married state, will be a good wife, and make it her business to please her husband, 1 Cor. vii. 34. Though she is a woman of spirit herself, yet her desire is to her husband, to know his mind, that she may accommodate herself to it, and she is willing that he rule over her.

(1.) She conducts herself so that he may repose an entire confidence in her; in her chastity, which she never gave him the least occasion to suspect, or to entertain any jealousy of; she is not mercenary, but modest and grave, and has all the marks of virtue in her countenance and behaviour; her husband knows it, and therefore his heart doth safely trust in her; he is easy, and makes her so. He trusts in her conduct, that she will speak in all companies, and act in all affairs, with prudence and discretion, so as not to occasion him either damage or reproach. He trusts in her fidelity to his interests, and that she will never betray his counsels, or have any interest separate from that of his family. When he goes abroad to attend the concerns of the public, he can confide in her to order all his affairs at home, as well as if he himself were there. She is a good wife, that is fit to be trusted, and he a good husband, that will leave it to such a wife to manage for him.

(2.) She contributes so much to his content and satisfaction that he shall have no need of spoil; he needs not be griping and scraping abroad, as those must be whose wives are proud and wanton at home. She manages his affairs so that he is always before; modesty and plenty of his own, that he is in no temptation to prey upon his neighbours. He thinks himself so happy in her, that he envies not those who have most of the wealth of this world; he needs not it, he has enough, having such a wife. Happy the couple that have such a satisfaction as this in each other!

(3.) She makes it her constant business to do him good, and is afraid of doing any thing, even through inadvertency, that may turn to his prejudice. She shows her love to him not by a foolish fondness, but by prudent endearments, accommodating herself to his temper, and not crossing him, giving him good words, and not bad ones, no, not when he is out of humour; studying to make him easy, to provide what is fit for him both in health and sickness, and attending him with diligence and tenderness when any thing ails him; nor would she, no, not for the world, wilfully do any thing that might be a damage to his person, estate, or good name, and to take care all the days of her life; not at first only, or now and then, when she is in a good humour, but perpetually; and she is not weary of the good offices she does him; She does him good, not only all the days of his life, but of her own too; if she survive him, still she is doing him good in her care of his children, his estate, and good name, and all the concerns he left behind him. We read of kindness showed, not only to the living, but to the dead, Ruth ii. 20.

(4.) She adds to his reputation in the world; (v. 23.) Her husband is known in the gates, known to have a good wife. By his wise counsels, and prudent management of affairs, it appears that he has a discreet companion in his bosom, by conversation with whom he improves himself. By his cheerful countenance and pleasant humour, it appears that he has an agreeable wife at home; for many that have not, their tempers strangely scared by it. Nay, his excellent wife manages his business, and on all things, every thing about him decent and handsome, yet not gaudy, one may know he has a good wife at home that takes care of his clothes.

2. She is one that takes pains in the duty of her place, and takes pleasure in it. This part of her character is much enlarged upon here.

(1.) She hates to sit still and do nothing; She eateth not the bread of idleness, v. 27. Though she needs not work for her bread, (she has an estate to live upon,) yet she will not eat it in idleness, because she knows that we were none of us sent into this world to be idle, and that when we have nothing to do, the devil will soon find us something to do, and that it is not fit that those who will not labour should eat. Some eat and drink because they can and find their pleasure in idleness, and the less visits must be received with fashionable entertainments; these are eating the bread of idleness, which she has no relish for, for she neither gives, nor receives, idle visits or idle talk.

(2.) She is careful to fill up time that none of that be lost. When day-light is done, she does not then think it time to lay by her work, as those are forced to do whose business lies abroad in the fields, (Ps. civ. 23.) but, her business lying within doors, and her work worth candle-light, with that she lengthens out the day; and her candle goes on by night, v. 18. It is a mercy to have candle-light to supply the want of daylight, and a duty, having that advantage, to improve it. We say of an elaborate piece, It smells of the lamp.

(3.) She rises early, while it is yet night, (v. 15.) to give her servants their breakfast, that t., may be ready to go cheerfully about their work as soon as the day breaks. She is none of those who sit up playing cards, till midnight, till morning, and then lie in bed till noon; nor the frivolous woman loves her business better than her ease or her pleasure, is in care to be found in the way of her duty every hour of the day, and has more true satisfaction in having given meat to her household betimes in the morning, than those can have in the money they have won, much more, in what they have lost, who sat up all night at play. Those that have a family to take care of, should not love their beds well in a morning.

(4.) She is one that attends to the business that is proper for her. It is not in scholar's business, or statesman's business, or husbandman's business, that she employs herself, but in women's business; She seeks wood and flax, where she may have the best of each at the best hand, and cheapest; she has a stock of both by her, and every thing that is necessary to the carrying on both of the woollen and the linen manufacture; (v. 13.) and with this, she does not only set the proper work, which is a very good business, but exercises herself, and work willingly, with her hands; she works with the counsel or delight of her hands, so the word is; she goes about it cheerfully and dexterously; lays not only her hand, but her mind, to it, and goes on in it without weariness in well-doing. She lays her own hands to the spindle, or spinning-wheel, and her hands hold the distaff; (v. 19.) and she does not reckon it either an abridgment of her liberty, or a disparagement to her dignity, or at all inconsistent with her repose. The spindle and the distaff are here mentioned as her honour, while the ornaments of the daughters of Zion are reckoned up to their reproach, Isai. iii. 18, &c.

(5.) She does what she does with all her might, and does not trifle in it; (v. 17.) She girds her loins with strength, and strengthens her arms; she does not employ herself in sitting work only, or in that which is only the nice performance of the fingers; there is a work every day to be done. Nay, she is one that must work; every thing about him decent and handsome, yet not gaudy, one may know she has a good wife at home that takes care of his clothes.

3. She is one that makes what she does turn to a good account by her prudent management of it; she does not toil all night and catch nothing; no, she herself perceives that her mercantile is good; (v. 18.) she is sensible that in all her labour there is profit, and that encourages her to go on with it.
perceives that she can make things herself better and cheaper than she can buy them; she finds by observation what branch of her employment brings in the best returns, and to that she applies herself most ardently.

(1.) She brings in provisions of all things necessary and convenient for her family, v. 14. No merchants' ships, no, not Solomon's navy, ever made a more advantageous return than her employments do. Do they bring in foreign commodities with the effects they export? So does she with the fruit of her labours. What her ground does not produce, she can furnish herself with, if she have occasion for it, by exchanging her own goods for it; and so she brings her food from afar. Not that she values the more for their being far-fetched, but, if they be ever so far off, if she must have them, she knows how to come by them.

(2.) She purchases lands, and enlarges the demesne of the family; v. 16. She considers a field, and buys it. She considers what an advantage it will be to the family, and what a good account it will turn to, and therefore she buys it; or rather, though she have ever so much mind to it, she will not buy it, till she has first considered it, whether it be worth her money, whether she can afford to take so much money out of her stock, as must go to purchase it, whether the title be good, whether the ground will answer the character given of it, and whether she has money at command to pay for it. Many have undone themselves by buying without considering; but those who would make advantageous purchases must consider, and then buy. She also plants a vineyard, but it is with the fruit of her hands; she does not take up money, or run into debt, to do it, but she does it with what she can spare out of the gains of her own housewifery. Men should not lay out any thing upon superfluities, till, by the blessing of God upon their industry, they are got before-hand, and can afford it; and then the fruit of the vineyard is likely to be doubly sweet, when it is the fruit of honest industry.

(3.) She furnishes her house well, and has good clothing for herself and her family; v. 22. She makes herself coverings of tapestry to hang her rooms, and she may be allowed to use them when they are of her own making; her own clothing is rich and fine, it is silk and purple, according to her place and rank. Though she is not so vain as to sport herself, but she would be well covered and warm, she yet provides for herself, and puts on of apparel her adorning, nor values herself upon it, yet she has rich clothes, and puts them on well. The senator's robes which her husband wears are of her own spinning, and they look better, and wear better, than any that are bought. She also gets good warm clothing for her children, and her servants' liversies; she needs not fear the cold of the most pinching winter, for she and her family are well provided with clothes, neither makes her put out cold, which is the end chiefly to be aimed at in clothing; All her household are clothed in scarlet, strong cloth, and fit for winter, and yet rich, and making a good appearance. They are all double clothed, so some read it; have change of raiment, a winter suit and a summer suit.

(4.) She trades abroad; she makes more than she and her household have occasion for; and therefore, though she has knocked up all the little she sells, fine linen and girdles to the merchants, v. 24., who carry them to Tyre, the mart of the nations, or some other trading city. Those families are likely to thrive that sell more than they buy; as it is well with the kingdom when abundance of its home-manufactures are exported. It is no disgrace to those of the best quality to sell what they can spare, nor to deal in trade, and send ventures by sea.

(5.) She lays up for hereafter, She shall rejoice in time to come, having laid in a good stock for her family, and having good portions for her children. Those that take pains when they are in their prime will have the pleasure and joy of it when they are old, both in reflecting upon it, and in reaping the benefit of it.

4. She takes care of her family, and all the affairs of it, gives meat to her household, (v. 15.) to every one his portion of meat in due season, so that none of her servants have reason to complain of being kept short, or faring hard. She gives also a portion, an allotment of work, as well as meat, to her maidens; they shall each of them know their business, and have their portion, to the ways of her household, (v. 27.) She inspects the works of all her servants, that she may check what is amiss among them, and oblige them all to behave properly, and do their duty to God and one another, as well as to her, as Job, who put away iniquity far from his tabernacle; and David, who would suffer no wicked thing in his house. She does not interfere in the concerns of other people's houses, she thinks it enough for her to lock well to her own. She is as intent upon giving as she is upon getting, she often serves the poor with her own hand, and she does it freely, cheerfully, and very liberally, with an out-stretched hand. Nor does she relieve her poor neighbours only, and those that are nigh at hand, but she reaches forth her hands to the needy that are at a distance, seeking opportunities to do good and to communicate; which is as good housewifery as any thing she does.

6. She is discreet and obliging in all her discourse; not talkative, censorious, or peevish, as some are, that know how to take pains; no, she opens her mouth with wisdom; when she does speak, it is with a great deal of prudence, and very much to the purpose; you may perceive by every word she says, how much she governs herself by the rules of wisdom. She not only takes prudent measures herself, but gives prudent advice to others; and this, not as assuming the authority of a dictator, but with the affection of a friend, and an obliging air; In her tongue is the law of kindness; all she says is under the government of that law. The law of love and kindness is written in the heart, but it shows itself in the tongue; if we are kindly affectioned one to another, it will appear by affectionate expressions. She has a law of kindness, because it gives law to others, to all sorts of persons, whether of the world, and wisdom and kindness together put a commanding power into all she says; they command respect, they command compliance. How forcible are right words! In her tongue is the law of grace, or mercy; so some read it, understanding it of the word and law of God, which she delights to talk of among her children and servants. She is full of pious religious discourse, and manages it prudently; which shows how full her heart is of God, and even when her hands are most busy about this world.

7. That which completes and crowns her character, is, that she fears the Lord, v. 30. With all those good qualities she lacks not that one thing needful she is truly pious, and, in all she does, is guided and governed by principles of conscience, and to a God; this is that which is here preferred far before beauty, that is vain and deceitful; all that are wise regard it as of great account so, and value neither themselves nor other's goods, nor the commendations men are given to God, nor is it any certain indication of wisdom and goodness, but it has deceived many a man who has made his choice of a wife by it. There may be an impure deformed soul lodged in a comely and beautiful body; nay, many have been exposed by their beauty to such temptations as have been the ruin of their virtue, their honour, and their precious souls. It is a fading thing at the best, and therefore vain and deceitful; a fit of sickness will stain and sully it in a little time; a thousand accidents may blast this flower in its prime; old age will certainly wither it, and death and the grave consume it; but the fear of God reigning in the heart, is the beauty of the soul; it recommends those that have it, to the favour of God, and is, in his sight, of great price; it will last for ever, and bid defiance to death itself, which consumes the beauty of the body, but consummates the beauty of the soul.

III. The happiness of this virtuous woman.

1. She has the comfort and satisfaction of her virtue in her own mind; (v. 25.) Strength and honour are her clothing; which suits herself, that is, enjoys herself, and in which she appears to the world, and so recommends herself. She enjoys a firmness and constancy of mind, has spirit to bear up under the many crosses and disappointments which even the wise and virtuous must expect to meet with in this world; and this is her clothing, for defence as well as decency. She deals honourably with all, and she has the pleasure of doing so, and shall rejoice in time to come; she shall reflect upon it with the satisfaction of a good life, whether she was not idle or useless when she was young. In the day of death it will be a pleasure to her to think that she has lived to some good purpose. Nay, she shall rejoice in an eternity to come, she shall be recompensed for her goodness with fulness of joy and pleasures for evermore.

2. She is a great blessing to her relations, v. 28. (1.) Her children grow up in her place, and they call her blessed; they give her their good word, they are themselves a commendation to her, and they are ready to give great commendations of her; they pray for her, and bless God that they had such a good mother. It is a debt which they owe her, a part of that honour which the fifth commandment requires to be paid to father and mother; and it is a double honour that is due to a good father and a good mother.

(2.) Her husband thinks himself so happy in her, that he takes all occasions to speak well of her, as one of the best women. It is no indignity at all, but a laudable instance of conjugal love, for husbands and wives to give one another their due praises.

3. She gets the good word of all her neighbours, as Ruth did, whom all the city of her people knew to be a virtuous woman, Ruth iii. 11. Virtue will have its praise, Phil. iv. 8. A woman that fears the Lord shall have praise of God, (Rom. ii. 29.) and of men too. It is here showed,

(1.) That she shall be highly praised; (v. 29.) Many have done virtuously; virtuous women, it seems, are precious jewels, but not such rare jewels as was represented, v. 10. there have been many, but such a one as this cannot be paralleled; Who can find her equal? She excels them all. Note. Those that are good should aim and covet to excel in virtue. Many daughters, in their father's house, and in the single state, have done virtuously, but a good wife, if she be virtuous, excels them all, and does more good in her place than they can do in their'. Or, as some explain it, A man cannot have his house so well kept by good daughters as by a godly wife; her good name is more lasting than that of daughters.

(2.) That she shall be incontestably praised, without contradiction, v. 31. Some are praised above what is their due, but those that praise her do but give her of the fruit of her hands; they give her that which she has dearly earned, and which is justly owing to her; she is wronged if she have it not. Note, Those ought to be praised, the fruit of whose hands is praiseworthy. The tree is known by its fruits, and therefore, if the fruit be good, the tree must have our good word. If her children be dutiful, and her husband is satisfied with her, and as they ought, they then give her of the fruit of her hands; she reaps the benefit of all the care she has taken of them, and thinks herself well paid. Children must thus study to requite their parents, and this is showing piety at home, 1 Tim. v. 4. But if men be unjust, the thing will speak itself, her own works will praise her in the gates, openly before all the people. 1.] She leaves it to her own works to praise her, and does not court the applause of men. Those are none of the truly virtuous women that love to hear themselves commended. [2.] Her own works will praise her; if her relations and neighbours altogether hold their peace, her good works will proclaim her praise. The widows gave the best encomium of Dorcas, when they showed the coats and garments she had made for the poor, Acts ix. 39. [3.] The least that can be expected from her neighbours, is, that they should let her own works praise her, and do nothing to hinder them. They that do that which is good, let them have praise of the same, (Rom. xiii. 3.) and let not us enviously say, or do, any thing to the diminishing of it, but be provoked by it to a holy emulation. Let none have an ill report from us, that have a good report even of the truth itself. Thus is shut up this looking-glass for ladies, which they are desired to open, and dress themselves by; and if they do so, their adorning will be found to praise, and honour, and glory, at the appearing of Jesus Christ.

Twenty Chapters of the Book of Proverbs, (beginning with ch. 10. and ending with ch. 29.) consisting mostly of entire sentences in each verse, could not well be reduced to proper heads, and the contents of them gathered; I have therefore here put the contents of all these chapters together, which, perhaps, may be of some use to those who desire to see at once all that is said of any one head in these chapters.

I take the heads in no method but as they occurred in reading the chapters; some of the verses, perhaps, I have not put under the same heads that another would have put them under, but the most of them fall (I hope) naturally enough to the places I have assigned them.

(1.) Of the comfort, or grief, parents have in their children, according as they are wise or foolish, godly or ungodly, ch. x. 1.—xx. 20.—xxvii. 21, 25.—xix. 13, 26.—xxiii. 15, 16, 24, 25.—xxvii. 11.—xxviii. 3.

(2.) Of the world's insufficiency, and religion's sufficiency, to make us happy, ch. x. 2.—xx. 1, 3.—iv. 4. and the preference to be therefore given to the fruits of virtue, above those of this world, ch. xx. 16, 17.—xviii. 16.—xvii. 1.—xx. 3.—xxviii. 6, 11.

(3.) AN

EXPOSITION,

WITH

OF THE BOOK OF

ECCLESIASTES.

We are still among Solomon's happy men, his happy servants, that stood continually before him to hear his wisdom; and they are the choicest of all the dictators of his wisdom, such as were more immediately given by divine inspiration, that are here transmitted to us, not to be heard, as by them; but once, and then liable to be mistaken or forgotten, and by repetition to lose their beauty, but to be read, reviewed, revolved, and had in everlasting remembrance. The account we have of Solomon's apostacy from God, in the latter end of his reign, (1 Kings xi. 1.) is the tragical part of his story; we may suppose that he spake his Proverbs in the prime of his time, while he kept his integrity, but delivered his Ecclesiastes when he was grown old, (for of the burdens and decays of age he speaks feelingly, ch. xii.) and was, by the grace of God, recovered from his backslidings: there he dictated his observations, here he wrote his own experiences; this is what days speak, and wisdom which the multitude of years teaches. The title of the book and the penman we shall meet with in the first verse, and therefore shall here only observe,

I. That it is a sermon, a sermon in print; the text is, (ch. i. 2.) Vanity of vanities, all is vanity; that is the doctrine too; it is proved at large, by many arguments, and an induction of particulars; and divers objections are answered; and, in the close, we have the use and application of all, by way of exhortation, to remember our Creator, to fear him, and to keep his commandments. There are indeed many things in this book which are dark, and hard to be understood, and some things which men of corrupt minds wear to their own destruction, for want of distinguishing between Solomon's arguments and the objections of atheists and epicures; but there is enough easy and plain to convince us (if we will admit the conviction) of the vanity of the world, and its utter insufficiency to make us happy, the vileness of sin, and its certain tendency to make us miserable, and of the wisdom of being religious, and the solid comfort and satisfaction that are to be had in doing our duty both to God and man; this should be intended in every sermon, and that is a good sermon by which these points are in any measure gained.

II. That it is a penitential sermon, as some of David's psalms are penitential psalms; it is a recantation sermon, in which the preacher sadly laments his own folly and mistake, in premising himself satisfaction in the things of this world, and even in the forbidden pleasures of sense, which now he finds more bitter than death. His fall is a proof of the weakness of man's nature; Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, nor say, "I shall never be such a fool as to do so and so," when Solomon himself, the wisest of men, played the fool so egregiously; nor let the rich man glory in his riches, since Solomon's wealth was so great a snare to him, and did him a great deal more hurt than Job's poverty did him. His recovery is a proof of the power of God's grace, in bringing one back to God that had gone so far from him; it is a proof too of the riches of God's mercy in accepting him, notwithstanding the many aggravations of his sin, pursuant to the promise made to David, that if his children should commit iniquity, they should be corrected, but not abandoned and disinhirited, 2 Sam. vii. 14, 15. Let him therefore that thinks he stands, take heed lest he fall; and let him that is fallen, make haste to get up again, and not despair either of assistance or acceptance therein.

III. That it is a practical, profitable sermon. Solomon, being brought to repentance, resolves, like his father, to teach transgressors God's way, (Ps. li. 13.) and to give warning to all to take heed of splitting upon those rocks which had been fatal to him; and these were fruits meet for repentance. The fundamental error of the children of men, and that which is at the bottom of all their departures from God, is the same with that of our first parents, hoping to be as gods, by entertaining themselves with that which seems good for food, pleasant to the eyes, and desirable to make one wise. Now the scope of this book is to show that this is a great mistake, that our happiness consists not in being as gods to ourselves, to have what we will, and do what we will, but in having Him that made us to be a God to us. The moral philosophers disputed much about man's felicity, or chief good, various opinions they had about it, but Solomon, in this book, determines the question, and assures us, that to fear God and keep his commandments, is the whole duty of man. He tried what satisfaction might be found in the wealth of the world, and the pleasures of sense, and at last pronounced all vanity and vexation; yet multitudes will not take his word, but will make the same dangerous experiment, and it proves fatal to them. He, i. Shows the vanity of those things in which men commonly look for happiness, as hu man learning and policy, sensual delights, honour and power, riches and great possessions. And then, 2. He prescribes remedies against the vexation of spirit that attends them. Though we cannot cure them of their vanity, we may prevent the trouble they give us, by sitting loose to them, enjoying them comfortably, but laying our expectations low from them, and acquiescing in the will of God concerning us in every event, especially by remembering God in the days of our youth, and continuing in his fear and service all our days, with an eye to the judgment to come.

ECCLESIASTES, I.

CHAP. I.

In this chapter, we have, 1. The inscription, or title, of the book, v. 1. II. The general doctrine of the vanity of the creature laid down, (v. 2.) and explained, v. 3. III. The proof of this doctrine, taken, 1. From the shortness of human life, and the multitude of births and burials in this life, v. 4. 2. From the inconstant nature, and constant revolutions, of all the creatures, and the perpetual flux and reflux they are in; the sun, wind, and water, v. 5. 3. From the abundant toil man has about them, and the little satisfaction he has in them, v. 8. 4. From the return of the same things again, which shows the end of all perfection, and that the stock is exalted and abased. From the stillness, in which things are conditioned, v. 11. IV. The first instance of the vanity of men's knowledge, and all the parts of learning, especially natural philosophy and politics. Observe, 1. The trial Solomon made of these, v. 12, 13, 16, 17. 2. His judgment of them; that all is vanity, v. 14. For, (1.) There is labour in getting knowledge, v. 13. (2.) There is little good to be done with it, v. 15. (3.) There is no satisfaction in it, v. 18. And if this is vanity and vexation, all other things in this world, being much inferior to it in dignity and worth, must needs be so too. A great scholar cannot be happy, unless he be a true saint.

1. THE words of the Preacher, the son of David, king of Jerusalem. 2. Vanity of vanities, saith the Preacher, vanity of vanities; all is vanity, 3. What profit hath a man of all his labour which he taketh under the sun?

Here is,

1. An account of the penman of this book; it was Solomon, for no other son of David was king of Jerusalem: but he conceals his name Solomon, peaceable, because by his sin he had brought trouble upon himself and his kingdom, had broken his peace with God, and lost the peace of his conscience, and therefore was no more worthy of that name. Call me not Solomon, call me, Marah, for behold, for peace I had great bitterness. But he calls himself, the preacher, which bespeaks his present character. He is Koheleth, which comes from a word which signifies to gather; but is a feminine termination, by which, perhaps, Solomon intends to upbraided himself with his inefficacy, which contributed more than anything to his apostacy; for it was to please his wife that he set up idols, Neh. xiii. 26. Or the word Soul must be understood, and so Koheleth is,

(1.) A penitent soul, or one gathered; that had rambled and gone astray like a lost sheep, but was now reduced, gathered in from his wanderings, gathered home to his duty, and come to length to himself; the spirit, that was dispossessed after a thousand vanities, is now collected, and made to centre in God. Divine grace can make great sinners great converts, and renew even these to repentance, who, after they had known the way of righteousness, turned aside from it, and heal their backslidings, though it is a difficult case. It is only the penitent soul that God will accept, the heart that is broken, not the head, that is bowed down like a bulrush only for a day, David's repentance, not Ahab's. And it is only the gathered soul that is the penitent soul, that comes back from its by-paths, that no longer scatters its way to the strangers, (Jer. iii. 13.) but is united to fear God's name. Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth will speak, and therefore we have here the words of the penitent, and those published. If eminent professors of religion fall into gross sin, they are concerned, for the honour of God, and the repairing of the damage they have done to his kingdom, openly to testify their repentance, that the antidote may be administered as extensively as the poison.

(2.) A preaching soul, or one gathering. Being himself gathered to the congregation of saints, out of which he had by his sin thrown himself, and being reconciled to the church, he endeavours to gather others to it, that had gone astray like him, and perhaps were led astray by his example. He that has done any thing to seduce his brother, ought to do all he can to restore him. Perhaps Solomon called together a congregation of his people, as he had done at the dedication of the temple, (1 Kings viii. 2.) so now at the re-dedicating of himself. In that assembly he presided as the people's mouth to God, and in prayer, (v. 12.) in this as God's mouth to them in preaching. God by his Spirit made him a preacher, in token of his being reconciled to him; a commission is an implicit pardon. Christ sufficiently signified his forgiving Peter, by committing his lambs and sheep to his trust. Observe, Penitents should be preachers; they that have taken warning themselves to turn and live, should give warning to others not to go on and die. When thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren. Preachers must be preaching souls, for that only is likely to reach to the heart that comes from the heart. Paul served God with his spirit in the gospel of his Son, Rom. i. 9.

2. The son of David. His taking this title intimates, (1.) That he looked upon it as a great honour to be the son of so good a man, and valued himself very much upon it. (2.) That he also looked upon it as a great aggravation of his sin, that he had such a father, who had given him a good education, and put up many a good prayer for him; it cuts him to the heart to think that he should be a blemish and disgrace to the name and family of such a one as David. It aggravated the sin of Jehoiakim, that he was the son of Josiah, Jer. xxxii. 15. 17. (3.) That his being the son of David encouraged him to repent, and hope for mercy, for David had fallen into sin, by which he should have been warned not to sin, but was not; but David repented, and there in he took example from him, and found mercy as he did. Yet this was not all, he was that son of David concerning whom God had said, that though he would chasten his transgression with the rod, yet he would not break his covenant with him, Ps. lxxxix. 34. Christ, the great Preacher, was the Son of David.

3. King of Jerusalem. This he mentions, (1.) As that which was a very great aggravation of his sin; he was raising. God had done much for him in raising him to the throne, and yet he had so ill required him; his dignity made the bad example and influence of his sin the more dangerous, and many would follow his pernicious ways; especially as he was king of Jerusalem, the holy city, where God's temple was, and of his own building too, where the priests, the Lord's ministers, were, and his prophets who had taught him better things. (2.) As this might give some advantage to what he wrote, for where the word of a king doth go, there it is established. He thought it no disparagement to him, as a king, to be a preacher; but the people would regard him the more as a preacher, because he was a king. If men of honour would lay out themselves to do good, what a great deal of good might they do! Solomon looked as great in the pulpit, preaching the vanities of the world, as in his throne of ivory, judging.

The Chaldee paraphrase (which, in this book, may be very large additions to the text, or comments upon it, all along) gives this account of Solomon's writing this book: That by the spirit of prophecy he foresaw the revolt of the ten tribes from his son; and, in process of time, the destruction of Jerusalem and the house of the sanctuary, and the captivity of the people; in the foresight of which, he said, Vanity of vanities, all is vanity; and to that he applies many passages in his book.

II. The general scope and design of the book. We have a general intimation of it, from the title, which he gives it, and the sense of the whole, which he aims at, is, for the making us truly religious, to take down our esteem of, and expectation from, the things of this world. In order to this, he shows,

1. That they are all vanity, v. 2. This is the proposition he lays down, and undertakes to prove; Vanity of vanities, all is vanity. It was no new text, his father David had more than once spoken to the same purport. The truth itself here asserted, is, that all is vanity; and that the God, and the whole of the vanity, is an abstract from him; the all of this world; all worldly employments and enjoyments; the all that is in the world; (1 John ii. 16.) all that which is agreeable to our senses and to our fancies in this present state, which gains pleasure to ourselves, or reputation with others. It is all vanity, not only in the abuse of it, when it is perverted by the sin of man, but even in the use of it. Man, considered with reference to these things, is vanity, (Ps. xxxiii. 5, 6.) and if there were another world, man would be vanity, (Ps. lxxxix. 47.) and these things, considered in reference to man, (whatever they are in themselves,) are vanity. They are impertinent to the soul, foreign, and add nothing to it; they do not answer the end, nor yield any true satisfaction; they are uncertain in their continuance, are fading, and perishing, and passing away, and will certainly deceive and disappoint those that put a confidence in them. Let us not therefore love vanity, (Ps. iv. 2.) nor lift up our souls to it, (Ps. xxiv. 4.) for we shall but weary ourselves for it, Heb. ii. 13.

It is expressed here very emphatically; not only all is vain, but in the abstract, All is vanity; as if vanity were the proprium quarto modo—propriety in the fourth mode, of the things of this world, that which enters into the nature of them. They are not only vanity, but vanity of vanities, the vainest vanity, vanity in the highest degree, nothing but vanity. Nothing is more a cause of a great deal of vanity. And this is redoubled, because the thing is certain and past dispute, it is vanity of vanities. This intimates that the wise man had his own heart fully convinced of, and much affected with, this truth, and that he was very desirous that others should be convinced of it, and affected with it, as he was, but that he found the generality of men very loath to believe it, and consider it; (Job xxxiii. 14.) it intimates likewise, that we cannot comprehend and express the vanity of this world. But it one that will stand to what he says? Yes, he puts his name to it, saith the preacher. Is it one that was a competent judge? Yes, as much as ever any man was. Many speak contemptuously of the world, because they are hermits, and know it not, or beggars, and have it not; but Solomon knew it, he had divined into nature's depths, (2 Kings iv. 33.) and he had it, more of it perhaps, than every one else; he lived filled with its notions, and his belly with its hid treasures, (Ps. xxvii. 14.) and he passes this judgment on it. But did he speak as one having authority? Yes, not only that of a king, but that of a prophet, a preacher; he spake in God's name, and was divinely inspired to say it. But did he not say it in his haste, or in a passion, upon occasion of some particular disappointment? No, he said it deliberately, said it, and proved it, laid it down as a fundamental principle, on which he grounded the necessity of being religious. And, as some think, one main thing he designed, was, to show that the everlasting throne and kingdom which God had by Nathan promised to David and his seed, must be of another world; for all things in this world are subject to vanity, and therefore have not in them sufficient to answer the extent of that promise. If Solomon found all to be vanity, then the kingdom of the Messiah must come, in which we shall inherit substance.

2. That this makes us happy and for this he appeals to men's consciences; What profit has a man of all the pains he takes? v. 3. Observe here,

(1.) The business of this world described; It is labour, the word signifies both care and toil; it is work that wearies men; there is a constant fatigue in worldly business; it is labour under the sun, that is a phrase peculiar to this book, where we meet with it twenty-eight times. There is in the world, a world which needs not to be seen, for the glory of God is its light, where there is work without labour, and with great profit, the work of angels; but he speaks of the work under the sun, the pains of which are great, and the gains little. It is under the sun, under the influence of the sun, by its light and in its heat; as we have the benefit of the light of the day, so we sometimes the burden and heat of the day; (Matt. xx. 12.) and therefore in the sun, in the sun's heat; in the dark and cold grave the weary are at rest.

(2.) The benefit of that business inquired into; What profit has a man of all his labour? Solomon says, (Prov. xiv. 23.) In all labour there is profit; and yet here he denieth that there is any profit. As to our present condition in the world, it is true that by labour we get that which we call profit; we eat the labour of our hands; but as the wealth of the world is commonly called substance, and yet it is that which is not, (Prov. xxvii. 18.) so it is called profit, but the question is, Whether it be really so or no? And here he determines that it is not; that it is not a real benefit, that it is not a remaining benefit. In short, the wealth and pleasure of this world, if we had ever so much of them, are not sufficient to make us happy, nor will they be a portion for us.

[1.] As to the body, and the life that now is, What profit has a man of all his labour? A man's life consists not in an abundance, Luke xxiv. 49. The pleasures are increased, and they are increased, and they are increased that eat of them, and a little thing will afflict all the comfort of them, and then, what profit has a man of all his labour? Early up, and never the nearer. [2.] As to the soul, and the life that is to come, we may much more truly say, *What profit has a man of all his labour? All he gets by it will not supply the wants of the soul, nor satisfy its desires, will not atone for the sin of the soul, nor cure its diseases, nor counterbalance the loss of it; what profit will they be to the soul in death, in judgment, or in the everlasting state? The fruit of our labour in heavenly things is meat that endures to eternal life, but the fruit of our labour for the world is only meat that perishes.

4. One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh: but the earth abideth for ever. 5. The sun also riseth, and the sun goeth down, and hasteth to his place, where he arose. 6. The wind goeth toward the south, and turneth about unto the north; it whirleth about continually, and the wind returneth again according to his circuits. 7. All the rivers run into the sea; yet the sea is not full: unto the place from whence the rivers come, thither they return again. 8. All things are full of labour, man cannot utter it: the eye is not satisfied with seeing, nor the ear filled with hearing.

To prove the vanities of all things under the sun, and their insufficiency to make us happy, Solomon here shows,

1. That the time of our enjoyment of these things is very short, and only while we accomplish as a hireling his day. We continue in the world for but one generation, which is continually passing away, to make room for another, and we are passing with it. Our worldly possessions we very lately had from others, and must very shortly leave to others, and therefore to us they are vanity; they can be no more substantial than that life which is the substratum of them, and that is but a vapour, which appeareth for a little while, and then vanishes away. While the stream of mankind is continually flowing, how little enjoyment has one drop of the stream if the pleasant banks between which it glides! We may give God the glory of that constant succession of generations, in which the world has hitherto had its existence, and will have to the end of time; admiring his patience in continuing that sinful species, and his power in continuing that dying species. We may be also quickened to do the work of our generation diligently, and serve it faithfully, because it will be over shortly; and, in concern for mankind in general, we should consult the welfare of succeeding generations, but as to our own happiness, let us not expect it within such narrow limits, but in eternal rest and consistency.

2. That when we leave this world, we leave the earth behind us; that abideth for ever where it is, and therefore the things of the earth can stand us in no stead in the future state. It is well for mankind in general, that the earth endures to the end of time, when it and all the works in it shall be burnt up; but what is that to particular persons, when they remove to the world of spirits?

3. That the condition of man is, in this respect, worse than that even of the inferior creatures; The earth abideth for ever, but man abideth upon the earth but a little while. The sun sets indeed every night, yet it rises again in the morning, as bright and fresh as ever; the winds, though they shift their point, yet, in some point or other still they are; the waters that go to the sea above ground, come from it again underground; but man lies down and rises not, Job xiv. 7, 12.

4. That all things in this world are moveable and mutable, and subject to a continual toil and toss, constant in nothing but inconstancy, still going, never resting; it was but once that the sun stood still; when it is risen, it is hastening to set, and when it is set, hastening to rise again; (v. 5.) the winds are ever and anon shifting, (v. 6.) and the waters in a continual circulation, (v. 7.) it would be of as bad consequence for them to stagnate, as for the blood in the body to do so. And can we expect rest in a world where all things are thus full of labour, (v. 8.) on a sea that is always ebbing and flowing, and her waves continually working and rolling? The wind is still in motion, yet they are still where they were; The sun parts, as it is in the margin, but it is to the same place; the wind turns till it comes to the same place, and so the waters return to the same place whence they came. Thus man, after all the pains he takes to find satisfaction and happiness in the creature, is but where he was, still as far to seek as ever. Man's mind is as restless in its pursuits as the sun, and wind, and rivers, for he never satisfied, neither contented, the more it has of the world, the more it would have; and it would be no sooner filled with the streams of outward prosperity, the brooks of honey and butter, (Job xx. 17.) than the sea is with all the rivers that run into it; it is still as it was, a troubled sea that cannot rest.

6. That all things continue as they were, from the beginning of the creation; (2 Pet. iii. 4.) the earth is where it stood, he and all mankind being kept in the same station, and to the same course that ever they did, and therefore if they have never yet been sufficient to make a happiness for man, they are never likely to be so, for they can but yield the same comfort that they have yielded: we must therefore look above the sun for satisfaction, and for a new world.

7. That this world is, at the best, a weary land; All is vanity, for all is full of labour; the whole creation is made subject to this vanity, ever since man was sentenced to eat bread in the sweat of his brow. If we survey the whole creation, we shall see all busy; all have enough to do, to mind their own business, none will be a portion or happiness for man; all labour to serve him, but none prove a help meet for him. Man cannot express how full of labour all things are, can neither number the laboursious, nor measure the labours.

8. That our senses are unsatisfied, and the objects of them unsatisfying. He specifies those senses that perform their office with least toil, and are most capable of being pleased; The eye is not satisfied with seeing, but is weary of seeing always the same sight, and covets novelty and variety. The ear is fond, at first, of a pleasant song or tune, but soon nauseates it, and must have another; both are surfeited, but neither satiated, and what was most grateful becomes ungrateful. Curiosity is still insatiable, because still unsatisfied, and the more it is humoured, the more nice and peevish it grows, crying, Give, give.

9. The thing that hath been, it is that which shall be; and that which is done, is that which shall be done: and there is no new thing under the sun. 10. Is there any thing whereof it may be said, See, this is new? it hath been already of old time, which was before us. 11. There is no remembrance of former things; neither shall there be any remembrance of things that are to come with those that shall come after.

Two things we are apt to take a great deal of pleasure and satisfaction in, and value ourselves upon, with reference to our business and enjoyments in the world, as if they helped to save them from vanity. Solomon here shows us our mistake in such:—

1. The novelty of the invention, that it is such was new before known. How grateful is it to think that none ever made such advances in knowledge, and such discoveries by it, as we! that none ever made such improvements of an estate or trade, and had the art of enjoying the gains of it, as we have!

Their contrivances and compositions are all despised and run down, and we boast of new fashions, new hypotheses, new methods, new expressions, which justly out that we have put them down; but this is all another verse: The thing that is passed away is the same with that which has been; and that which shall be done, will be but the same with that which is done, for there is no new thing under the sun, v. 9.

It is repeated, (v. 10.) by way of question, Is there any thing of which it may be said, with wonder, See this is new; there never was the like? It is an appeal to observing men, and a challenge to those that cry up modern learning above that of the ancients. Let them name any thing which they take to be new, and though perhaps we cannot make it to appear, for want of the records of former times, yet we have reason to conclude that it has been already of old time, which was before us. What is there in the kingdom of nature, of which we may say, This is new? The works were finished from the foundation of the world; (Heb. iv. 5.) things which appear new to us, as they do to children, are not so in themselves. The heavens were of old; the earth abides forever; the powers of nature and the links of natural causes are still the same that ever they were.

In the kingdom of Providence, though the course and method of it have not such known and certain rules as that of nature, nor does it go always in the same track, yet, in the general, it is still the same thing over and over again; men's hearts, and the corruptions of them, are still the same: their desires, and pursuits, and complaints, still the same; and what God does in his dealings with men, is accomplished in a manner answering to the former, so that it is all repetition. What is surprising to us needs not be so, for there has been the like; the like strange advancements and disappointments; the like strange revolts and sudden turns, sudden turns of affairs; the miseries of human life have always been much the same, and mankind tread a perpetual round, and, as the sun and wind, are but where they were.

Now the design of this is,

(1.) To shew the folly of the children of men, in affecting things that are new, in imagining that they have discovered such things, and in pleasing and priding themselves in them. We are apt to nauseate old things, and to grow weary of what we have been long used to, as Israel of the manna, and covet, with the Athenians, still to tell and hear of some new thing, and admire this and the other as new, where it is all what has been. Tatianus the Assyrian, showing the Greeks how all the arts, which they valued themselves upon, owed their original to those nations which they counted barbarous, thus reasons with them; "For shame, do not call these things Epirosis—Inventions, which are but Musiosis—Inimitations."

(2.) To take us off from expecting happiness and satisfaction in the creature. Why should we look for it there, when never any yet have found it? What would we have to think that the world should yield any kinder? It has been to those that have gone before us; since there is nothing in it that is new, and our predecessors have made as much of it as could be made? Your fathers did eat manna, and yet they are dead. See John viii. 8, 9.—vi. 49.

(3.) To quicken us to secure spiritual and eternal blessings. If we would be entertained with new things, we must acquaint ourselves with the things of God, get a new nature; then old things pass away, and all things become new, 2 Cor. v. 17. The gospel puts a new song into our mouths. In Tha- ven all is new, (Rev. xxi. 5.) all new at first, wholly unlike the present state of things, a new world indeed, (Luke xx. 35.) and all new to eternity, always fresh, always flourishing. This consideration should make us willing to die, That in this world there is nothing but the same over and over again, and we can expect nothing from it more or better than we have had.

2. The memorableness of the achievement, that it is such as will be known and talked of hereafter. Many think they have found satisfaction enough in this, that their names shall be perpetuated, that posterity will celebrate the actions they have performed, the honours they have won, and the estates they have raised; that their houses shall continue for ever; (Ps. xlii. 11.) but herein they deceive themselves. How many former things and persons were there, which in their day looked very great, and made a mighty figure, and yet there is no remembrance of them, they are buried in oblivion! Here and there one person or action that was remarkable, met with a kind historian, and had the good hap to be recorded, when, at the same time, there were others, no less remarkable, that were dropt; and therefore we may conclude, that neither shall there be any remembrance of things to come, but that that which we hope to be remembered by will be either lost or slighted.

12. I the Preacher was king over Israel in Jerusalem: 13. And I gave my heart to seek and search out by wisdom concerning all things that are done under heaven: this sore travail I hath God given to the sons of man, to be exercised therewith. 14. I have seen all the works that are done under the sun; and, behold, all is vanity and vexation of spirit. 15. That which is crooked cannot be made straight; and that which is wanting cannot be numbered. 16. I communed with mine own heart, saying, Lo, I am come to great estate, and have gotten more wisdom than all they that have been before me in Jerusalem; yea, my heart had great experience of wisdom and knowledge.

17. And I gave my heart to know wisdom, and to know madness and folly: I perceived that this also is vexation of spirit. 18. For in much wisdom is much grief: and he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow.

Solomon, having asserted, in general, that all is vanity, and having given some general proofs of it, now takes the most effectual method to evince the truth of it, 1. By his own experience; he tried them all, and found them vanity. 2. By an induction of particulars; and here he begins with that which bids fairest of all other to be the happiness of a reasonable creature, and that is knowledge and learning; if this be vanity, every thing else must needs be so.

Now as to this,

Solomon tells us here what trial he had made of it, and that with such advantages, that if true satisfaction could have been found in it, he had found it.

1. His high station gave him an opportunity of improving himself in all parts of learning, and particularly in politics and the conduct of human affairs, v. 12. He that is the preacher of this doctrine was king over Israel, whom all their neighbours admired as a wise and understanding people, Deut. iv. 6. He had his royal seat in Jerusalem, which then deserved, better than Athens ever did, to be
ECCLESIASTES, I.

75: called the eye of the world. The heart of a king is unsearchable, he has reaches of his own, and a divine sentence is often in his lips. It is his honour, it is his business, to search out every matter. Solomon's great wealth and honour put him into a capacity of making his court the centre of learning; and he surrounded himself with the best of books, and both conversing or corresponding with all the wise and knowing part of mankind then in being, who made application to him to learn of him, by which he could not but improve himself; for it is in knowledge as it is in trade, all the profit is by barter and exchange; if we have that to say which will instruct others, they will have that which will instruct us. We observe accordingly Solomon speaks of his dignity and honour. He does not say, I the preacher am king, but I was king, no matter what I am. He speaks of it as a thing past, because worldly honours are transitory.

2. He applied himself to the improvement of these advantages, and the opportunities he had of getting wisdom, which, though ever so great, will not make a man wise, unless he give his mind to it. Solomon got to know and to enjoy things to be known by wisdom, v. 13. He made it his business to acquaint himself with all the things that are done under the sun, that are done by the providence of God, or by the art and prudence of man. He set himself to get all the insight he could, into philosophy and mathematics, into husbandry and trade, merchandise and mechanics, into the history of former ages, and the present state of other kingdoms, their laws, customs, and policies, into men's different temperaments, capacities, and projects, and the methods of managing them; he set himself not only to seek, but to search, to pry into, that which is most intricate, and which requires the closest application of mind, and the most vigorous and constant prosecution. Though he was a prince, he made himself a drudge to learning, was not discouraged by its knots, nor took up short of its depths. And this he did, not merely to gratify his own genius, but to qualify himself for the service of God and his generation, and to make an experiment how far the enlargement of the knowledge would go toward the settlement and repose of the mind.

3. He made very great progress in his studies, wonderfully improved all the parts of learning, and carried his discoveries much further than any that had been before him. He did not condemn learning, as many do, because they cannot conquer it, and will not be at the pains to make themselves masters of it; no, what he aimed at he compassed; he saw all the works that were done under the sun, (v. 14.) works of nature in the upper and lower world, all within this vortex, (to use the modern gibberish,) which has the sun for its centre; works of art, the product of man's wit, in a personal or social capacity. He had as much satisfaction in the success of his searches as ever any man had; he conversed with the best temperaments, capacities, and projects in knowledge, with as much pleasure as ever any rich merchant had in taking account of his stock. He could say, "Lo, I have magnified and increased wisdom, have not only gotten more of it myself, but have done more to propagate it and bring it into reputation, than any, than all that have been before me in Jerusalem." Note, It becomes great men to be studious, and delight themselves most in the improvement of their powers. There are great advantages of getting knowledge, he expects improvements accordingly. It is happy with a people, when their princes and noblemen study to excel others as much in wisdom and useful knowledge, as they do in honour and estate; and they may do that service to the commonwealth of learning, by applying themselves to the studies that are proper for them, which meaker persons cannot do. Solomon must be acknowledged a competent judge of this matter, for he had not only got his head full of the knowledge of the great experience of wisdom and knowledge, of the use of it, and been a beholder of it, as well as the amusement and entertainment of it; what he knew he had digested, and knew how to make use of. Wisdom entered into his heart, and so became pleasant to his soul, Prov. ii. 10, 11.—xxii. 18.

4. He applied his studies especially to that part of learning, which is most serviceable to the conduct of mankind. He, consequently, is the most valuable; (v. 12.) "I gave my heart to know and to search out and to set displeasure, and dictated of wisdom, and how I might obtain it; and to know madness and folly, how I might prevent and cure it; to know the snares and insinuations of it, that I might avoid them, and guard against them, and discover its fallacies." Thus industrious was Solomon to improve himself in knowledge, that he gained instruction both by the wisdom of prudent men, and by the madness of foolish men; by the field of the slothful, as well as of the diligent.

II. He tells us what was the result of this trial, to confirm what he had said, that all is vanity.

1. He found that his searches after knowledge were very toilsome, and a weariness not only to the flesh, but to the mind; (v. 13.) This sore travel, this difficulty that there is in searching after truth, and finding it, God has given to the sons of men, to be afflicted therewith, as a punishment for our first7 parents coveting forbidden knowledge. As bread for the body, so that for the soul, must be got and eaten in the sweat of our face, whereas both had been had without labour, if Adam had not sinned.

2. He found that the more he saw of the works done under the sun, the more he saw of their vanity; nay, and the sight often occasioned him vexation of spirit; (v. 14.) "I have seen all the works of a world full of business, have observed what the children of men are doing; and, behold, whatever men think of their own works, I see, all is vanity and vexation of spirit." He had before pronounced all vanity, (v. 2.) needless and unprofitable, and that which does us no good; here he adds, It is all vexation of spirit, troublesome and prejudicial, and that which does us hurt. It is feeding upon wind; so some read it, Hos. xii. 1. (1.) The works themselves which we see done, are vanity and vexation to those that are employed in them. There is so much care in the contrivance of our worldly business, so much toil in the prosecution of it, and so much trouble in the disappointments we meet with in it, that we may well say, It is vexation of spirit. (2.) The sight of them is vanity and vexation of spirit to the wise observer of them. The more we see of the world, the more we see to make us uneasy, and, with Heraclitus, to look upon all with weeping eyes. Solomon, as the wisest king of all the men of Israel, could not but perceive the vanity and vexation of wisdom and folly was vexation of spirit, v. 17. It vexed him to see so many that had wisdom not use it, and many that had folly not strive against it. When he knew wisdom, it vexed him to see how far off it stood from the children of men; and when he saw folly, how fast he saw it bound in their hearts.

3. He found that when he had got some knowledge, he could get no gain; he could neither gain that satisfaction to himself, nor do that good to others, with it, which he expected, v. 15. It would not avail,

(1.) To redress the many grievances of human life; "After all, I find that which is crooked will be crooked still, and cannot be made straight,"
Our knowledge is itself intricate and perplexed, we must go far and fetch a great compass, to come at it. Solomon thought to have found out a nearer way to it, but he could not; the paths of learning are as much a labyrinth as ever they were. The minds and methods of men have been crooked and perverse. Solomon thought, with his wisdom and power together, to have thoroughly reformed his kingdom, and made that straight which he found crooked; but he was disappointed. All the philosophy and politics in the world will not restore the corrupt nature of man to its primitive rectitude; we find the insufficiency of them, both in others and in ourselves. Learning will not alter men's natural tempers, nor cure them of their sinful dimesters; nor will it change the constitution of things in this world; a vale of tears it is, and so it will be, when all is done.

(2.) To make up the many deficiencies in the comfort of human life; that which is wanting there cannot be numbered, or counted out to us, from the treasures of human learning, but what is wanting will still be so; all our enjoyments here, when we have done our utmost to bring them to perfection, are still lame and marred, and it cannot be helped; as they are, so they are like to be. That which is wanting in our knowledge, is so much, that it cannot be numbered. The more we know, the more we see of our own ignorance. Who can understand his errors, his defects?

4. Upon the whole, therefore, he concludes that great scholars do but make themselves great mourners; for in much wisdom is much grief.

Solomon here, in pursuit of the summum bonum—the felicity of man, adjoins out of his study, his library, his laboretory, his council-chamber, where he had in vain sought for it, into the park and the play-house, his garden and his summer-house; exchanges the company of the philosophers and grave senators, for that of the wits and gallants, and the beaux-esprits, of his court, to try if he could find true satisfaction and happiness among them. Here he takes a great step downward, from the noble pleasures of the intellect to the brutal ones of sense; yet, if he resolve to make a thorough trial, he must knock at this door, because here a great part of mankind imagine they have found that which he was in quest of.

He resolved to try what mirth would do, and the pleasures of wit, whether he should be happy if he constantly entertained himself and others with merry stories and jests, banter and drollery; if he should furnish himself with all the pretty ingenious turns and repartees he could invent or pick up, fit to be laughed over, and all the bulls, and blunders, and foolish things, he could hear of, fit to be ridiculed and laughed at, so that he might be always in merry humor.

1. I said in my heart, Go to now, I will prove thee with mirth; therefore enjoy pleasure: and, behold, this also is vanity. 2. I said of laughter, It is mad: and of mirth, What doeth it? 3. I sought in my heart to give myself unto wine, (yet acquainting my heart with wisdom,) and to lay hold on folly, till I might see what was that good for the sons of men which they should do under the heaven all the days of their life. 4. I made me great works; I built me houses; I planted me vineyards; 5. I made me gardens and orchards, and I planted trees in them of all kind of fruits. 6. I made me pools of water, to water therewith the wood that bringeth forth trees; 7. I got me servants and maidsens, and had servants born in my house; also I had great possessions of great and small cattle above all that were in Jerusalem before me; 8. I gathered me also silver and gold, and the peculiar treasures of kings and of the provinces; I gat me men-singers and women-singers, and the delights of the sons of men, as musical instruments, and that of all sorts. 9. So I was great, and increased more than all that were before me in Jerusalem; also my wisdom remained with me. 10. And whatsoever mine eyes desired I kept not from them; I witheld not my heart from any joy: for my heart rejoiced in all my labour; and this was my portion of all my labour. 11. Then I looked on all the works that my hands had wrought, and on the labour that I had laboured to do: and, behold, all was vanity and vexation of spirit, and there was no profit under the sun.

CHAP. II.

Solomon having pronounced all vanity, and particularly knowledge and learning, which he so far from giving himself joy of, that he found the issue of it did but increase his sorrow, in this chapter, he goes on to show what reason he had to be tired of this world, and with what little reason most men are fond of it. I. He shows that there is no true happiness and satisfaction to be had in it, neither in the garden of God, nor in the splendour of this world, v. 1—16. II. He re-considers the pretensions of wisdom, and allows it to be excellent and useful, and yet sees it eloped with so many diminutions of its worth, that it proves insufficient to make a man happy, v. 17—24. III. He inquires how far the business and wealth of this world will go toward making men happy, and concludes, from his own experience, that, to those who set their hearts upon it, it is really a vexation of spirit, v. 17—26. And that is, there be any good in it, it is only to those that sit loose to it, v. 24—26.
H - With mirth, I will try if that will give thee satisfaction. Neither the temper of his mind, nor his outward condition, had anything in them to keep him from being merry, but both agreed, as did all other advantages, to further it, therefore he resolved to take a lease this way, and said, "Enjoy pleasure, and take thy fill of it; cast away care, and resolve to be merry." So a man may be, and yet have none of these fine things which he here got to entertain himself with; many that are poor are very much relieved in this manner. Mirth is the entertainment of the fancy, and though it comes short of the solid delights of the rational powers, yet it is to be preferred before those that are merely carnal and sensual. Some distinguish man from the brutes, not only as animal rationale - a rational animal, but as animal visible - a visible animal; therefore he that said to his soul, Take thine ease, eat and drink, added, And be merry, for it was in order to that he would eat and drink. "Try therefore," says Solomon, "to laugh and be happy." 2. The judgment he passed upon this experiment; Behold, this also is vanity, like all the rest, it yields no true satisfaction, v. 2. I said of laughter, It is mad, or, Thou art mad, and therefore I will have nothing to do with thee; and of mirth, (of all sports and recreations, and whatever pretends to divert, and amuse, or divert thy thoughts,) Nothing is so ungrateful as excessive mirth, and carnal excesses in a wondrous manner are so abominable. It serves us but for a short season. It yields but a short comfort, and a short rest. It fills us with small satisfaction, but at the expense of our reason, and even our reason is too much mortified, and disordered, by it. It fills us with a little joy, but it soon passes away. Inconcernable mirth, soberly, seasonably, and moderately, used, is a good thing, fits for business, and helps to soften the toils and chagrin of human life; but, when it is excessive and immoderate, it is foolish and fruitless. (1.) It does no good; What doeth it? Cui bono - Of what use is it? It will not avail to quiet a guilty conscience; no, nor to ease a sorrowful spirit; nothing is more ungrateful than singing songs to a heavy heart. It will not satisfy the soul, nor give it true content. It is but a palliative cure to the grievances of this present time. Great laughter commonly ends in a sigh. (2.) It does a great deal of hurt; it is mad, it makes men mad, it transports men into many indecencies, which are a reproach to their reason and religion. They are mad that indulge themselves in it, for it estranges the heart from God and divine things, and insensibly eats out the power of religion. Those that love to be merry and make a sport of their souls, they are the timbrel and harp, they say to the Almighty, Depart from us, Job xxii. 12, 14. We may, as Solomon, prove ourselves with mirth, and judge of the state of our souls by this; How do we stand affected to it? Can we be merry and wise? Can we use it as sauce, and not as food? But we need not try, as Solomon did, whether it will make a happiness for us, for, we may take his word for it, It is mad, and What doeth it? Laughter and pleasure (says Sir William Temple) come from very different affections of the mind; for as men have no disposition to laugh at things they are most pleased with, so they are very little pleased with many things they laugh at. 11. Finding himself not happy in that which pleased his fancy, he resolved next to try that which would please the palate, v. 3. Since the knowledge of the creature would not satisfy, he would see what the knowledge of the food might yield. He resolved to give myself unto wine, to good meat and good drink; many give themselves to these without consulting their hearts at all, not looking any further than merely the gratification of the sensual appetite; but Solomon applied himself to it rationally, and as a man; critically, and only to make an experiment. Observe, 1. He did not allow himself any liberty in the use of the delights of sense till he had tried himself with his severe studies; till his increase of wisdom proved an increase of sorrow, he never thought of giving himself to wine. When we have spent ourselves in doing good, we may then most comfortably refresh ourselves with the gifts of God's bounty. Then the delights of sense are rightly used, when they are used as we use cordials, only when we need them; as Timothy drank wine for his health's sake, 1 Tim. v. 23. I thought to draw my flesh with wine; so the margin reads it, or to wine. Those that have addicted themselves to drinking did at first put a form upon themselves, and in time became so addicted to it, as Solomon says, He shall fall to the pit, and we read with it, and with it; but they should remember to what miseries they hereby draw themselves. 2. He then looked upon it as folly, and it was with reluctance that he gave himself to it; as St. Paul, when he commenced himself, called it a weakness, and desired to be borne with in his foolishness, 2 Cor. xi. 1. I sought to lay hold on folly, to see the utmost that that folly would do toward making men happy; but he has that regard for the rest (as we say) too far. He resolved that the folly should not take hold of him, not get the mastery of him, but he would lay hold on it, and keep it at a distance; yet he found it too hard for him. 3. He took care at the same time to acquaint himself with wisdom, to manage himself wisely in the use of his pleasures, so that they should not do him any prejudice, nor disfigure him to be a competent judge of them. When he drew his flesh with wine, he let his heart be filled with wisdom, so the word is; kept up his pursuits after knowledge, did not make a set of himself, nor become a slave to his pleasures, but his studies and his feasts were folly to each other, and he tried whether both mixed together would give him that satisfaction which he could not find in either separately. This Solomon proposed to himself, but he found it vanity; for they that think to give themselves to wine, and yet to acquaint their hearts with wisdom, they never will agree; and we are as much as they do that think to serve both God and mammon. Wine is a mocker, it is a great cheat, and it will be impossible for any man to say that thus far he will give himself to it, and no further. 4. That which he aimed at, was, not to gratify his appetite, but to find out man's happiness, and this, because it pretended to be so, must be tried among the rest. Observe the description he gives of the foolish sons of man, which they should do under the heaven all their days. (1.) That which we are to inquire after is not so much the good we must have, we may leave that to God, but the good we must do, that ought to be our care. Good Master, what good thing shall I do? Our happiness consists not in being idle, but in doing right, in being well employed. If we do that which is good, no doubt we shall have comfort and praise of the same. (2.) It is good to be done under the heaven, while we are here in this world, while it is day, while our doing time lasts; this is our state of work and service, it is in the other world that we must expect the retribution, thither our works will follow us. (3.) It is to be done all the days of our life; the good we are to do we must persevere in the doing of it to the end, while our doing time lasts; the number of the days of our life, so it is in the general; and in the particular, he that tried the most, that was the fittest to be trusted with the wealth and the power and the office of a prince. It is the prince in whose hand our times are, and they are all to be spent as he directs. But that any man should give himself to wine, in hopes to find cut in that the best way of living in this world, was an absurdity which Solomon here, in the reflection, condemns himself for. Is it possible that this should be the good that men should do? No; it is plainly very bad. III. Perceiving quickly that it was folly to give himself to wine, he next tried the most easily the entertainments and amusements of princes and great men. He had a vast income, the revenue of his...

crown was very great, and he laid it out so as might most please his own humour, and make him look great.

1. He gave himself much to building, both in the city and in the country; and, having been at such vast expense, in the beginning of his reign, to build a house for God, he was the more excusable if afterward he pleased his own fancy in building for himself; he began to do the latter, as also the former, Matth. 33. not as the people (Hag. i. 4.) that setled their own houses while God's lay waste, and it prospered accordingly. In building, he had the pleasure of employing the poor, and doing good to posterity. We read of Solomon's buildings, (1 Kings ix. 15-19.) and they were all great works, such as became his purse, and spirit, and great dignity. See his mistake; he inquired after the great works he should do, (v. 5.) and, in pursuit of the inquiry, applied himself to great works. Good works indeed are truly great, but many are reputed great works, which are far from being good; wondrous works, which are not gracious, Matth. vii. 22.

2. He took to love a garden, which is to some as bewitching as building; he planted him vineyards, which the soil and climate of the land of Canaan favoured; he made him fine gardens and orchards, (v. 5.) and perhaps the art of gardening was no way inferior then to what it became, and is only found, of old time, but trees of all kind of fruit, which he himself had planted; and, if any worldly business would yield a man happiness, surely it must be that which Adam was employed in while he was in innocency.

3. He laid out a great deal of money in waterworks, ponds, and canals; not for sport and diversion, but for use, to water the wood that brings forth trees; (v. 6.) he not only planted, but watered, and then left it to God to give the increase. Springs of water are great blessings; (Josh. xv. 19.) but where nature has provided them, art must direct them, to make them serviceable, Prov. xxxi. 1.

4. He increased his family. When he proposed to himself to do great works, he must employ many hands, and therefore procured servants and maidsens, which were bought with his money, and of those he had servants born in his house, v. 7. Thus his retinue was enlarged, and his court appeared more magnificent, than Ezra i. 58.

5. He did not neglect country-business, but both entertained and enriched himself with that, and was not diverted from it either by his studies, or by his pleasures. He had large possessions of great and small cattle, herds and flocks, as his father had before him; (1 Chron. xxvii. 29, 31.) not forgetting that his father, in the beginning, was a keeper of sheep. Let those that deal in cattle neither despise their employment, nor be weary of it, remembering that Solomon puts his having possessions of cattle among his great works and his pleasures.

6. He grew very rich, and was not at all impoverished by his building and gardening, as many are, who, for that reason only, repent it, and call it vanity and vexation. Solomon scattered, yet increased. He filled his exchequer with silver and gold, which yet did not stagger him, but were made to circulate through his kingdom. It was not that he made a show of them, to multiply himself, but in order to the improvement of the other parts of his kingdom; to enrich his subjects. He had the Segullah, the peculiar treasure of kings, and of the provinces, which was, for richness and rarity, more accounted of than silver and gold. The neighbouring kings, and the distant provinces of his own empire, sent him the richest presents they had, to obtain his favour, and the instructions of his wisdom.

7. He had every thing that was charming and diverting, all sorts of melody and music, vocal and instrumental, men-singers and women-singers, the best voices he could pick up, and all the wind and hand-instruments that were then in use. His father had a genius for music, but it should seem he employed it more to serve his devotion than the sons, who made it more his diversion. These are called the delights of the sons of men; for the gratifications of sense are the things that the generality of people set their affections upon, and take the greatest care to accommodate their wants. Solomon, then, says, though the children of God are of quite another nature, pure, spiritual, and heavenly, and the delights of angels.

8. He enjoyed, more than ever any man did, a composition of rational and sensitive pleasures at the same time. He was, in this respect, great, and increased more than all that were before him, that he was wise amidst a thousand earthly enjoyments. It was strange, and the like was never met with.

(1.) That his pleasures did not debauch his judgment and conscience. In the midst of all these entertainments, his wisdom remained with him, v. 9. In the midst of all these childish delights, he preserved his spirit manly, kept the possession of his own soul, and maintained the dominion of reason over the appetites of sense; such a vast stock of wisdom had he, that it was not wasted and impaired, as any other man's would have been, by this course of life! But let none be imbodced hereby to lay the reins on the neck of the children of this world; neither must we forget that one may do that, and yet retain their wisdom, for they have not such a strength of wisdom as Solomon had; nay, and Solomon was deceived; for how did his wisdom remain with him, when he lost his religion so far as to build altars to strange gods, for the humouring of his strange wives? But thus far his wisdom remained with him, that he was master of his pleasures, and not a slave to them, and kept himself capable of making a judgment of those things which were of greater moment than the satisfaction of his desires.

(2.) Yet his judgment and conscience gave no check to his pleasures, nor hindered him from extracting the very quintessence of the delights of sense, v. 10. It might be objected against his judgment in this matter, that, if his wisdom remained with him, he could not take the liberty that was his portion, even when he was surrounded with all the pleasures of the world. He went over to the enemies' country, not as a deserter, but as a spy, to discover the nakedness of their land.

"Yea," said he, "I took as great a liberty as any man could take, for whatsoever mine eyes desired, I kept not from them, if it could be compassed by lawful means, though ever so difficult or costly; and as I withheld not any joy from my heart, that I had a mind to, so I withheld not my heart from any joy, but, with a non-obstante—with the full exercise of my wisdom, I had a high gust of my pleasures, relished and enjoyed them as much as ever Epicure did;" nor was there anything either, in the circumstances of his condition, or in the temper of his spirit, to sour or irritate him, or give them any allay. In short, [1.] He had as much pleasure in his business as ever any man had; My heart rejoiced in all my labour; so that the toil and fatigue of that were no damp to his pleasures. [2.] He had no less profit by his business, he met with no disappointment in it to give him any disturbance. This was my portion of the labour of my hands. And then he added to all the rest of his pleasures, that in them he did not only see, but eat, the labour of his hands; and this was all he had, for indeed it was all he could expect, from his labour. It sweetened his business, that he enjoyed the success of it, and it sweetened his enjoyments, that they were the product of his business; so that, upon the whole, he was certainly as happy as the world could make him happy.
and behold, all was very good, every thing pleased him; but when Solomon reviewed all the works that his hands had wrought, with the utmost cost and care, and the labour that he had laboured to do, in order to make himself easy and happy, nothing answered his expectation; behold, all was vanity and vexation of spirit, he had no satisfaction in it, no advantage by it; there was no profit under the sun, neither by the employments, nor by the enjoyments, of this world.

12. And I turned myself to behold wisdom, and madness, and folly: for what can the man do that cometh after the king? even that which hath been already done. 13. Then I saw that wisdom excelleth folly, as far as light excelleth darkness. 14. The wise man’s eyes are in his head, but the fool walketh in darkness: and I myself perceived also that one event happeneth to them all. 15. Then said I in my heart, As it happeneth to the fool, so it happeneth even to me: and why was I then more wise? Then I said in my heart, that this also is vanity. 16. For there is no remembrance of the wise more than of the fool for ever: seeing that which now is, in the days to come shall all be forgotten. And how dieth the wise man? As the fool.

Solomon having tried what satisfaction was to be had in learning first, and then in the pleasures of sense, and having also put both together, he here compares them with one another, and passes a judgment upon them.

1. He sets himself to consider both wisdom and folly. He had considered these before; (ch. 1. 17.) but, lest it should be thought he was then too quick in passing a judgment upon them, he here turns himself again to behold them, to see if, upon a second examination, and application of his mind, he could gain more satisfaction in the search than he had done upon the first. He was sick of his pleasures, and, as nauseating them, he turned from them, that he might again apply himself to speculation; and if, upon this rehearing of the cause, the verdict be still the same, the judgment will surely be decisive; for what can the man do that cometh after the king; especially such a king, who had so much of this world to make the experiment upon, and so much wisdom to make it with? The baffled trial needs not be repeated; no man can expect to find more satisfaction in the world than Solomon did, nor to gain a greater insight into the principles of morality; when a man has done what he can, still it is that which has been already done. Let us learn, (1.) Not to indulge ourselves in a fond conceit that we can mend that which has been well done before us; let us esteem others better than ourselves, and think how unfit we are to attempt the improvement of the performances of better heads and hands than ours, and rather own how much we are beholden to them, John iv. 37, 38. (2.) To acquiesce in Solomon’s judgment of the things of this world, and not to think of repeating the trial; for we can never think of having such advantages as he had to make the experiment, nor of being able to make it with equal application of mind, and so little danger to ourselves.

2. He gives the preference to wisdom far before folly; let none mistake him, as if, when he speaks of the vanity of human literature, he designed only to amuse men with a paradox, or were about to write (as a great wit once did) Encomium moriæ—A panegyric in praise of folly; no, he is maintaining sacred truths, and therefore he is careful to guard against being misunderstood. I soon saw (says he) that there is an excellency in wisdom more than in folly, as much as there is in light above darkness. The pleasures of wisdom, though they suffice not to make men happy, yet they vastly transcend the pleasures of wine. Wisdom enlighteneth the soul with surprising discoveries, and usurps directions for the right government of itself; but sensuality (for that seems to be especially the folly here meant) clouds and eclipses the mind, and is as darkness to it, it puts out men’s eyes, makes them to stumble in the way, and wander out of it. Or, though wisdom and knowledge will not make a man happy, (St. Paul shows a more excellent way than gifts, and that is grace,) yet it is much better to have these than to be at a loss, or at a plunge, either bewildered, that he knows not which way to go, or embarrassed, that he cannot go forward. A man that is discreet and considers has the command of his business, and acts decently and safely, as those that walk in the day; but he that is rash, and ignorant, and sottish, is continually making blunders, running upon one precipice or other, his projects, his bargains, are all foolish, and ruin his affairs. Therefore get wisdom, get understanding.

3. Yet he is not satisfied with the vanities of lasting happiness and satisfaction, the wisdom of this world gives a man very little advantage: for,

(1.) Wise men and fools fare alike. “It is true, the wise man has very much the advantage of the fool, in respect of foresight and insight, and yet the greatest probabilities do so often come short of success, that I myself perceived, by my own experience, that one event happeneth to them all;” (v. 14.) or, it is true, that they are so sick as those who are most careless of it, and the most suspicious are imposed upon.” David had observed that wise men die, and are involved in the same common calamity with the fool and the brutish person, Ps. xlix. 12. See ch. ix. 11. Nay, it has of old been observed, that Fortune favours fools, and that half-witted men often thrive most, while the greatest projectors forecast worst for themselves. The same kindness, the same sword, devours wise men and fools.

Solomon applies this mortifying observation to himself, (v. 15.) that, though he was a wise man, he might not glory in his wisdom; I said to my heart, when it began to be proud or secure, As it happeneth to the fool, so it happeneth to me, even to me; for thus emphatically it is expressed in the original; So, as for me, it happeneth to me. Am I rich? So is many a Nabab that fares as sumptuously as I do. Is a fool so sick as he does get a fall? So do I. I am even I; and neither my wealth nor my wisdom will be my security. And why was I then more wise? Why should I take so much pains to get wisdom, when, as to this life, it will stand me in so little stead? Then said I in my heart, that this also is vanity. Some make this a correction of what was said before, like that, (Ps. lxvii. 10.) “I said, This is my infirmity; it is my folly to think that wise men to fools, and a man upon a level;” but really they seem to be the same, in respect of the event, and therefore it is rather a confirmation of what he had before said.
That a man may be a profound philosopher and politician, and yet not be a happy man.

(2.) Wise men and fools are forgotten alike; (v. 16.) There is no remembrance of the wise more than of the fool. It is promised to the righteous, that they shall be hid in everlasting remembrance, and their memory shall be blessed; and they shall shortly shine as the stars; but there is no such promise made concerning the wisdom of this world, that that shall perpetuate men's names, for those names only are perpetuated that are written in heaven, and otherwise the names of this world's wise men are written with those of its fools in the dust. That which now is, in the days to come, shall all be forgotten. What was much talked of in one generation, is, in the next, as if it had never been. New persons and new things justou out the very remembrance of the old, which in a little time are looked upon with contempt, and at length quite buried in oblivion. Where is the wise? Where is the disputer of this world? 1 Cor. i. 20. And it is upon this account that he asks, How dies the wise man? As the fool. Between the death of a godly and wicked man there is a great difference, but not between the death of a wise man and a fool; the fool is buried and forgotten; (ch. viii. 10.) and no one remembered the poor man that by his wisdom delivered the city; (ch. ix. 15.) so that to both the grave is a land of forgetfulness; and wise and learned men, when they have been awhile there out of sight, grow out of mind, a new generation arises, that knew them not.

17. Therefore I hated life; because the work that is wrought under the sun is grievous unto me: for all is vanity and vexation of spirit. 18. Yea, I hated all my labour which I had taken under the sun; because I should leave it unto the man that shall be after me. 19. And who knoweth whether he shall be a wise man or a fool? yet shall he have rule over all my labour wherein I have laboured, and wherein I have showed myself wise under the sun. This is also vanity. 20. Therefore I went about to cause my heart to despair of all the labour which I took under the sun. 21. For there is a man whose labour is in wisdom, and in knowledge, and in equity; yet to a man that hath not laboured therein shall he leave it for his portion. This also is vanity, and a great evil. 22. For what hath man of all his labour, and of the vexation of his heart, wherein he hath laboured under the sun? 23. For all his days are sorrows, and his travail grief: yea, his heart taketh not rest in the night. This also is vanity. 24. There is nothing better for a man than that he should eat and drink, and that he should make his soul enjoy good in his labour. This also I saw, that it was from the hand of God. 25. For who can eat, or who else can bestow hereunto, more than I? 26. For God giveth to a man that is good in his sight, wisdom, and knowledge, and joy: but to the sinner he giveth travail, to gather, and to hear up, that he may give to him that is good before God. This also is vanity and vexation of spirit.

Business is a thing that wise men have pleasure in; they are in their element when they are in their business, and complain if they be out of business; they may sometimes be tired with their business, but they are not weary of it, nor willing to leave it off; here is a piece of one would expect to have heard the good that men should do, but Solomon tried this too; after a contemplative life, and a voluptuous life, he betook himself to an active life, and found no more satisfaction in it than in the other, still it is all vanity and vexation of spirit; of which he gives an account in these verses. Where observe,

1. What the business was which he made trial of; it was business under the sun, (v. 17-20.) about the things of this world, the riches, the honours, and pleasures, of this present time; it was the business of a king. There is business above the sun, perpetual business, which is perpetual blessedness: what we do, in conformity to that business (doing God's will as it is done in heaven, and in pursuance of that blessedness,) will turn to a good account, we shall have no reason to hate that labour, nor to despair of it; but it is labour under the sun, labour for the meat that perisheth, (John vi. 27. Isa. lv. 2.) that Solomon betook himself to in the end; this was the better sort of business, not that of the bidders and drawers of water, (it is not so strange if men hate all that labour,) but it was in wisdom, and knowledge, and equity, v. 21. It was rational business, which related to the government of his kingdom, and the advancement of its interests. It was labour managed by the dictates of wisdom, of natural and acquired knowledge, and the directions of justice; it was labour at the council-board and in the courts of justice; it was labour wherein he showed himself wise, (v. 19.) which as much excels the labour wherein men only show themselves strong, as the endowments of the mind, by which we are all led to angels, do those of the body, which we have in common with the brutes. That which many people have in their eye more than any thing else, in the prosecution of their worldly business, is, to show themselves wise, to get the reputation of ingenious men, and men of sense and application.

II. His falling out with this business; he soon grew weary of it. 1. He hated all his labour, because he did not meet with that satisfaction in it which he expected: after he had had his fine houses, and gardens, and water-works, awhile, he began to nauseate them, and look upon them with contempt, as children, who are eager for a toy, and fond of it at first, but, when they have played with it awhile, are weary of it, and throw it away, and must have another. This speaks not a gracerus hatred of these things, which is our duty, to love them less than God and religion, (Luke xiv. 26.) nor a sinful hatred of them, which is our folly, to be weary of the place God has assigned us and the work of it, but a natural hatred of them, arising from a surfeit upon them, and a sense of disappointment in them. 2. He caused his heart to despair of all his labour; (v. 20.) he took pains to possess himself with a deep sense of the vanity of worldly business, that it would not bring in the advantage and satisfaction he had formerly flattered himself with the hopes of. Our hearts are very loath to quit their expectations of great things from the creature, we must go about, must fetch a compass, in arguing with them, to convince them that there is not that in the business of this world which we are apt to make all the world, we are apt to mislead ourselves from them. Have we so often bored and sunk into this earth for some rich mine of satisfaction, and found not the least sign or token of it but been always frustrated in the search, and shall we not at length set our hearts at rest, and despair of ever finding it? 3. He came to that, at length, that he hated life itself, (v. 17.) because it is subject to such pure necessities, such unceasing disappointments. God had given Solomon such lurging of heart, and such vast capacities of mind, that he experienced more than other men of the unsatisfying nature of all the things of this life, and their insufficiency to make them happy. Life itsel, that is so precious to a man, and such a blessing to a good man, may become a burthen to a man of business.
But the reasons of this quarrel with his life and labours. Two things made him weary of them.
1. That his business was so great a toil to himself; the work that he had wrought under the sun was grievous unto him, v. 17. His thoughts and cares about it, and that close and constant application of mind, which was requisite to it, were a burthen and fatigue to him, especially when he grew old. It is the effect of a curse on that we are to work upon.
Our business is said to be the work and toil of our hands, because of the ground which the Lord had cursed, (Gen. v. 29.) and of the weakening of the faculties we are to work with, and of the sentence pronounced on us, that in the sweat of our face we must eat bread. Our labour is called the vexation of our heart; (v. 22.) it is to most a force upon themselves, so natural is it to us to love our ease. A man of business is described to be uneasy both in his going out and his coming in, v. 23. (1.) He is deprived of his pleasure by day, for his hours are short, not only sorrowful, but sorrowful only, nay, many sorrows and various; his travail, or labour, all day, is grief. Men of business ever and anon meet with that which vexes them, and is an occasion of anger or sorrow to them. They are apt to fret; the more dealings they have in the world, the oftener they are made to fret. The world is a vale of tears, even to those that have much of it. They that labour are said to be heavy-laden, and are therefore called to come to Christ for rest, Matt.
xi. 28. (2.) He is disturbed in his repose by night.
When he is overcome with the hurries of the day, and hopes to find relief when he lays his head on his pillow, he is disappointed there; cares hold his eyes waking, or, if he sleep, yet his heart wakes, and that takes no rest in the night. See what fools they are, that make themselves drudges to the world, and do not make God their Rest; night and day they cannot but be uneasy, and when the Lord tells that, upon the whole matter, it is all vanity, v. 17.
This is vanity in particular, (v. 19, 23.) nay, it is vanity and a great evil, v. 21. It is a great affront to God, and a great injury to themselves, therefore a great evil; it is a vain thing to rise up early and sit up late, in pursuit of this world's goods, which were never designed to be our chief good.
2. That the gains of his business must be all left to others. Prospect of advantage is the spring of all our labour, because they hope to get by it; if the hope fail, the labour flags; and therefore Solomon quarreled with all the works, the great works, he had made, because they would not be of any lasting advantage to himself.
(1.) He must leave them. He could not, at death, take them away with them, nor any share of them, nor should he return any more to them, (Job vii. 10.)
neither therefore is it vanity to return them to any good, Luke xvi. 25. But I must leave all to the man that shall be after me, to the generation that comes up in the room of that which is passing away.
As there were many before us, who built the houses that we live in, and into whose purchases and labour we have entered, so there shall be many after us, who shall live in the houses that we build, and enjoy the fruit of our purchases and labours. Never was land lost for want of an heir. To a gracious soul this is no meanness at all; why should we waste other men's time and affairs in this world, and not rather be pleased, that, when we are gone, those that come after us shall fare the better for our wisdom and industry? But to a worldly mind, that seeks for its own happiness in the creature, it is a great vexation to think of leaving the beloved self behind, at this uncertainty.
(2.) He must leave them to those that would never have taken so much pains for them, and will therefore by excuse himself from taking any more. He that raised the estate did it by labouring in wisdom, and knowledge, and equity; but he that enjoys it,
and spends it, (it may be,) has not laboured therein,
(v. 21.) and, more than that, never will; the bee toils to maintain the drone. Nay, it proves a snare to him, it is left him for his portion, which he rests in, and takes up with; and miserable he is in being put off with it for a portion. Whereas if an estate had not come to him thus easily, who knows but he might have been both industrious and religious? Yet we ought not to perplex ourselves about this, since it may prove otherwise, that what is well-get may come to one that will use it well, and do good with it.
(3.) He knows not whom he must leave it to, (for God makes heirs,) or, at least, what he will prove to whom he leaves it, whether a wise man or a fool, a wise man that will make it more, or a fool that will bring it to nothing; yet he shall have a rule called all my labour, and feelishly undeath at which his father wisely did. It is probable that Solomon wrote this very feelingly, being afraid what Richeboan would prove. St. Jerem, in his commentary on this passage, applies this to the good books which Solomon wrote, in which he had shown himself wise, but he knew not into whose hands they would fall, perhaps into the hands of a fool, who, according to the perverseness of his heart, makes a bad use of what was well written. So that, upon the whole matter, he asks, (v. 22.) What has man of all his labour? What has he to himself, and to his own use? What has he that will go with him into another world?
IV. The best use which is therefore to be made of the wealth of this world; and that is, to use it cheerfully, to take the comfort of it, and do good with it. With this he concludes the chapter, v.
24-26. There is no true happiness to be found in these things; they are vain, and if happiness be expected from them, the disappointment will be vexation of spirit; but he will put us in a way to make the best of them, and to avoid the inconveniences he had observed. 1. We must not over-til ourselves, so as, in pursuit of more, to rob ourselves of the comfort of what we have. 2. We must not over-heard for hereafter, nor lose our own enjoyment of what we have, to lay it up for these that shall come after us, but serve ourselves cut of it first. Observe,
(1.) What that good is which is here recommended to us; and which is the utmost pleasure and profit we can expect or extract from the business and profit of this world, and the furthest we can go to rescue it from its vanity, and the vexation that is in it.
[1] We must do our duty with them, and be more in care how to use an estate well, for the ends for which we were intrusted with it, than to have it or increase an estate. This is estimated,
v. 26, where those only are said to have the con-fort of this life, who are good in God's sight; and again, good before God, truly good, as Noah, whom God saw righteous before him. We must set God always before us, and give diligence in every thing to approve ourselves to him. The Chaldee, paraphrase says, A man should make his soul to enjoy good by keeping the commandments of God, and walking in the ways that are right before him; and (v. 25.) by studying the words of the law and discerning about the day of the great judgment that is to come.

[2.] We must take the comfort of them. Those things will not make a happiness for the soul; all the good we can have out of them is for the body, and if we make use of them for the comfortable support of that, so that it may be fit to serve the soul, and able to keep pace with it in the service of God, then they turn to a good account. There is therefore nothing better for us to do than to make ourselves a sober cheerful use of them, according as his rank and condition are, to love meat and drink of them for himself, his family, his friends, and so delight his senses, and make his soul enjoy good, all the good that is to be had out of them; do not lose that, in pursuit of that good, which is not to be had out of them. But observe, He would not have us to give up business, and take our ease, that we may eat and drink; no, we must enjoy good in our labour; we must use these things, not to excuse us from, but to make us diligent and cheerful in, our worldly business.

[3.] We must herein acknowledge God, we must see that it is from the hand of God; First, The good things themselves that we enjoy, are so, not only the products of his creating power, but the gifts of his providential bounty to us. And then they are truly pleasant to us, when we take them from the hand of God as a Father, when we eye his wisdom giving us that which is fittest for us, and acquisite in it, and taste his love and goodness, relish them, and are thankful for them. Secondly, A heart to enjoy them is so; this is the gift of God's grace. Unless he gives us wisdom to make a right use of what he has, in his providence, bestowed upon us, and, withal, peace of conscience, that we may discern God's favour in the world's smiles, we cannot make our souls enjoy any good in them.

[2.] Why should we have this in our eye, in the management of ourselves as to this world, and look up to God for it.

[1.] Because Solomon himself, with all his possessions, could aim at no more, and desire no better; (v. 23.) "Who can hasten this more than I? This is that which I was ambitious of, I wished for no more, and those that have but little, in comparison with what I have, may attain to this, to be content with what they have, and enjoy the good of it." Yet Solomon could not obtain it by his own wisdom, we know that the special grace of God, and God's power, corrects us to expect it from the hand of God, and pray to him for it.

[2.] Because riches are a blessing, or a curse, to a man, according as he has, or has not, a heart to make good use of them. First, God makes them a reward to a good man, if with them he give him wisdom, and knowledge, and joy, to enjoy them cheerfully himself, and to communicate them charitably to others. To those who are good in God's sight, who are of a good spirit, honest and sincere, pay a deference to their God, and have a tender concern for all mankind, God will give wisdom and knowledge in this world, and joy with the righteous in the world to come; so the Chaldee. Or, he will give that wisdom and knowledge in things natural, moral, political, and divine, which will be a constant joy and pleasure to them.

Secondly, He makes them a punishment to a bad man, if he denies him the heart to take the comfort of them, for they do but tantalize him, and tyrannize over him; To the sinner God gives travail, by leaving him to himself and his own foolish counsels, to gather and to heap up that which, as to himself, will not only burn him like thick clay, (Hab. ii. 6.) but be a witness against him, and eat his flesh as it were fire; (Jam. v. 5.) while God designs, by an overruling providence, to give it to him that he himself, before him; for the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just, and gathered for him that will perish the floor. Note, 1. Godliness, with contentment, is great gain; and those only have true joy that are good in God's sight, and that have it from him, and in him. 2. Ungodliness is commonly punished with discontent and an insatiable covetousness, which are sins that are their own punishment. 3. When God gives abundance to wicked men, it is with design to force them to a resignation in favour of his own children, when they are of age, and ready for it; as the Cannanities kept possession of the good land till the time appointed for Israel's entering upon it.

Lastly, The burden of the song is still the same; This is also vanity and vexation of spirit. It is vanity, at the best, even to the good man; when he has all that the sinner has scraped together, it will not make him happy without something else; but it is vexation of spirit to the sinner to see what he had, but do not. In sum, Solomon, in the end, is led by himself, and therefore evil in his. So that, take it which way you will, the conclusion is firm, All is vanity, and vexation of spirit.

CHAP. III.

Solomon having showed the vanity of studies, pleasures, and business, and made it to appear that happiness is not to be found in the search of the gardens of Epicurus, or upon the exchange, he proceeds, in this chapter, further to prove his doctrine, and the inference he had drawn from it; That therefore we should cheerfully content ourselves with, and make use of what God has given us by himself, for the multiplicity of all human affairs, v. 1. 10. II. The immutability of the divine counsels concerning them, and the unsearchableness of those counsels, v. 11. 15. III. The vanity of worldly pleasures and power, which are used for the support of oppression and persecution, if men be not governed by the fear of God in the use of it, v. 16. For a check to proud oppressors, and to show them their vanity, he reminds them, 1. That they will be called to account for it; v. 17. 2. That their condition, in reference to this world, (for of that he speaks,) is no better than that of the brutes, v. 18. 21. And therefore he concludes, that it is our wisdom to make use of all we have, for our comfort, and not oppress others with it.

1. To every thing there is a season, and a time to every purpose under the heaven: 2. A time to be born, and a time to die; a time to plant, and a time to pluck up that which is planted; 3. A time to kill, and a time to heal; a time to break down, and a time to build up; 4. A time to weep, and a time to laugh; a time to mourn, and a time to dance; 5. A time to cast away stones, and a time to gather stones together; a time to embrace, and a time to refrain from embracmg; 6. A time to get, and a time to lose; a time to keep, and a time to cast away; 7. A time to rend, and a time to sew; a time to keep silence, and a time to speak; 8. A time to love, and a time to hate; a time of war, and a time of peace. 9. What profit hath he that worketh in that wherein he laboureth? 10. I have seen the travail, which God hath given to the sons of men to be exercised in it.
1. That we live in a world of changes. That the several events of time, and conditions of human life, are interwoven together in a manner that we cannot escape from, and yet continually pass and repass between them; as in the revolutions of every day and every year. In the wheel of nature, (Jam. iii. 6.) sometimes one spoke is uppermost, and by and by the contrary; there is a constant ebbing and flowing, waxing and waning; from one extreme to the other does the fashion of this world change, ever did, and ever will.

2. That every change concerning us, and the time and season of it, is unalterably fixed and determined by a Supreme Power; and we must take things as they come, for it is not in our power to change what is appointed for us. And this comes in here as a reason why, when we are in prosperity, we should be easy, and yet not secure; not secure, because we live in a world of changes, and therefore have no reason to say, To-morrow shall be as this day; the lowest valleys join to the highest mountains; and yet to be easy, and, as he had advised, (ch. ii. 24.) to enjoy the good of our labour, in a humble dependence upon God and his providence, neither lifted up with hopes, nor cast down with fears, but with evenness of mind expecting every event. Here we have, 1. A general proposition laid down, To every thing there is a season, v. 1. Those things which seem most contrary the one to the other, will, in the revolution of affairs, each take their turn, and come into play. The day will give place to the night, and the night again to the day. Is it summer? Will it be winter? Is it winter? Stay awhile, and it will be summer. Every purpose has its time. The clearest sky will be clouded, Post gaudia tactus—Joy succeeds sorrow; and the most cloudy sky will clear up; Post nobile Phoebus—The sun will burst from behind the cloud. 2. Those things which to us seem most casual and contingent, are, in the counsel and foreknowledge of God, unconditionally determined, and the very hour of them fixed, which can neither be anticipated nor adjourned a moment.

II. The proof and illustration of it by the induction of particulars, twenty-eight in number, according to the days of the moon's revolution, which is always increasing or decreasing between its full and change; some of these changes are purely the act of God, others depend more upon the will of man, but all are determined by the divine counsel. Every thing changeable is thus changeable, but in heaven there is an unchangeable state, and an unchangeable counsel, concerning these things.

1. There is a time to be born, and a time to die; these are determined by the divine counsel, and, as we were born, so we must die, at the time appointed, Acts xvii. 26. Some observe that there is a time to be born, and a time to die, but no time to live; that is so short, that it is not worth mentioning; as soon as a child is born, it is to die. There is a time to be born, and a time to die, so there will be a time to rise again, a set time when they that lie in the grave shall be remembered, Job xiv. 13.

2. A time for God to plant a nation, as that of Israel in Canaan, and, in order to that, to pluck up the seven nations that were planted there, to make room for them; and at length there was a time when God spake concerning Israel too, to pluck up and to dash down, and to give them for meat to all their enemies, Is. lxv. 7. There is a time for to plant, a time of the year, a time of their lives, but when that which was planted is grown fruitless and useless, it is time to pluck it up.

3. A time to kill, when the judgments of God are abroad in a land, and lay all waste; but when he returns in ways of mercy, then is a time to heal what he has torn, (Hos. vi. 1, 2.) to comfort a people after the time that he has afflicted them, Ps. xl. 15. There is a time when it is the wisdom of rulers to use severe methods, but there is a time when it is as much their wisdom to take a more gentle course, and to apply themselves to remedies, not corrosives.

4. A time to break down a family, an estate, a kingdom, when it has ripened itself for destruction; but God will find a time, if they return and repent, to rebuild what he has broken down; there is a time, a set time, for the Lord to build up Zion, Ps. cvi. 15, 16. There is a time for men to break up house, to break off trade, and so to break down, which they that are busy building up both must expect and prepare for.

5. A time when God's providence calls to weep and mourn, and when man's wisdom and grace will comply with the call, and will weep and mourn, as in times of common calamity and danger, and then it is very absurd to laugh, and dance, and make merry; (Isa. xxii. 12, 13. Ezek. xxi. 16.) but then, on the other hand, there is a time when God calls to cheerfulness, a time to laugh and dance, and then he expects we should serve him with joyfulness and gladness of heart. Observe, The time of mourning and weeping is put first, before that of laughter and dancing, for we must first sow in tears, and then reap in joy.

6. A time to cast away stones, by breaking down and demolishing fortifications, when God gives peace in the borders, and there is no more occasion for them; but there is a time to gather stones together, for the making of strongholds. 5. A time for old towers to fall, as that in Sileam, (Lake xiii. 4.) and for the temple itself to be so minished, as that not one stone should be left upon another; but also a time for towers and triumphs too to be erected, when national affairs prosper.

7. A time to embrace a friend, when we find him faithful, but a time to refrain from embracing, when we find he is faithless, or unfaithful, and that we have cause to suspect him; it is then our providence to be shy, and keep at a distance. It is commonly applied to conjugal embraces, and explained by 1 Cor. vii. 3-5. Joel ii. 16.

8. A time to get, get money, get preferment, get good bargains and a good interest, when opportunity smiles; a time when a wise man will seek, (so the word is,) when he is setting out in the world, and has a growing family, when he is in his prime, when he has prospects, and has a run of business, then it is time for him to be busy, and make hay when the sun shines. There is a time to get wisdom, and knowledge, and grace, when a man has a price put into his hand; but then let him expect there will come a time to spend, when all he has will be little enough to serve his turn. Nay, there will come a time to lose, when what has been got fast will be scattered as fast, and cannot be held fast.

We are not to think that we use for what we have got, and can keep it without running the hazard of a good conscience; but there may come a time to cast away, when love to God may oblige us to cast away what we have, because we must deny Christ, and wrong our consciences, if we keep it, (Matth. x. 37, 38.) and rather to make shipwreck of all than of the faith; nay, when love to ourselves may oblige us to cast it away, when it is for the saving of our lives, as it is said, when Jonah's mariners heaved their cargo into the sea.

10. A time to rend the garments, as upon occasion of some great grief, and a time to sew them again, in token that the grief is over. A time to undo what we have done, and a time to do again what we have undone. Jerom applies it to the rending of the Jewish church, and the sewing and making up of the gospel church thereupon.
11. A time when it becomes us, and is our wisdom and duty, to keep silence, when it is an evil time, (Amos v. 13.) when our speaking would be the causing of heart before Mine, or when we are in danger of speaking amiss; (Ps. xxxix. 2.) but there is also a time to speak for the glory of God and the edification of others, when silence would be the betraying of a righteous cause, and when the mouth confession is to be made to salvation; and it is a great part of Christian prudence to know when to speak and when to hold our peace.

A time to show ourselves friendly, to be free and cheerful, and it is a pleasant time; but there may come a time to hate, when we shall see cause to break off all familiarity with some that we have been fond of, and to be upon the reserve, as having found reason for a suspicion, which love is loath to admit.

Lastly, A time of war, when God draws the sword for judgment, and gives it commission to devour; when men draw the sword for justice and the maintaining of their rights; when there is in the nations a disposition to war; but we may hope for a time of peace, when the sword of the Lord shall be sheathed, and he shall make wars to cease, (Ps. xlv. 9.) when the end of the war is obtained, and when there is on all sides a disposition to peace. War shall not last always, nor is there any peace to be called lasting, on this side the everlasting peace. Thus in all these changes God has set the one over against the other; there may rejoice as though we rejoiced not, and weep as though we wept not.

III. The inferences drawn from this observation. If our present state be subject to such vicissitude,

1. Then we must not expect our portion in it, for the good things of it are of no certainty, no continuance; (v. 9.) What profit has he that works? What can a man promise himself from planting and building, when that which he thinks is brought to perfection may so soon, and will so surely, be plucked up and broken down? All our pains and care will not alter either the mutable nature of the things themselves, or the immutable counsel of God concerning them.

2. Then we must look upon ourselves as upon our probation in it. There is indeed no profit in that wherein we labour; the thing itself, when we have it, will do us little good; but if we make a right use of the disposals of Providence about it, there will be profit in that; (v. 10.) I have seen the travail which God has given to the sons of men, not to make up a happiness by it, but to be exercised in it, to have various graces exercised by the variety of events, to have their dependence upon God tried by every change, and to be trained up to it, and taught both how to want and how to abound, Phil. iv. 12. Note, (1.) There is a great deal of toil and trouble to be seen among the children of men; labour and sorrow fill the world. (2.) This toil and this trouble are what God has allotted us; he never intended this world for our rest, and therefore never appointed us to take our ease in it. (3.) To many it proves a gift; God gives it men, as the physician gives a medicine to his patient, to do him good. This travail is given us, to make us weary of the world, and desirous of the remaining rest. (4.) It is given us, that we may be kept in action, and may always have something to do; for we were none of us sent into the world but to do good. Every change cuts us out some new work, which we should be more solicitous about than about the event.

11. He hath made every thing beautiful in his time: also he hath set the world in their heart, so that no man can find out the work that God maketh from the beginning to the end. 12. I know that there is no good in them, but for a man to rejoice, and to do good in his life. 13. And also that every man should eat and drink, and enjoy the good of his labour; it is the gift of God. 14. I know that whatsoever God doeth, it shall be for ever: nothing can be put to it, nor any thing taken from it: and God doeth it, that men should fear before him. 15. That which hath been is now: and that which is to be hath already been; and God requireth that which is past.

We have seen what changes there are in the world, and must not expect to find the world more sure to us than it has been to others. Now here he shows the hand of God in all these changes; it is he that has made every creature to be that to us that it is, and therefore we must have our eye always up unto him.

1. We must make the best of that which is, and must believe it best for the present, and accommodate ourselves to it; He has made every thing very beautiful in his time, (v. 11.) and, therefore, while its time lasts, we must be reconciled to it; nay, we must please ourselves with the beauty of it. Note, (1.) Every thing is as God has made it; it is really as he appointed it to be, not as it appears to us. (2.) All that which to us seems most unpleasant, in a little while time, is altogether becoming.

Cold is as becoming in winter as heat in summer; and the night, in its turn, is a black beauty, as the day, in its turn, is a bright one. (3.) There is a wonderful harmony in the divine providence, and all its dispositions; so that the events of it, when they come to be considered in their relations and tendencies, together with the seasons of them, will appear very beautiful to the glory of God, and the comfort of those that trust in him. Though we see not the complete beauty of providence, yet we shall see it, and a glorious sight it will be, when the mystery of God shall be finished; then every thing shall appear to have been done in the most proper time, and it will be the wonder of eternity, Deut. xxxxi. 4.

2. We must wait with patience for the full discovery of that which to us seems intricate and perplexed, acknowledging that we cannot find out the end of God's doings from the beginning to the end, and therefore must judge nothing before the time. We are to believe that God has made all beautiful, every thing is done well as in creation, so in providence, and we shall see it when the end comes, but till then we are incompetent judges of it. While the picture is in drawing, and the house in building, we see not the beauty of either: but when the artist has put his last hand to them, and given them their finishing strokes, then all appears very good. Also the work of God is not from the beginning of them, then we should see how admirably the plan was laid in the divine counsels, nor to the end of them, which crowns the action, then we should see the product to be glorious; but we must wait till the vail be rent, and not arraign God's proceedings, nor pretend to pass a judgment on them. *Secret things belong not to us."

Those words, He has set the world in their hearts, are differently understood. (1.) Some make them to be a reason why we may know more of God's work than we do; so Mr. Pemble, "God has not left himself without witness of his righteous, equal, and beautiful ordering of things, but has set it forth to be observed in the book of the world, and this he has set in men's hearts, given man a large desire, and a power, in good measure, to comprehend and understand the history of nature, with the course of human affairs, so that if men did but give themselves to the exact observation of things, they might, in most of them, perceive an admirable order and consequence. (2) Others make the will to be a reason why we, do not know so much of God's works as we might; so Bishop Reynolds: "We have the world so much in our hearts, are so taken up with thoughts and cares of worldly things, and are so exercised in our travail concerning them, that we have neither time nor spirit to eye God's hand in them."
The world has not only gained possession of the heart, but has formed prejudices there against the beauty of God's works. He must be pleased with our lot in this world, and cheerfully acquiesce in the will of God concerning us, and accommodate ourselves to it. There is no certain, lasting, good in these things; what good there is in them, we are here told, v. 12, 13. We must make a good use of them, (1.) For the benefit of others. All the good there is in them, is to do good with them, to our families, to our neighbours, to the poor, to the public, to its civil and religious interests. What have we our buildings, capacities, and estates, for, but to be made a great way serviceable to our generation? We mistake, if we think we were born for ourselves; no, it is our business to do good, it is in that that there is the truest pleasure, and what is so laid out, is best laid up, and will turn to the best account. Observe, It is to do good in this life, which is short and uncertain; we have but a little time to be doing good in, and therefore had need to redeem time. It is in this life, where we are in a state of trial and probation for another life. Every man's life is his opportunity of doing that which will make for him in eternity.
(2.) For our own comfort. Let us make ourselves easy, rejoice, and enjoy the good of our labour, as it is the gift of God, and so enjoy God in it, and taste his love, return him thanks, and make him the Centre of our joy; eat and drink to his glory, and serve him with joyful heart in the abundance of all things.
If all things in this world be so uncertain, it is a foolish thing for men sordidly to spare for the present, that they may hoard up all for hereafter; it is better to live cheerfully and usefully upon what we have, and let to-morrow take thought for the things of itself. Grace and wisdom to do this is the gift of God, and it is a good gift, which crowns the gifts of his providential bounty.
4. We must be entirely satisfied with all the disposals of the Divine Providence, both as to personal and public concerns, and bring our minds to them, because God, in all, performs the thing that is appointed for us, acts according to the counsel of his will; and we are here told, (1.) That that counsel cannot be altered, and there fore it is our wisdom to make a virtue of necessity, by submitting to it. It must be as God wills; I know it, and I know it, and I know it, and I know it, in what any thing of God that whatsoever God doeth, it shall be done, and no man doeth anything there. Ever, v. 14. He is in one mind, and who can turn him?
His measures are never broken, nor is he ever put upon new counsels, but what he has purposed shall be effected, and all the world cannot defeat or disannul it. It behoves us therefore to say, "Let it be as God wills," for how cross soever it may be to our designs and interests, God's will is his wisdom.
(2.) That that counsel needs not to be altered, for there is nothing that can be inserted between it and its accomplishment. If we could see it altogether at one view, we should see it so perfect, that nothing can be put to it, for there is no deficiency in it, nor any thing taken from it, for there is nothing in it unnecessary, or that can be spared. Like the word of God, the works of God are each perfect in their kind, and it is presumption for us either to add to them, or to diminish from them, Deut. iv. 2. It is therefore as much our interest as our duty, to bring our wills to the will of God.
5. We must study to answer God's end in all his providings, not which is, in general, to make us religious. God doth all, that men should fear before him, to convince them that there is a God above them, that has a sovereign dominion over them, at whose disposal they are, and all their ways, and in whose hands their times are, and all events concerning them; and that therefore they ought to have their eyes ever toward him, to worship and adore him, to acknowledge him in all their ways, to be careful of nothing in offending him in any thing. God thus changes his dispositions, and yet is unchangeable in his counsels, not to perplex us, much less to drive us to despair, but to teach us our duty to him, and engage us to do it. That which God designs in the government of the world, is, the support and advancement of religion among men.
6. Whatever changes we see or feel in this world, we must acknowledge the invisible tenderness of God's government. The sun rises and sets, the moon increases and decreases, and yet both are where they were, and their revolutions are in the same method from the beginning, according to the ordinances of heaven; so it is with the events of Providence; (v. 15.) That which has been, is now.
God has not of late begun to use this method; no, things were always as mutable and uncertain as they are now, and so they will be; that which is to be has already been; and therefore we speak in considerately, when we say, "Surely the world was never so bad as it is now," or, "None ever met with such disappointments as we meet with," or,
"The times will never mend;" they may mend with us, and, after a time to mourn, there may come a time to rejoice, but that will still be liable to the common character; to the common fate. The world, as it has been, is, and will be, constant in inconstancy; for God requires that which is past, repeats what he has formerly done, and deals with us no otherwise than as he has used to do with good men; shall the earth be forsaken for us, or the rock removed out of his place? There has no change befallen us, nor any temptation by it taken us, but such as is common to men. Let us not be proud and secure in prosperity, for God may recall a past trouble, and order that to seize us, and spoil our mirth; (Ps. xxx. 7.) nor let us despond in adversity, for God may call back the comforts that are gone away, as he did to Job. We may apply this to our past actions, and our behaviour under the changes that have affected us, God will call us to account for that which is past; and therefore when we enter into a new condition we should judge ourselves for our sins in our former condition, prosperous or afflicted.
16. And, moreover, I saw under the sun the place of judgment, that wickedness was there; and the place of righteousness, that iniquity was there. 17. I said in my heart, God shall judge the righteous and the wicked: for there is a time there for every purpose, and for every work. 18. I said in my heart concerning the estate of the sons of men, that God might manifest them, and that they might see that they themselves are beasts. 19. For that which belheth the sons of men belheth beasts; even one thing belheth them: as the one dieth, so oneth the other; yea, they have all one breath: so that a man hath no pre-eminence above a beast: for all is vanity. 20. All go unto one place; all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again. 21. Who knoweth the spirit of man that goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast that goeth downward to the earth? 22. Wherefore I perceive that there is nothing better, than that a man should rejoice in his own works: for that is his portion; for who shall bring him to see what shall be after him?

Solomon is still showing that every thing in this world, without piety and the fear of God, is vanity. Take away religion, and there is nothing valuable among men, nothing for the sake of which a wise man would think it worth while to live in this world. In these verses, he shows that power, than which there is nothing men are more ambitious of, and life itself, than which there is nothing men are more fond, more jealous of, are nothing without the fear of God.

I. Here is the vanity of man as mighty; man in his best estate, man upon the throne, where his authority is submitted to, man upon the judgment-seat, where his wisdom and justice are appealed to, and where, if he be governed by the laws of religion, he is God's vicegerent; nay, he is of those to whom it is said, Ye are gods; but without the fear of God it is vanity, for, set that aside, and—

1. The judge will not judge right, he will not use his authority, but will abuse it; instead of doing good with it, will do harm with it, and then it is not only vanity, but a lie, a cheat to himself, and to all about him, v. 16. Solomon perceived; by what he had read of former times, what he heard of other countries, and what he had seen in some corrupt judges, even in the land of Israel, notwithstanding all his care to prefer good men, that there was wickedness in the place of judgment. It is not so above the sun; far from it from God that he should do injustice or pervert justice; but under the sun it is often found that that which should be the refuge proves the prison of oppressed innocency. Man, being in honour, and not understanding what he ought to do, becomes like the beasts that perish, like the beasts of prey, even the most ravenous, Ps. xlix. 20. Not only from the persons that sat in judgment, but even in the places where judgment was, in pretence, administered, and righteousness was expected, there was iniquity; men met with the greatest wrongs in those courts to which they fled for right: this is vanity and vexation: for, (1.) It had been better for the people to have had no judges than to have had such. (2.) It had been better for the judges to have had no power than to have had it and used it to such ill purposes; and so they will say another day.

2. The judge will himself be judged for not judging right. When Solomon saw how judgment was perverted among men, he looked up to God, the Judge, and looked forward to the day of his judgment; (v. 17.) I said in my heart, that this unrighteous judgment is not so conclusive as both sides take it to be, for there will be a review of the judgment; God shall judge between the righteous and the wicked, shall judge for the righteous, and plead their cause, though now it is run down, and judge against the wicked, and reckon with them for all their unrighteous decrees, and the grievousness which they have perpetrated, Isa. x. 1. With an eye of faith we may see, not only the period, but the punishment, of the pride and cruelty of oppressors, (Ps. xcii. 7.) and it is an unspackable comfort to the oppressed, that their cause will be heard over again. Let them therefore wait with patience, for there is another Judge that standeth before the door. And though the day of affliction may last long, yet God is a great King, for the examination of every purpose and every work done under the sun. Men have their day now, but God's day is coming, Ps. xxxvii. 13. With God there is a time for the re-

II. Here is the vanity of man as mortal. He now comes to speak more generally concerning the estate of the sons of men in this world, their life being on earth, and shows that their reason, without religion and the fear of God, advanced them but little above the beasts. Now observe,

1. What he aims at in this account of man's estate.

(1.) That God may be honoured, may be justified, may be glorified; that they might clear God, so the margin reads it; that, if men have an uneasy life in this world, full of vanity and vexation, they may think themselves, and lay no blame of it; let them not blame God for it, and not say, that he made this world to be man's prison, and life to be his penance; no, God made man, in respect both of honour and comfort, little lower than the angels; if he be mean and miserable, it is his own fault. Or, that God, the word of God, might manifest them, and discover them to themselves, and so appear to be quick and powerful, and a Judge of men's characters; and we may be made sensible how open we are to God's knowledge and judgment.

(2.) That men may be humbled, may be vilified, may be mortified; that they might see that they themselves are beasts. It is much to convince proud men that they are but men, (Ps. ix. 20.) much more to convince men that they are beasts, that, being destitute of religion, they are as the beasts that perish, as the horse and the mule that have no understanding. Proud oppressors are as beasts, as roaring lions, and ranging bears. Nay, every man that thinks himself only, and not his soul, makes himself no better than a brute, and must wish, at least, to die like one.

2. The manner in which he verifies this account, which he undertakes to prove, is, that a worldly, carnal, earthly-minded, man, has no pre-eminence above the beast, for all that which he sets his heart upon, places his confidence, and expects a happiness, in, is vanity, v. 19. Some make this to be the language of an atheist, who justifies himself in his Iniquity, (v. 16.) and evades the argument taken from the judgment to come, (v. 17.) by pleading that there is not another life after this, but that when man dies, there is an end of him, and therefore, while he lives, he may live as he lists; but others rather think Solomon here speaks as he himself thinks, and that it is to be understood in the same sense with that of his father, (Ps. xlix. 14.) like sheep they are laid in the grave, and that he intends to show the vanity of this world's wealth and honours, "by the equal condition in more outward respects" (as Bishop Reynolds expounds it) "between men and beasts." t's the same air, and it is the general description of both that in their nostrils is the breath of life, (Gen. vii. 22.) and, therefore, as the one dies, so dies the other; in their expiring there is no visible difference, but death makes the same change with a beast that it does with a man.
[1.] As to their bodies, the change is altogether the same, excepting the different respects that are paid to them by the survivors. Let a man be buried with the burial of an ass, (Jer. xxii. 19.) and that pre-eminence then has he above a beast? The Touch of the dead body of a man, by the law of Moses, contrasted a greater ceremonial pollution than the touch of the carcase even of an unclean beast or fowl. And Solomon here observes, that all go unto one place, that dead bodies of men and beasts putrefy alike, and that in their corerre, or all turn to dust again, in their corruption. What little reason then have we to be proud of our bodies, or any bodily accomplishments, when they must not only be reduced to the earth very shortly, but must be so in common with the beasts, and we must mingle our dust with theirs!

[2.] As to their spirits, there is indeed a vast difference, but not a visible one, v. 21. It is certain that the spirit of the sons of men at death is ascending, and passing into the world of spirits, to be made to, to the world of spirits, to which it is allie; it dies not with the body, but is redeemed from the power of the grave, Ps. xlii. 15. It goes upward, to be judged, and determined to an unchangeable state. It is as certain that the spirit of the beast goes downward to the earth, it dies with the body, it perishes, and is gone at death. The soul of a beast is, at death, like a candle blown out, the candle that was blown out, the beast who was the soul of a man is then like a candle taken out of a dark lantern, which leaves the lantern useless indeed, but does itself shine brighter. This great difference there is between the spirits of men and beasts; and a good reason it is why men should set their affections on things above, and lift up their souls to those things, not suffering them, as if they were the souls of brutes, to cleave to this earth. But who knows this difference? We cannot see the ascent of the soul, and the descent of the other, with our bodily eyes; and therefore those that live by sense, as all carnal sensualists do, that walk in the sight of their eyes, and will not admit any other discoveries, by their own rule of judgment, have no pre-eminence above the beasts. Who knows? Who considers this? Isa. lili. 1. Very few; were it better considered, the world would be every way better; but most men live as if they were to be a cattle, or as if, when they die, there were an end of them;

and it is not strange that those live like beasts, who think they shall die like beasts; but on such the treble faculties of reason are perfectly lost and thrown away.

3. An inference drawn from it; (v. 22.) There is nothing better, as to this world, nothing better to be had out of our wealth and honour, than that a man should rejoice in his own works. (1.) Keep a good conscience, and never admit iniquity into the place of righteousness. Let every man prove his own work, and approve himself to God in it, so shall he have rejoicing in himself alone, Gal. vi. 4. Let him not get or keep any thing but what he can rejoice in.
See 2 Cor. i. 12. (2.) Live a cheerful life. If God have prospered the work of our hands unto us, let us rejoice in it, and take the comfort of it, and not make it a burden to ourselves, and leave others the joy of it; for this is not only against our souls, miserae are they that have their portion in this life, (Ps. xvii. 14.) and fools are they that choose it and take up with it, (Luke xii. 19.)
but it is the portion of the body, that only which we enjoy is ours out of this world; it is taking what is to be had, and making the best of it; and the rea son is, because none can give us a sight of what shall be after us; either who shall have our estates, or what use they will make ofthem. When we are gone, it is likely we shall not see what is after us; there is no correspondence that we know of between the other world and this, Job xiv. 21. They in the other world will have the inconvenience of that world, so that they will not care for seeing what is done in this; and while we are here, we cannot foresee what shall be after us, either as to our families or the public; it is not for us to know the times and seasons that shall be after us; which, as it should be a restraint to our cares about this world, so it should be a reason for our concern about another. Since death is a final farewell to this life, let us look before us to another life.

CHAP. IV.

Solomon, having shown the vanity of this world, in the temptation which those in power feel to oppress and trample upon their subjects, here further shows, I. The temptation which the oppressed feel to discontent and impatience, v. 1. 3. II. The temptation which those that love their ease feel to take their ease and neglect business, for fear of being envied, v. 4. 6. III. The folly of boasting of the abundance of worldly wealth, v. 7, 8. IV. A remedy against that folly, in being made sensible of the benefit of society and mutual assistance, v. 9. 12. V. The mutability even of royal dignity, not only among the living, but even of the mighty, (v. 14.)
but through the weakness of the people, let the prince be ever so discreet, v. 15. 16. It is not the prerogative even of kings themselves to be exempted from the vanity and vexation that attend these things; let none else then expect it.

1. S0 I returned, and considered all the oppressions that are done under the sun:
and, behold, the tears of such as were oppress-red, and they had no comforter; and on the side of their oppressors there was power, but they had no comforter. 2. Wherefore I praised the dead which are already dead, more than the living which are yet alive.
3. Yea, better is he than both they which hath not yet been, who hath not seen the evil work that is done under the sun.

Solomon had a large soul, (1 Kings iv. 29.) and it appeared by this, among other things, that he had a very tender concern for the miserable part of man, and in the cognizance of the afflictions of the afflicted. He had taken the oppressors to task, (ch.
iii. 16, 17.) and put them in mind of the judgment to come, to be a curb to their insolence; now here he observes the oppressed; this he did, no doubt, as a prince, to do them justice, and avenge them of their adversories, for he both feared God and regarded men; but here he does it as a preacher, and shows, The troubles of their condition; (v. 1.) of these he speaks very solemnly, and with compassion. It graved him,

(1.) To see might prevailing against right, to see so much oppression done under the sun; to see servants, and labourers, and poor workmen, oppressed by their masters, who take advantage of their necessity to impose what terms they please upon them:

debtors oppressed by cruel creditors, and creditors too by fraudulent debtors; tenants oppressed by hard landlords, and landlords oppressed by insolent peasants; and, worst of all, subjects oppressed by arbitrary princes and unjust judges. Such oppressions are done under the sun, above the sun righteousness reigns for ever. Wise men will consider these op-

Ecclesiastes, considered

The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament sheweth his handiwork.

To all for whom the tears of affliction were shed;

(2.) To see how those that were wronged laid to heart the wrongs that were done them. He beheld the tears of such as were oppressed, and perhaps could not forbear weeping with them. The world is full of oppressors; look what way we will, we have a melancholy scene presented to us, the tears of those that are oppressed with one trouble or other. They find it is to no purpose to complain, and therefore mourn in secret, (as Job ch. xvi. 20, 21.) but Blessed are they that mourn.

(3.) To see how unable they were to help themselves; On the side of their oppressors there was froward, when they had done wrong, to stand to it, and make good what they had done, so that the poor were borne down with a strong hand, and had no way to do themselves right. It is sad to see power misplaced, and that which was given men to enable them to do good, perverted to support them in doing wrong.

(4.) To see how they and their calamities were slighted by all about them. They wept, and needed comfort, but there was none to do that friendly office, they had no comforter, their oppressors were powerful and threatening, and therefore they had no comfort; nor could comfort them themselves, not, for fear of displeasing the oppressors, and being made their companions for offering to be their comforters. It is sad to see so little humanity among men.

2. The temptations of their condition. Being thus hardly used, they are tempted to hate and despise life, and to envy those that are dead and in their graves, and to wish they had never been born; (v. 2, 3.) and Solomon is ready to agree with them, for as life is vanity and vexation of spirit, since life itself is often so; and if we disregard it, in comparison with the favour and fruition of God, (as St. Paul, Acts xx. 24. Phil. i. 23.) it is our praise; but if (as here) only for the sake of the miseries that attend it, that is our infirmity, and we judge therein after the flesh, as Job and Eliah did.

(1.) He here thinks them happy who have ended this miserable life, have done their part, and quitted the stage; I thus far pleased the executors of my just debts, or that had a speedy passage through the world, made a short cut over the ocean of life, dead already, before they had well begun to live; I was pleased with their lot, and had it been in their own choice, should have praised their wisdom, for but looking into the world, and then retiring, as not liking it. I concluded that it is better with them than with the living that are yet alive, and that is all, dragging the long and heavy chain of life, and wearing out its tedious minutes. This may be compared, not with Job iii. 20, 21, but with Rev. xiv. 13, where, in times of persecution, (and such Solomon is here describing,) it is not the passion of man, but the Spirit of God, that says, Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth.

Note, The condition of the saints that are dead, and gone to rest with God, is, upon many accounts, better and more desirable than the condition of living saints that are yet continued in their work and present danger.

(2.) He thinks them happy, who never began this miserable life; nay, they are happiest of all; He that has not been is happier than both they. Better never to have been born than to be born to see the evil work that is done under the sun; to see so much wickedness committed, so much wrong done, and not only to be in no capacity to mend the matter, but to suffer ill for doing well. 'A good man, how calamitous a condition soever he is in, in this world, cannot have cause to wish he had never been born, since he is glorifying the Lord even in the fires, and will be happy at last, for ever happy; nor ought any to wish so while they are alive, for while there is life, there is hope; a man is never undone till he is in hell.

4. Again, I considered all travail, and every right work, that for this a man is envied of his neighbour. This is also vanity and vexation of spirit.

5. The fool foldeth his hands together, and eateth his own flesh. Better is a handful with quietness, than both the hands full with travail and vexation of spirit.

Here Solomon returns to the observation and consideration of the vanity and vexation of spirit that attend the business of this world, which he had spoken of before, ch. ii. 11.

1. If a man be acute, and dexterous, and successful in his business, he gets the ill-will of his neighbours, v. 4. Though he takes a great deal of pains, and goes through all travail, does not get his estate easily, but it costs him a great deal of hard labour, nor does he get it dishonestly, he wrongs no man, defrauds no man, but by every right work, by applying himself to the business of it, as in its every part, bringing it by all the rules of equity and fair-dealing, yet for this he is envied of his neighbour, and the more for the reputation he has got by his honesty. This shows, (1.) What little conscience most men have, that they will bear a grudge to a neighbour, give him an ill word, and do him an ill turn, only because he is more ingenious and industrious than themselves, and has more of the blessing of heaven. Cain envied Abel, Esau Jacob, and Saul David, and all for their right works. This is downward, but nationalism. (2.) What little comfort wise and useful men must expect to have in this world. Let them be, let them have themselves ever so cautiously, they cannot escape being envied; and who can stand before envy? Prov. xxvii. 4. They that excel in virtue will always be an eye-sore to those that exceed in vice; which should not discourage us from any right work, but drive us to expect the praise of it, not from men, but from God, and not to count upon satisfaction in life. Happiness is the crown of right works; to prove vanity and vexation of spirit, no works under the sun can prove otherwise. But for every right work a man shall be accepted of his God, and then he needs not mind though he be envied of his neighbour, only it may make him love the world the less.

2. If a man be stupid and dull, and blundering in his business, he decoys ill for himself; (v. 5.) The fool that goes about his work as if his hands were muffled and folded together, that does everything awkwardly; the sluggard, (for he is a fool,) that loves his ease, and folds his hands together to keep them warm, because they refuse to labour, he eats his own flesh, is a cannibal to himself, brings himself into such a poor condition that he has nothing to eat but his own flesh, into such a desperate condition, that he is ready to eat his own flesh for vexation; he has a dog’s life, hunger and ease. Because God gives active men, that though in the world, envied he runs into the other extreme; and lest he should be envied for his right works, he does everything wrong, and does not deserve to be pitied. Note, Idleness is a sin that is its own punishment.

The following words, (v. 6.) Better is a handful with quietness, than both the hands full with travail and vexation of spirit, may be taken either; (1.) As the sluggard’s argument for the excuse of himself in his idleness; he folds his hands together, and abuses and misapplies a good truth for his pus tification; as it, because a little with quietness is bet-threatens: of necessary, a little with idleness is better than abundance with strife, therefore a little with idleness is better than abundance with honest labour: thus wise in own counsel is he, Prov. xxvi. 16. But, (2 ) I rather take it as Solomon's advice to keep the mean between that travail which will make a man envied, and that slothfulness which will make a man eat his own flesh. Let us by honest industry lay hold on the handfull, that we may have many necessaries, but not grasp at both the hands full, which will but create us vexation of spirit. Moderate pains and moderate gains will do best. A man may have but a handfull of the world, and yet may enjoy it and himself with a great deal of quietness, with content of mind, peace of conscience, and the love and good will of his neighbour, much that have both their hands full, have more than heart could wish, have a great deal of travail and vexation with it. Those that cannot live on a little, it is to be feared, would not live as they should, if they had ever so much.

 7. Then I returned, and I saw vanity under the sun. 8. There is one alone and there is not a second; yea, he hath neither child nor brother: yet is there no end of all his labour; neither is his eye satisfied with riches; neither saith he, For whom do I labour, and bereave my soul of good? This is also vanity, yea, it is a sore travail. 9. Two are better than one; because they have a good reward for their labour. 10. For if they fall, the one will lift up his fellow: but wo to him that is alone when he falleth; for he hath not another to help him up. 11.

 Again, if two lie together, then they have heat: but how can one be warm alone? 12.

 And if one prevail against him, two shall withstand him; and a threefold cord is not quickly broken.

 Here Solomon fastens upon another instance of the vanity of this world, that frequently the more men have of it, the more they would have; and on this they are so intent, that they have no enjoyment of what they have. Now Solomon here shows,

 1. That selfishness is the cause of this evil; (v. 7, 8.) There is one alone that minds none but himself, cares for nobody, but would, if he could, be placed alone in the midst of the earth; there is not a second, nor does he desire there should be, one mouth he thinks enough in a house, and grudges

 every thing that goes beside him. See how this covetous muckworm is here described.

 (1.) He makes himself a mere slave to his business. Though he has no charge, neither child nor brother, none to take care of but himself, none to hang upon him, or draw from him, no poor relations, nor dures he marry, for fear of the expense of a family, yet is there no end of his labour, he is at it night and day, early and late, and will scarcely allow necessary rest to himself and those he employs. He does not confine himself within the bounds of his own calling, but is for having a hand in any thing that he can get by. See

 Ps. cxlvii. 2.

 (2.) He never thinks he has enough; His eye is not satisfied with riches. Covetousness is called the lust of the eye, (1 John ii. 16.) because the behalding of it with his eyes is all that the worldling seems to covet, Eccl. v. 11. He has enough for his back,

 (as Bishop Reynolds observes,) for his belly, for his calling, for his family, for his living decently in the world, but he has not enough for his eyes; though he can but see it, can but count his money, and not find in his heart to use it, yet he is not easy because he has not more to regale his eyes with.

 (3.) He denies himself the comfort of what he has. He bereaves his soul of good. If our souls be bereaved of good, it is we ourselves that do bereave them; others may bereave us of outward good, but cannot rob us of our graces and comforts, our spri-tual good things; it is our own fault if we do not enjoy ourselves; yet many are so set upon the world that, in pursuit of it, they bereave their souls of good here and for ever, make shipwreck of faith and of a good conscience, bereave themselves not only of the favour of God and eternal life, but of the pleasures of this world too, and this present life.

 Worldly people, pretending to be wise for themselves, are really enemies to themselves.

 (4.) He has no excuse for doing this; He has neither child nor brother; none that is bound to, on whom he may lay out what he has to his satisfaction while he lives; none that he has a kindness for, for whom he may lay it up to his satisfaction, and to whom he may leave it when he dies; none that are poor or dear to him.

 (5.) He has no consideration enough to show himself that this is; he never puts this question to himself, "For whom do I labour thus? Do I labour, as I should, for the glory of God, and that I may have to give to those that need? Do I consider that it is but for the body that I am labouring, a dying body; it is for others, and I know not for whom; perhaps for a fool that will scatter it as fast as I have gathered it; perhaps for a foe, that will be ungrateful to my memory?" Note, It is wisdom for those that take pains, about what they have done this pains for; and whether it be really worth while to bereave themselves of good, that they may bestow it on a stranger. If men do not consider this, it is vanity, and a sore travail; they shame and vex themselves to no purpose.

 2. That sociableness is the cure of this evil. Men are thus solitud, because they are all for themselves.

 Now Solomon shows here, by this instance, that it is not good for man to be alone; (Gen. ii. 18.) he designs hereby to recommend to us both marriage and friendship, two things which covetous misers decline, because of the charge of them; but such are the comfort and advantage of them both, if prudently contracted, that they will very well quit cost. Man, in paradise itself, could not be happy without a mate, and therefore is no sooner made than matched.

 (1.) Solomon lays this down for a truth. That two are better than one, and more happy jointly, than either of them could be separately; more pleased in one another than they could be in themselves only; mutually serviceable to each other's welfare, and by a united strength more likely to do good to others; They have a good reward of their labour; whatever service they do, it is returned to them another way. He that serves himself only, has himself only for his paymaster, and commonly deserves more than is paid him, and is ungrateful to himself, if he should serve him, would be to him;

 witness him that labouro everlasting, and yest bereaves his soul of good; he has no reward of his labour;

 but he that is kind to another has a good reward;

 the pleasure and advantage of holy love will be an abundant recompense for all the work and labour of love.

 (2.) Hence he infers the mischief of solitude;

 He to him that is alone; he lies exposed to many temptations which good company and friendship would prevent and help him to guard against; he wants that advantage which a man has by the com- 1. A king is not happy, unless he have wisdom, v. 13, tenance of his friend, as iron has of being sharpen- 14. He that is truly wise, prudent, and pious, though ened by iron. A monastic life then was surely ne- he be poor in the world, and very young, and, upon ver intended for a state of perfection, nor should both accounts, despaired and little notice taken of, is those be reckoned the greatest lovers of God who better, more truly valuable and worthy of respect, cannot find in their hearts to love any one else.

is likely to do better for himself, and to be a greater blest to his fellow-men, than is he who, being a king, a man therefore venerable, but beset with vanity and for his dignity, if he be foolish, and knows not for gravity, and and how to manage public affairs himself, nor will be admonished and advised by others; who knows not to be admonished, will not suffer any counsel or ad- monition to be given him; no one about him dares contradict him; he will not hearken to the counsel and admonition that are given him. It is so far from being any part of the honour of kings, that it is the greatest dishonour to receive them.

(1.) Occasional succour in an exigence. It is good for two to travel together, for if one happen to fall, and perhaps so as not to be able to get up himself, the other will be ready to help him up; a friend in need is a friend indeed; whereas if one travel alone, and get a fall, he may be lost for want of a little help. If a man fall into sin, his friend will help to restore him with the spirit of meekness; if he fall into trouble, his friend will help to comfort him and assuage his grief.

(2.) Mutual warmth. As a fellow-traveller is of use, (amicus pro vehiculo—a friend is a good sub- stitute for a carriage,) so is a bed-fellow; If two lie together, they have heat. So virtuous and gracious affections are excited by good society, and Christians warm one another by provoking one another to love and to good works.

(3.) United strength. If an enemy find a man alone, he is liable to prevail against him; with his own single strength he cannot make his part good, but, if he have a second, he may do well enough, two shall withstand him; “You shall help me against mine enemy, and I will help you against your’s;” according to the agreement between Joab and Abishai, (2 Sam. x. 11.) and so both are conquerrors, whereas, acting separately, both had been conquered; as was said of the ancient Britons, when the Romans invaded them, Dum singuli posununt, universi vincuntur—While they fight in detached parties, they sacrifice the general cause. In our spiritual warfare we may be helpful to one another as well as in our spiritual work; next to the com-fornation of communion with God, is that of the communion of saints. He concludes with this proverb,

A threefold cord is not easily broken, any more than a bundle of arrows, though each single thread and each single arrow is. Two together he compares to a bundle of arrows where two are closely joined in truly love and fellowship, Christ will by his Spirit come to them, and make the third, as he joined himself to the two disciples going to Emmaus, and then there is a threefold cord that can never be broken. They that dwell in love dwell in God, and God in them.

13. Better is a poor and a wise child than an old and foolish king, who will no more be admonished. 14. For out of prison he cometh to reign; whereas also he that is born in his kingdom becometh poor. 15. I considered all the living which walk under the sun, with the second child that shall stand up in his stead. 16. There is no end of all the people, even of all that have been before them: they also that come after shall not rejoice in him. Surely this also is vanity and vexation of spirit.

Solomon was himself a king, and therefore may be allowed to speak more freely than another, concerning the vanity of kingly state and dignity, which he shall have been an uncertain thing; he had said so, Prov. xxvii. 24. The crown doth not endure to every generation; and his sun is: and it so. Nothing is more slippery than the highest post of honour, without wisdom and the people’s love.
CHAPTER V.

Solomon, in this chapter, discourses, I. Concerning the worship of God, prescribing that as a remedy against all those vanities which tend to weary us, he recom- mendeth the going to the house of God, and keeping communion with him; but withal, he gives a necessary caution against the vanities which are too often found in religious exercises, which deprive them of their excellency, and render them unable to help against other vanities. If our religion be a vain religion, how great is that vanity! Let us therefore take heed of vanity, 1. In hearing the word, and offering sacrifice, v. 1. 2. In prayer, v. 2, 3. 3. In making vows, v. 4, 5. 4. In pretending to divine dreams, v. 7. Now, (1.) For a remedy against those vanities, he prescribes the fear of God, v. 7. (2.) To prevent the offence that might arise from the present sufferings of good people, he directs us to look up to God, v. 8. II. Concerning the wealth of this world, and the vanity and vexation that attend it. The fruits of the earth indeed are necessary to the support of life, (v. 9.) but as for silver, and gold, and riches, 1. They are unsatisfying, v. 10. 2. They are unprofitable, v. 11. They are disquieting, v. 12. 3. They often prove hurtful and destroying, v. 13. 5. They are perishing, v. 14. 6. They must be left behind when we die, v. 15, 16. 7. If we have not a heart to make use of them, they are a great deal of uneasiness, v. 17. And therefore he recommends to us the comfortable use of that which God has given us, with an eye to him that is Giver, as the best way both to answer the end of our having it, and to obviate the misuse of it that commonly attend great estates, v. 18–20. So that if we can but learn out of this chapter how to manage the business of religion, and the business of this world, (which two take up most of our time,) so that both may turn to a good account, and neither our sabbath-days nor our week-days may be lost, we shall have reason to say, We have learned two good lessons.

K EEP thy foot when thou goest to the house of God, and be more ready to hear than to give the sacrifice of fools: for they consider not that they do evil. 2. Be not rash with thy mouth, and let not thy heart be hasty to utter any thing before God; for God is in heaven, and thou upon earth therefore let thy words be few. 3. For a dream cometh through the multitude of business; and a fool's voice is known by multitude of words.

Solomon's design in driving us off from the world, by showing us its vanity, is to drive us to God and to our duty; that we may not walk in the way of the world, but by religious rules, nor depend upon the wealth of the world, but on religious advantages; and therefore,

I. He here sends us to the house of God, to the place of public worship, to the temple, which he himself had built at a great and costly expense; and he frequently refers us to it, that we should know more of the vanity of the world, and would find that happiness which is in vain sought for in the creature. David, when he was perplexed, went into the sanctuary of God, Ps. lxix. 17. Let our disappointments in the creature turn our eyes to the creature of God, and have recourse not to the word of God's grace, and consult that, to the throne of his grace, and solicit that. In the word and prayer there is a balm for every wound. II. He charges us to behave ourselves well there, that we may not miss of our end in coming thither. Religious exercises are not vain things, but, if we mismane them, they become vain to us. And therefore,

1. We must address ourselves to them with all possible seriousness and care; "Keep thy feet, not to keep them back from the house of God, (as Prov. xxv. 17.) nor go slowly thither, as one unwilling to draw nigh to God, but look well to thy going, ponder the path of thy feet, lest thou take a false step. Address thyself to the worship of God with a solemn pause, and take time to compose thyself for it, not going about it with precipitation, which is called hastening with the feet, Prov. xix. 2. Keep thy thoughts from reviving and wandering from it; keep them fixed and united toward wrong objects, for in the business of God's house there is work enough for the whole man, and all too little to be employed." Some think it alludes to the charge given to Moses and Joshua, to cut off their shoes, (Exod. iii. 5. Josh. v. 15.) in token of subjection and reverence, Keep thy feet clean, Exod. xxx. 19. 2. We must take heed that the sacrifice we bring be not the sacrifice of fools, of which we see they are fools, and their sacrifice an abomination to the Lord, (Prov. xxv. 8,) that we bring not the torn, and the lame, and the sick, for sacrifice; for we are plainly told that it will not be accepted, and therefore it is folly to bring it; that we rest not in the sign and ceremony, and the outside of the performance, without regarding the sense and meaning of it, for that is the sacrifice of fools; bodily exercise, if that be all, is a jest; none but fools will think thus to please him who is a Spirit, and requires the heart; and we shall see their folly when they find what a great deal of pains they have taken to no purpose for want of sincerity. They are fools, for they consider not that they do evil; they think they are doing God and themselves good service, when really they are putting a great affront upon God, and a great cheat upon their own souls, by their hypocritical devotions. Men may be doing evil, even then when they profess to be doing good, and even then when they do not know it, when they do not consider.

They know not but to do evil, so some read it. Wicked minds cannot choose but sin, even in the acts of devotion. Or, They consider not that they do evil; they act at a venture, right or wrong, pleasing to God or not, it is all one to them. 3. That we may not bring the sacrifice of fools, we must come to God's house with hearts disposed to know and do our duty. We must be ready to hear. (1.) We must diligently attend to the word of God, and preached; "Be swift to hear the exposition which the priests give of the sacrifices, declaring the intent and meaning of them, and do not think it enough to gaze upon what they do, for it must be a reasonable service, otherwise it is the sacrifice of fools." (2.) We must resolve to comply with the will of God as it is made known to us; hearing is often put for obeying, and that is it that is better than sacrifice, 1 Sam. xv. 22. Isa. i. 16. Ke the word, and when they have finished their holy duties, we come with this upon our heart, Speak, Lord, for thy servant hears. Let the word of the Lord come, (said a good man,) and if I had 600 necks I would bow them all to the authority of it.

4. We must be very cautious and considerate in all our approaches and addresses to God; (v. 2.) Be not rash with thy mouth, in making either prayers, or protestations, or promises; let not thy heart be hasty to utter before God. (1.) When we are in the house of God, in solemn assemblies for religious worship, we are in a special manner before God, and in his presence; there where he has promised to meet his people, where his eye is upon us, and ours ought to be unto him. (2.) We have something to say, something to utter before God, when we draw nigh to him in holy duties; he is one with whom we have to do, with whom we have business of vast importance. If we come without an errand, we shall go away without any advantage. (3.) What we utter before God must come from the soul, and therefore we must not be rash with our mouth, never let our tongue outrun our thoughts in our devotions; the words of our mouth must always be the product of the meditations of our hearts. Thoughts are words to God, and words are but wind, if they be not copied from the thoughts. Lip-labour, though ever so well laboured, if that be all, is but lost labour in religion, Matth. xv. 8, 9. (4.) It is not enough that what we say comes from the heart, but it must come from a composed heart, and not from a sudden heat or passion. As the mouth must not be rash, so the heart must not be hasty; we must not only think, but think twice, before we speak, when we are to speak either from God in preaching, or to God in prayer, and not utter any thing indecent and undigested, I Cor. xiv. 15.

5. We must be sparing of our words in the presence of God, we must be reverent and deliberate; not talk to God as boldly and carelessly as we do to our fellows; what comes uppermost, not repeat things over and over, as we do to one another, that what we say may be understood and remembered, and may make impression; no, when we speak to God, we must consider, (1.) That between him and us there is an infinite distance; God is in heaven, where he reigns in glory over us and all the children of men, where he is attended with an innumerable company of holy angels, and is far excelled above all our blessing and praise. He is the Lord of his people's mean and vile, unlike God, and utterly unworthy to receive any favour from him, or to have any communion with him; therefore we must be very grave, humble, and serious, and be reverent in speaking to him, as we are when we speak to a great man that is much our superior; and, in token of this, let our words be few, that they may be well chosen, Job ix. 14. This does not condemn all long prayers; were they not good, the Pharisees had not used them for a resource; Christ prayed all night; and we are bid to continue in prayer; but it condemns careless, heartless praying, vain repetitions, (Matth. vi. 7.) repeating Pater-noster by tale. Let us speak to God, and of him, in his own words, words which the scripture teaches; and let our words, words of our own invention, be few, lest, not speaking by rule, we speak amiss.

(2.) That the multiplying of words in our devotions will make them the sacrifices of fools, v. 5. As confused dreams, frightful and perplexed, and such as disturb the sleep, are an evidence of a hurry of business which fills our head; so, many words, and hasty ones, used in prayer, are an evidence of folly reigning in the heart, ignorance of, and unacquaintedness with, both God and ourselves, low thoughts of God, and careless thoughts of our own souls. Even in common conversation, a fool is known by the multitude of words; they that know best are often the least talkative; and, consequently, there, no doubt, a praying fool shall fall, (Prov. x. 8, 10.) shall fall short of acceptance. Those are fools indeed who think they shall be heard, in prayer, for their much speaking.

4. When thou vowest a vow unto God, defer not to pay it; for he hath no pleasure in fools: pay that which thou hast vowed. 5. Better is it that thou shouldst vow, than that thou shouldest vow and not pay.

6. Suffer not thy mouth to cause thy flesh to sin; neither say thou before the angel, that it was an error: wherefore should God be angry at thy voice, and destroy the work of thy hands? 7. For in the multitude of dreams and many words there are also divers vanities; but fear thou God. 3. If thou seest the oppression of the poor, and violent perverting of judgment and justice in a province, marvel not at the matter: for he that is higher than the highest regardeth, and there be higher than they.

Four things we are exhorted to in these verses.

1. To be conscientious in paying our vows. A vow is a bond upon the soul, (Numah. xxx. 2.) by which we solemnly oblige ourselves, not only, in general, to do that which we are already bound to do, but, in some particular instances, to do that which we were not under any antecedent obligation to do, whether it respects honouring God, or serving the interests of his kingdom among men. When, under the sense of some affliction, (Ps. lxvi. 14,) or in the pursuit of some mercy, (1 Sam. i. 11.) thou the word, and thy vow is not before the Lord, God, know that thou hast opened thy mouth unto the Lord, and thou cannot go back; therefore,

1. Pay it; perform what thou hast promised, bring to God what thou hast dedicated and devoted to him, pay that which thou hast vowed, pay it in full, and keep not back any part of the price, pay it in kind, do not alter it, or change it, so the law was, Lev. xxvii. 10. Have we vowed to give our own selves unto the Lord? let us, then, be as good as our word, act in his service to his glory, and not sacrilegiously alienate ourselves.

2. Defer not to pay it; if it be in the power of thine hands to pay it to-day, leave it not till to-morrow; do not beg a day, nor put it off to a more convenient season. By delay the sense of the obligation slackens and cools, and is in danger of wearing off; we thereby discover a loathness and backwardness to perform our vow; and Qui non est hostis, cras minus aequus erit.—He who is not inclined to-day, will he be inclined to-morrow? or, as it is, Hos. 11. 8, 9, the more difficult it will be to bring ourselves to its performance, death may not only prevent the payment, but fetch thee to judgment, under the guilt of a broken vow.

Two reasons are here given why we should speedily and cheerfully pay our vows. (1.) Because otherwise we affront God; we play the fool with him, as if we designed to put a trick upon him; and God has no pleasure in fools; (more is implied than is expressed;) the meaning is, He greatly abhors such fools, and such foolish dealings. Has he need of fools? No; Be not deceived, God is not mocked, but will surely and severely reckon with those that thus play fast and loose with him. (2.) Because otherwise we wrong ourselves, we lose the benefit of the making of the vow, nay, we incur the penalty for the breach of it; so that it had been better a great deal not to have vowed, more safe, and more to our advantage, than to vow and not pay. Not to have vowed had been but an emission, but this vow, and not paying, injures the guilt of treachery and perjury; it is lying to God, Acts v. 4.

II. To be cautious in making our vows; this is necessary in order to our being conscientious in performing them, v. 6. 1. We must take heed that we never vow any thing that is sinful, or may be an occasion of sin, for such a vow is ill-made, and must be broken. Suffer not thy mouth, by such a vow, to cause thy flesh to sin, as Herod's rash promise caused him to cut off the head of John the Baptist.
2. We must not vow that which, through the frailty of the flesh, we have reason to fear we shall not be able to perform; as those that vow a single life, and yet know not how to keep their vow. Hereby, (1.) They shame themselves; for they are forced to say before the angel, It was an error; that either they did not mean, or did not consider, what they said; and, take it which way you will, it is an admission of a vow, do not seek to evade it, nor find out excuses to get clear of the obligation of it; say not before the priest, who is called the angel, or messenger, of the Lord of hosts, that, upon second thoughts, thou hast changed thy mind, and desirest to be absolved from the obligations of thy vow; but stick to it, and do not seek a hole to creep out at. Some by the angel understand the guardian angel, which they suppose to attend every man, and to inspect what he does. Others understand it of Christ, the Angel of the covenant, who is present with his people in their assemblies, who searches the heart, and cannot be imposed upon; provoke him not, for God's name is in him, and he is represented as strict and jealous, Exod. xxi. 20. 21. (2.) They expose themselves to the wrath of God, for he is angry at the voice of those that thus lie unto him with their mouth, and flatter him with their tongue, and is displeased at their declamations, and desire their overthrow, because they blast their enterprises, and defeats those purposes which, when they made these vows, they were seeking to God for the success of. If we treacherously cancel the words of our mouths, and revoke our vows, God will justly overthrow our projects, and walk contrary, and at all adventures, with those that thus walk contrary, and at all adventures, with him. It is a snare to a man, after vows, to make inquiry. II. To God's people. Many, old, pretended to have known the mind of God by dreams, and were so full of them, that they almost made God's people forget his name by their dreams; (Jer. xxiii. 25, 26.) and many, now, perplex themselves with their frightful or odd dreams, or with other people's dreams, as if they foreboded this or the other disaster; those that heed dreams shall have a multitude of them to fill their heads with; but in them all there are divers vanities, as there are in all their other labours. They are but the idle impertinent chat of children and fools, and therefore never heed them, forget them, instead of repeating them, lay no stress upon them, draw no disquieting conclusions from them, but fear thou God, have an eye to his sovereign dominion, set him before thee, keep thyself in his love, and be afraid of offending him, and then thou wilt not disturb thyself with foolish dreams. "They are but like the idle importunate chat of children and fools, and therefore never heed them, forget them, instead of repeating them, lay no stress upon them, draw no disquieting conclusions from them, but fear thou God, have an eye to his sovereign dominion, set him before thee, keep thyself in his love, and be afraid of offending him, and then thou wilt not disturb thyself with foolish dreams." The way not to be dismayed at the signs of heaven, nor afraid of the idols of the heathen, is, to fear God as King of nations, Jer. x. 2, 5, 7. IV. With that to keep down the fear of man, 2. 3. Set God before thee, and then, if thou seest the oppression of the poor, thou wilt not marvel at the matter, nor find fault with Divine Providence, nor think the worse of the institution of magistracy, when thou seest the ends of it thus perverted, nor of religion, when thou seest it will not secure men from evil. Observe, 1. A melancholy sight on earth, and such as cannot but trouble very good man that has a sense of justice and a concern for mankind, to see the oppression of the poor, because they are poor, and cannot right themselves, and the violent perverting of judgment and justice in a province, oppression under colour of law, and backed with power. The kingdom in general may have a good government, and yet it may so happen that a particular kingdom may be committed to a bad man, by whose mal-administration justice may be perverted; so hard is the for the wisest of kings, in giving preferments, to be sure of their men; they can but redress the grievance when it appears. 2. A comfortable sight in heaven. When things look thus dismal, we may satisfy ourselves with this, (1.) That, though oppressors be high, God is above them, and in that very thing wherein they deal proudly, Exod. xviii. 11. God is higher than the highest of creatures, than the highest of princes, than the king that is higher than Agag, (Numb. xxvii. 7.) than the highest angels, the thrones and dominions of the upper world; God is the Most High over all the earth, and his glory is above the heavens; before him, princes are worms, the brightest but glow-worms. (2.) That, though oppressors be secure, God has his eye upon them, takes notice of, and will reckon for, all their violent perverting of judgment; he regards, not only sees it, but observes it, and keeps it on record, to be called over again; his eyes are upon their ways. See Job xxiv. 23. (3.) That there is a world of angels, for there are higher than they, who are employed by the divine justice for protecting the injured, and punishing the injurious. Sennacherib bore himself high upon his paws of office, but one noble angel overset him and all his forces. Some, by those that are higher than they, understand the great council of the nation, the presidents to whom the princes of the provinces are accountable, (Dan. vi. 2.) the senate that receives complaints against the proconsuls, the courts above, to which appeals are made from the inferior courts, which are necessary to the good government of a kingdom. Let it be a check to oppressors, that perhaps their superiors on earth may call them to an account; however, God, the Supreme in heaven, will. 9. Moreover, the profit of the earth is for all: the king himself is served by the field. 10. He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver; nor he that loveth abundance with increase. This is also vanity. 11. When goods increase, they are increased that eat them: and what is good is there to the owners thereof, saving the beholding of them with their eyes? 12. The sleep of a labouring man is sweet, whether he eat little or much: but the abundance of the rich will not suffer him to sleep. 13. There is a sore evil which I have seen under the sun, namely, riches kept for the owners thereof to their hurt. 14. But those riches perish by evil travail; and he begetteth a son, and there is nothing in his hand. 15. As he came forth of his mother's womb, naked shall he return to go as he came, and shall take nothing of his labour, with which he may carry away in his hand. 16. And this also is a sore evil, that in all points as he came so shall he go: and what profit hath he that hath laboured for the wind? 17. All his days also he eateth in darkness, and he hath much sorrow and wrath with his sickness. Solomon had showed the vanity of pleasure, gaiety, and fine works, of honour, power, and royal dignity; and there is many a covetous worldling that will agree with him, and speak as slightly as he does of these things; but money, he thinks, is a substantial thing, and, if he can but have enough of that, he is happy; that is the mistake which Solomon attacks, and attempts to rectify, in these verses; he shows that there is as much vanity in great riches, and the loss of the eye about them, as there is in the lusts of the flesh, and the pride of life; and a man can make himself no more happy by hoarding an estate than by spending it.

1. He grants that the products of the earth, for the support and comfort of human life, are valuable things; (v. 9.) The profit of the earth is for all; man's body, being made of the earth, thence has its maintenance; (Job xxviii. 5.) and that it has so, and that a barren land is not made his dwelling, (as he has deserved for being rebellious, Ps. lxviii. 6.) is not in vain. The earth gives them fruit. The earth is profit to be gotten out of the earth; and it is for all, it needs it, it is appointed for all, there is enough for all; it is not only for all men, but for all the inferior creatures; the same ground brings grass for the cattle that brings herbs for the service of men. Israel had bread from heaven, angels' food, but (which is a humbling consideration) the earth is our storehouse, and the beasts fellow-commoners with us. The king himself is served by the field, and would not be without a share of the fruit of it, and take out its products. This puts a great honour upon the husbandman's calling, that it is the most necessary of all other to the support of man's life; the many have the benefit of it, the mighty cannot live without it; it is for all, it is for the king himself. Those that have an abundance of the fruits of the earth, must remember they are for all, and therefore must look upon themselves as stewards of their abundance, out of which they must give to those that need; they must be not only masters and soft clothing are only for some, but the fruit of the earth is for all. And even those that suck the abundance of the seas, (Deut. xxxiii. 19.) cannot be without the fruit of the earth, while those that have a competency of the fruit of the earth may despise the abundance of the sea.

11. He maintains that the riches that are more than these, that are for hoarding; not for use, are vain things, and will not make a man easy or happy. This which is said of the earth, xii. 11. that a man's life consists not in the abundance of the things which he possesses, is what Solomon here undertakes to prove by divers arguments.

1. The more men have, the more they would have, v. 10. A man may have but a little silver, and be satisfied with it, may know when he has enough, and covet no more. Godliness, with contentment, is great gain. I have enough, says Jacob; I have all, and abound, says St. Paul; but (1.) He that loves silver, and sets his heart upon it, will never think he has enough, but enlarges his desire as hell, (Hab. ii. 5.) lays house to house and field to field, (Isa. v. 8.) and, like the daughters of the horse-leech, still cries, Give, give. Natural desires are at rest when that which is desired is obtained, but corrupt desires are insatiable; nature is content with little, grace with less, but lust with nothing. (2.) He that has silver in abundance, and has it increased even fast upon him, yet does not find that it yields any solid satisfaction to his soul; there are bodily desires which silver itself will not satisfy; if a man be hungry, ingots of silver will do no more to satisfy his hunger than clods of clay; much less will worldly abundance satisfy spiritual desires; he that has ever so much silver, covets more, not only of that, but of something else, something of another nature. They that make themselves drudges to the world are spending their labour for that which satisfies not, (Isa. Iv. 2.) which fills the belly, but will never fill the soul, Ezek. vii. 19.

2. The more men have, the more occasion they have for, and the more they have to do with it, so that it is as broad as long; when goods increase, they are increased that eat them, v. 11. The more meat, the more mouths. Does the estate thrive? And does not the family, at the same time, grow more numerous, and the children grow up to need more? The more men have, the better house they must build, iii. 12. The more guests they must entertain, the more they must give to the poor, and the more they will have hanging on them, for where the careasse is, the eagles will be. What we have, more than food and raiment, we have for others; and then what good is there to the owners themselves, but the pleasure of beholding them with their eyes?

And a poor pleasure it is: an empty speculation is all the difference between the owners and the sharers; the owner sees that as his own which he gives away; he has as much of the real benefit of as he; only he has the satisfaction of doing good to others, which indeed is a satisfaction to one who believes what Christ said, that it is more blessed to give than to receive; but to a covetous man, who thinks all lost that goes beside himself, it is a constant vexation to see others eat of his increase.

3. The more men have, the more can they have about it, which perplexes them, and disturbs their repose; (v. 12.) refreshing, but not long, to the support and comfort of this life as food is. Now, (1.) Those commonly sleep best that work hard, and have but what they work for; The sleep of the labouring man is sweet, not only because he has tired himself with his labour, which makes his sleep the more welcome to him, and makes him sleep soundly, but because he has little to fill his head with care about, and so break his sleep. His sleep is sweet, though he has been but little asleep himself, or his weariness rocks him asleep; and, though he eat much, yet he can sleep well, for his labour gets him a good digestion. The sleep of the diligent Christian, and his long sleep, is sweet, for, having spent himself and his time in the service of God, he can cheerfully return to God, and repose in him as his Rest. (2.) Those that have every thing else often fail to secure a good night's sleep; either their eyes are held open by care, or their sleep are unquiet, and do not refresh them; and this is because of their abundance, that breaks their sleep, and disturbs it; both the abundance of their care, (as that rich man's, who, when his ground brought forth plentifully, thought within himself, What shall I do? Luke xii. 17.) and the abundance of what they eat and drink, which overcharges the heart, makes them sick, and so hinders their repose. Ahasuerus, after a banquet of wine, could not sleep; and perhaps consciousness of guilt, both in getting and using what they have, breaks their sleep as much as any thing; but God gives his beloved sleep.

4. The more men have, the more danger they are in, both of doing mischief, and of having mischief done them; (v. 13.) There is an evil, a sore evil, which Solomon himself had seen under the sun, in this lower world, this theatre of sin and wo—riches kept for the owners thereof, (who have been industrious to hoard them, and keep them safe,) to them hurt, they had better have them not. Their riches do them hurt, make them proud, secure, and in love with the world, draw away their hearts from God and duty, and make it very difficult for them to enter into the kingdom of heaven, nay, help to shut them out of it. (2.) They do hurt with their riches, which not only put them into a capacity of gratifying their own lusts, and living luxuriously, but give them an opportunity of oppressing others, and dealing hardly with them. (3.) Often they sustain hurt by their riches; they would not be envied, would not be robbed, if they were not rich. It is the fat beast that is led first to the slaught-er. A very rich man (as one observes) has sometimes been excepted out of a general pardon, both as to life and estate, merely on account of his vast and overgrown estate; so riches often take away the life of the owners thereof, Prov. i. 19.

5. The more men have, the more they have to lose, and perhaps they may lose it all, v. 14. Those riches that have been laid up in parentage, and kept with a great deal of care, perish by evil travail, by the very pains and care which they take to secure and increase them; many a one has ruined his estate by being over-solicitous to advance it, and make it more, and has lost all by catching at all. Riches are perishing things, and all our care about them cannot make them otherwise; they make themselves winging, and fly away. He that thought he should have made his son a gentleman leaves him more than a gentle estate, when he can take none into the world, in pity to him, helped him with swaddling-clothes, so, when he goes out, they help him with grave-clothes, and that is all: see Job i. 21. Ps. xlix. 17. This is urged as a reason why we should be content with such things as we have, 1 Tim. vi. 7. In respect of the body, we must go as we came, the dust shall return to the earth as it was; but sad is our case if the soul return as it came, for we are then laid up in sin, and if we find our estate, we have better have been born; and that seems to be the case of the worldlying here spoken of, for he is said to return in all points as he came, as sinful, as miserable, and much more so. This is a sore evil; he thinks it so, whose heart is glued to the world, that he shall take nothing of his labour which he may carry away in his hand; his riches will not go with him into another world, nor stand him in any stead there. If we labour in religion, the grace and evidence thereof will follow us, and may be carried away in our hearts, and shall be better for it to eternity; that is meat that endures: but, if we labour only for the world, to fill our hands with that, we cannot take that away with us; we are born with our hands gripping, but die with them extended, letting go what we held fast. So that, upon the whole matter, he may well ask, What profit has he that has laboured for the wind?

Note, Those that labour for the world labour for the wind; for that which has more sound than substance, which is uncertain, and always shifting its point, unsatisfying, and often hurtful, which we cannot hold fast, and which, if we take up with it as our portion, will no more feed us than the wind, Hos. xii. 1. Men will see that they have laboured for the wind, when, at death, they find the profit of their labour is all gone, gone like the wind, they know not whither.

7. Those that have much, if they set their hearts upon it, have not only uncomfortable deaths, but uncomfortable lives too, v. 17. This covetous worldling, that is so bent upon raising an estate, all his days he eats in darkness and much sorrow, and it is his sickness and wrath; he has not only no pleasure of his estate, nor any enjoyment of it himself, for he eats the bread of sorrow, (Ps. cxxxvii. 2.) but a great deal of vexation to see others eat of it. His necessary surcharged makes him sick, make his heart fret, and he seems as if he were angry that himself and those about him cannot live without meat. As we read the last clause, it intimates how ill this covetous worldling can bear the common and unavoidable calamities of human life; when he is in health, he eats in darkness, always dull with care and fear about what he has; but, if he be sick, he has much sorrow and wrath with his sickness; he is vexed that his sickness takes him off from his business, and hinders him in his pursuits of the world; vexed that all his hopes and wealth would not buy him any case or relief; but especially terrified with the apprehensions of death, (which his disease are the harbingers of,) of leaving this world, and the things of it, behind him, which he has set his affections upon, and removing to a world he has made no preparation for. He has not any sorrow after a godly sort, does not sorrow to repentance, but he has sorrow and wrath, is angry at the providence of God, angry at his sickness, angry at all about him, fretful and peevish, which doubles his affliction, and makes a good man lessens and lightens by patience and joy in his sickness.

18. Behold that which I have seen: it is good and comely for one to eat and to drink, and to enjoy the good of all his labour that he taketh under the sun all the days of his life, which God giveth him; for it is his portion. 19. Every man also to whom God hath given riches and wealth, and has given him power to eat thereof, and to take his portion, and to rejoice in his labour; this is the gift of God. 20. For he shall not much remember the days of his life; because God answereth him in the joy of his heart.

Solomon, from the vanity of riches hoarded up, here infers, that the best course we can take, is, to use well what we have, to serve God with it, to do good with it, and take the comfort of it to ourselves and our families; this he had before pressed, ch. ii. 24.—iii. 22. Observe,

1. What it is that is here recommended to us; not to indulge the appetites of the flesh, or to take up with present pleasures or profits for our portion, but soberly and moderately to make use of what Providence hath given us; for this is the sum of the passage through this world. We must not starve ourselves, either through covetousness, because we cannot afford ourselves food convenient, or through eagerness in our worldly pursuits, or through excessive care and grief, but eat and drink what is fit for us, to keep our bodies in good plight for the serving of our souls in God's service. We must not kill ourselves with labour, and then leave others to enjoy the good of it, but take the comfort of that which our hands have laboured for, and that not now and then, but all the days of our life which God gives us. Life is God's gift, and he has appointed us the number of the days of our life: (Job xiv. 5.) let us therefore spend those days in serving the Lord our God with joyfulness and gladness of heart. We must not do the business of our calling as a drudgery, and make ourselves slaves to it, but we must rejoice in our labour, not grasp at more business than we can go through with, but give diligence and discretion in all our business, and take the pleasure in the calling wherein God has put us, and go on in the business of it with cheerfulness; this is to rejoice in our labour, whatever it is, as Zebulon in his going out, and Issachar in his tents.

2. What is urged to recommend it to us.

(1.) That it is good and comely to do this; it is well, and it looks well; they that cheerfully use what God has given them, thereby honour the Giver, answer the intention of the gift, act rationally and generously, do good in the world, and make what they have turn to the best account, and this is both

...that he have no burial; I say, that an untimely birth is better than he: 4. For he cometh with vanity, and departeth in darkness, and his name shall be covered with darkness. 5. Moreover, he hath not seen the sun, nor known any thing: this hath more rest than the other. 6. Yea, though he live a thousand years twice told, yet hath he seen no good: do not all go to one place?

Solomon had showed, in the close of the foregoing chapter, how good it is to make a comfortable use of the gifts of God's providence; now here he shows the evil of the contrary, having, and not using; gathering to lay up for I know not what contingent emergencies; being not to lay it out on the most urgent occasions present; this is an evil which Solomon himself saw under the sun. v. 1. A great deal of evil there is under the sun; there is a world above the sun, where there is no evil, yet God causes his sun to shine upon the evil as well as upon the good, which is an aggravation of the evil. God has lighted up a candle for his servants to work by, but they bury their talent as slothful and unprofitable, and so misapply the light, and are unworthy of it. Solomon, as a king, has inspected the treasures of his subjects, and took notice of this evil as a prejudice to the public, who are damaged, not only by men's prodigality on the one hand, but by their penuriousness on the other; as it is with the blood in the natural body, so it is with the wealth of the body politic; if, instead of circulating, it stagnates, it will be of ill consequence. Solomon, as a preacher, observed the evils that were done, that he might reprove them and warn people against them. This evil was, in his days, common, and yet then there was great plenty of silver and gold, which, one would think, should have made people less fond of riches; the times also were peaceable, nor was there any prospect of trouble, which to some is a temptation to hoard; but no providence will of itself, unless the grace of God work it, cure the corrupt affection that is in the carnal mind to the world and the things of it, nay, when riches increase, we are most apt to set hearts upon them. Now concerning this miseric, observe,

1. The abundant reason he has to serve God with joyfulness and gladness of heart; how well God has done for him;

1. He has given him riches, wealth, and honour, v. 2. Note, (1.) Riches and wealth commonly gain people honour among men. Though it be but an image, if it be a golden image, all people, nations, and languages, will fall down, and worship it. (2.) Riches, wealth, and honour, are God's gifts, the gifts of his providence, and not given, as his rain and sunshine, alike to all, but to some, and not to others, as God sees fit. (3.) Yet they are given to many that do not make a good use of them, to many to whom God does not give wisdom and grace to take the comfort of them, and serve God with them. The gifts of common providence are bestowed on many to whom are denied the gifts of special grace, without which the gifts of providence often do more hurt than good.

2. He wants nothing for his soul, of all that he desires. Providence has been so liberal to him, that he has as much as heart could wish, and more, Ps. lxiii. 7. He does not desire grace for his soul, the better part; all he desires, is, enough to gratify the sensual appetite, and that he has: his belly is filled with these hid treasures, Ps. xvii. 14. 3. He is supposed to have a numerous family, to beget a hundred children, which are the stay and strength of his house, and as a quiver full of ar-to him, which are the honour and credit of his house, and in whom he has the prospect of having his name built up, and having all the immortality this world can give him. They are full of children, (Ps. xvii. 14.) while many of God's people are written childless, and stripped of all.

7. To complete his happiness he is supposed to live many years, and many days, for our life is to be reckoned rather by days than years; the days of his years are many, and so healthful is his constitution, and so slowly does age creep upon him, that they are likely to be many more. Nay, he is supposed to live a thousand years, which no man (that we know of) ever did; nay, a thousand years twa told, a small part of which time, one would think, were enough to convince me of their own experience, of the folly both of those that expect to find all good in worldly weal, and of those that expect to find any good in it in using it.

II. The little heart he has to use this which God gives him, for the ends and purposes for which it was given him. This is his fault and folly, that he renders not again according to the benefit done unto him, and serves not the Lord God, his Benefactor, with joyfulness and gladness of heart, in the abundance of this day of prosperity he is not joyful. Trias es, et felix? Are thou happy, yet sad? See his folly:

1. He cannot find in his heart to take the comfort of what he has himself. He has meat before him, he has wherewith to maintain himself and his family comfortably, but he has not power to eat thereof; his sordid nuggett temper will not suffer him to lay it out, no not upon himself, no not upon that which is most necessary for himself. He has not power to reason himself out of this absurdity, to conquer his covetous humour. He is weak indeed, who has not power to use what God gives him, for God gives him not that power but withholds it from him, to punish him for his other abuses of his wealth; because he has not the will to serve God with it, God denies him the power to serve himself with it.

2. He suffers those to prey upon him, that he is under no obligations to; A stranger eateth it. This is the common practice of misers, they will not trust their own children, perhaps; but retainers and hangers-on, that have the art of wheedling, insinuate themselves into them, and find ways of devouring what they have, or getting it to be left to them by their wills. God orders it so that a stranger eats it; strangers devour his strength, Hos. vii. 9. Prov. v. 10. This may be well called vanity, and an evil disease. What we have we have in vain, if we do not use it; and that temper of mind is certainly a most wretched dismuster, which keeps us from using it. Our worst diseases are those from the corruption of our own hearts.

3. He deprives himself of the good that he might have had of his worldly possessions; not only forfeits it, but robs himself of it, and throws it from him; His soul is not filled with good, v. 3. He is still unsatisfied and uneasy. His hands are filled with riches, his barns filled, and his bags filled, but his soul is not filled with good, no, not with that good, for it is still craving more. Nay, (v. 6.) he has not seen good, he cannot so much as please his eye, for that is still looking further, and looking with envy on those that have more. He has not even the sensible good of an estate. Though he looks not beyond the things that are seen, yet he looks not with any true pleasure on them.

4. He has no burial, nor agreeable to his rank, no decent human burial, no burial of an ass; either through the soddeness of his temper he will not allow himself a fashionable burial, but forbid it; or the strangers that have eaten him up leave him so poor, at last, that he has not wherewithal, or those to whom he leaves what he has so little esteem for his memory, and are so greedy of what they are to have from him, that they will not be at the charges of burying him handsomely, which his own children, if he had left it to them, would not have grudged him.

III. The condition which the preacher gives to an unimply birth before him, An unimply birth, a child that is carried from the womb to the grave is better than he. Better is the fruit that drops from the tree before it is ripe, than that which is left to hang on till it is rotten. Job, in his passion, thinks the condition of an unimply birth better than his, when he was in adversity; (Job iii. 16.) but Solomon here pronounces it better than the condition of a worldling in his greatest prosperity, when the world smiles upon him the common

1. He grants the condition of an unimply birth, upon many accounts, to be very sad; (v. 4.) He comes in with vanity, for, as to this world, he that is born, and dies immediately, was born in vain, and he departs in darkness, little or no notice is taken of him; being an abortive, he has no name, or, if he had, it would soon be forgotten and buried in oblivion, it would be covered with darkness, as the body iswith the earth. Nay, (v. 5.) he has not seen the sun, but for the darkness of the womb he is hurried immediately to that of the grave, and which is worse than not being known to any, he has not known any thing, and therefore has come short of that which is the greatest pleasure and honour of man. Those that live in wilful ignorance, and know nothing to purpose, are no better than an unimply birth that has not seen the sun, nor known any thing.

2. Yet he prefers it before that of a covetous miser; this unimply birth has more rest than the other, for this has some rest, but the other has none; this has no trouble and disquiet, but the other is in perpetual agitation, and has nothing but trouble, trouble of his own making. The shorter the life is, the longer the rest; and the fewer the days, and the less we have to do with this troublesome world, the less trouble we know.

'Tis better die a child at four, Than live, and die so at fourscore.

The reason he gives why this has more rest, is, because all go to one place to dwell in, and this is sooner at his rest, v. 6. He that draws a thousand years goes to the same place with the child that does not live an hour, ch. iii. 20. The grave is the place we shall all meet in. Whatever differences there may be in men's condition in this world, they must all die, are all under the same sentence, and, to outward appearance, their deaths are alike. The grave is, to one as well as another, a land of silence, of darkness, of separation from the living; and a sepulchre-phlegmatic, it is the common den of rich and poor, honourable and mean, learned and unlearned; the short-lived and long-lived meet in the grave, only one rides post thither, the other goes by a slower conveyance; the dust of both mingle, and lie undistinguishable.

7. All the labour of man is for his mouth, and yet the appetite is not filled. 8. For what hath the wise more than the fool? what hath the poor, that knoweth to walk before the living? 9. Better is the sight of the eyes than the wandering of the desire: this is also vanity and vexation of spirit. 10. That which hath been is named already, and it is known that it is man: neither may he contend with him that is mightier than he.

The preacher here further shows the vanity and folly of heaping up worldly wealth, and expecting happiness in it.

1. How much soever we toil about the world, and get out of it, we can have for ourselves no more than a maintenance; (v. 7.) All the labour of man is for his mouth, which craves it of him; (Prov. xvi. 26.) it is but food and raiment, what is more, others have, not we; it is all for the mouth; what care but for the bread for meat? there is nothing for the head and heart, nothing to nourish or enrich the soul. A little will serve to sustain us comfortably, and a great deal can do no more.

2. Those that have ever so much, are still craving; let a man labour ever so much for his mouth, yet the affluence is not filled. (1.) Natural desires are still returning, still pressing; a man may be fed to-day, and yet hungry to-morrow. (2.) Worldly sinful desires are insatiable, ch. v. 16. Wealth to a worldling is like drink to one in a dropsey, which does but increase the thirst. Some read the whole verse thus; Though all a man's labour fail out to his own mind, (ari ejus obvieniat—to so as to correspond with his views, Juv.) just as himself would have it, yet his desire is not satisfied, still he has a mind to something more. (2.) The desires of the soul find nothing in the wealth of the world to give them any satisfaction. The soul is not filled; so the word is. When God gave Israel their request, he sent leanness into their souls, Ps. cvi. 15. He was a fool, who, when his barns were full, said, Soul, take thine ease.

3. A fool may have as much worldly wealth, and may enjoy as much of the pleasure of it, as a wise man; nay, and perhaps not be so sensible of the vexation of it; What has the wise more than the fool? v. 8. Perhaps he has not so good an estate, so good a trade, nor such good pre-eriment, as the fool has. Nay, suppose them to be equal in their possessions, what can a wise man, a scholar, a wit, a politician, squeeze out of his estate more than needful supplies? But a half-witted man may do this. A fool can fare as well and relish it, can dress as well, and make as good a figure in any public appearance, as a wise man; so that if there were not pleasures and honour peculiar to the mind, which the wise man has more than the fool, as to his worldly wealth they would be upon a level.

4. Even a poor man, who has business, and is discreet, diligent and dexterous, in the management of it, may get as comfortably through this world as he that is loaded with an overgrown estate. Consider what the poor has less than the rich, if he but knows to walk before the living, knows how to conduct himself decently, and do his duty to all, how to get an honest livelihood by his labour, how to spend his time well, and improve his opportunities. What has he? Why, he is better beloved, and more respected, among his neighbours, and has a better interest, than many a rich man that is griping and haughty. What has he? Why, he has as much of the comfort of this life, has food and raiment, and is therewith content, and so is as truly rich as he that has abundance.

5. The enjoyment of what we have cannot but be as well, more perhaps, than a greedy grasping at more; (v. 9.) Better is the sight of the eyes, making the best of that which is present, than the wandering of the desire, the uneasy walking of the soul after things at a distance, and the affecting of a variety of imaginary satisfactions. He is much happier that is always content, though he has ever so little, than he that is always coveting, though he has ever so much. We cannot say, Better is the sight of the eyes than the fixing of the desire upon God, and the rest of the soul in him; it is better to live by faith in things to come than to live by sense, which dwells only upon present things; but better is the sight of the eyes than the resting of the desire after the world, and the things of it, than which nothing is more uncertain or more unsatisfying at the best. This wandering of the desire is vanity and vexation of spirit; it is vanity at the best; if what is desired be obtained, it proves not what we promised ourselves from it, but commonly the wanderers are exposed and disappointed, and then it turns to vexation of spirit.

6. Our lot, whatever it is, is that which is appointed us by the counsel of God, which cannot be altered, and it is therefore our wisdom to reconcile ourselves to it, and cheerfully to acquiesce in it; (v. 10.) That which has been, or, as some read it, that which is, and so likewise that which shall be, is named already, it is already determined in the divine foreknowledge, and all our care and pains cannot make it otherwise than as it is fixed; Jacta est alea—The die is cast; it is therefore folly to quarrel with that which will be as it is, and wisdom to make a virtue of necessity. We shall have what pleases God, and let that please us.

7. Whatever we attain to in this world, still we are but men, and the greatest possessions and preferences cannot set us above the common accidents of human life; That which has been, and is, that busy animal that makes such a stir and such a noise in the world, is named already; he that made him gave him his name, and it is known that it is man, that is his name by which he must know himself, and it is a humbling name, Gen. v. 2. He called their name Adam; and all theirs have the same character, red earth. Though a man could make himself master of all the treasures of kings and princes, yet he is a man still, mean, mutable, and mortal, and may at any time be involved in the calamities that are common to men. It is good for rich and great men to know and consider that they are but men, Ps. ix. 20. It is known that they are but men; let them put what face they will upon it, and, like the king of Tyre, set their heart as the heart of God, yet the Egyptians are men, and not gods, and it is known that they are so.

8. How far soever our desires wander, and how closely soever we endeavours keep pace with them, we cannot strive with the Divine Providence, but must submit to the dispositions of it, whether we will or no. If it is man, he may not contend with him that is mightier than he; it is presumption to arrogate God's proceedings, and to charge him with folly or iniquity; nor is it to any purpose to complain of him, for he is in one mind, and who can turn him? Elisha pacifies Job with this incontestable principle, That God is greater than man, (Job xxxiii. 12.) and therefore man may not contend with him, nor resist his judgments, when they come with commission. A man cannot with the greatest riches make his part good against the arrests of sickness or death, but must yield to his fate.

11. Seeing there be many things that increase vanity, what is man the better? 12. For who knoweth what is good for man in this life, all the days of his vain life which he spendeth as a shadow? For who can tell a man what shall be after him under the sun?

Here, 1. Solomon lays down his conclusion, which he had undertaken to prove, as that which was fully confirmed by the foregoing discourse; "There be many things that increase vanity; the life of man is vain, at the best, and there are abundance of accidents that concur to make it more so; even that which pretend to increase the wealth of pleasure, does but increase the vanity, and make it more vexatious.

2. He draws some inferences from it, which serve further to evince the truth of it.

(1.) That a man is never the nearer to true happiness for the abundance that he has in this world; What is man the better for his wealth and pleasure, his honour and preferment? What remains to man? What redundance in it, what overplus, what advantage, when he comes to balance his accounts? Nothing that will do him any good, or turn to account.

(2.) That we do not know what to wish for, because that which we promise ourselves most satisfaction in, often proves most vexatious to us: Who knows what is good for a man in this life, where every thing is vain, and any thing, even that which we most covet, may prove a calamity to us.

Thoughtful people are in care to do every thing for the best, if they knew it; but as it is an instance of the corruption of our hearts, that we are apt to desire that as good for us which is really hurtful, as children that cry for knives to cut their fingers with; so it is an instance of the vanity of this world, that what, according to all probable conjectures, seems to be for the best, often proves otherwise; such is our short-sight in viewing issues and events of things, and such broken reeds are all our creature-confidence. We know not how to advise others for the best, nor how to act ourselves, because that which we apprehend likely to be for our welfare may become a trap.

(3.) That therefore our life upon earth is what we have no reason to take any great complacency in, or to be confident of the continuance of: It is to be reckoned by days, it is but a vain life, and we spend it as a shadow, so little is there in it substantial, so fleeting, so uncertain, so transitory, is it, and so little in it to be found of, or to be depended on. If all the comforts of life be vanity, life itself can have no great reality in it, to constitute a happiness for us.

(4.) That our expectations from this world are as uncertain and deceitful as our enjoyments are. Since the vanity is, it cannot be called a man what shall be, or what is after the sun? He can no more please himself with the hopes of what shall be after him, to his children and family, than with the relish of what is with him, since he can neither foresee himself, nor can any one else foretell to him, what shall be after him; nor shall he have any intelligence sent him of it when he is gone; his sons come to honour, and he knows it not; so that, look how we will, Vanity of vanities, all is vanity.

CHAP. VII.

Solomon had given many proofs and instances of the vanity of this world and the things of it; now, in this chapter,

I. He recommends to us some good means proper to be used for the redress of these grievances, and the amending of ourselves against the mischief we are in danger of from these things. He proposes the following ways,

1. Care of our reputation, v. 1. 2. Seriousness, v. 2. 3. Calmness of spirit, v. 7. 4. Prudence in the management of all our affairs, v. 11. 5. Submission to the will of God in all events, accompanying ourselves to every condition, v. 13. 15. 6. A conscientious avoiding of all dangerous extremities, v. 16. 18. 7. Mildness and tenderness toward those that have been injurious to us, v. 19. 22. In short, the best way to save ourselves from the vexation which the vanity of the world creates us, is, to keep our temper, and to maintain a strict government of our passions. He laments his own iniquity, as that which was more vexatious than any of these vanities, that mystery of iniquity, the having of many wives, by which he was drawn away from God and his duty, v. 23. 29.

II. A GOOD name is better than precious ointment; and the day of death than the day of one's birth. 2. It is better to go to the house of mourning than to go to the house of feasting: for that is the end of all men; and the living will lay it to his heart.

3. Sorrow is better than laughter: for by the sadness of the countenance the heart is made better. 4. The heart of the wise is in the house of mourning: but the heart of fools is in the house of mirth. 5. It is better to hear the rebuke of the wise, than for a man to hear the song of fools. 6. For as the crackling of thorns under a pot, so is the laughter of a fool. This also is vanity.

In these verses, Solomon lays down some great truths, which seem paradoxes to the unthinking part, that is, the far greatest part, of mankind.

I. That the honour of virtue is really more valuable and desirable than all the wealth and pleasure in this world; (v. 1.) A good name is better before good ointment, so it may be read; it is preferable to it, and will be rather chosen by all that are wise. Good ointment is here put for all the profits of the earth, among the products of which oil was reckoned one of the most valuable, for all the delights of sense, for ointment and perfume, which rejoice the heart, and it is called the oil of gladness, nay, and for the highest titles of honour with which men are dignified, for kings are anointed. A good name is better than all riches; (Prov. xxii. 1.) a name for wisdom and goodness with those that are wise and good— the memory of the just; this is a good that will bring a more grateful pleasure to the mind, will give a man a larger opportunity of usefulness, and will go further and last longer, than the most precious box of ointment; for Christ paid Mary for her ointment with a good name, a name in the gospels, (Matth. xxvi. 13.) and we are sure he always pays with advantage.

II. That, all things considered, our going out of the world is a greater kindness to us than our coming into the world was; The day of death is preferable to the birth-day; though, as to others, there was joy when a child was born into the world, and where there is death, there is lamentation, yet, as to ourselves, if we have lived so as to merit a good name, the day of our death, which will put a period to our cares, and toils, and sorrows, and remove us to rest, and joy, and eternal satisfaction, is better than the day of our birth, which ushered us into a world of sin, trouble, and vanity, and vexation. We were born to uncertainty, but a good man does not die at uncertainty. The day of our birth clogged our souls with the burden of the flesh, but the day of our death will set them at liberty from that burthen.

III. That it will do us more good to go to a funeral than to go to a festival; (v. 2.) It is better to go to the house of mourning, and there weep with them that weep, than to go to the house of feasting, to a wedding, or a wake, there to rejoice with them that do rejoice. It will do us more good, and make better impressions upon us. We may lawfully go to both, as there is occasion; our Saviour both feasted at the wedding of his friend in Cana, and wept at the grave of his friend in Bethany; and we may possibly both glorify God, and do good, and get good, in the house of feasting; but, considering how we are apt to be vain and frothy, proud and secure, and indulgent of the flesh, it is better for us to go to the house of mourning, not to see the pomp of the funeral, but to share in the sorrow of it, and to learn good morals from the dead, who is gone back from his long home, and from the mourners, who go about the streets.

The uses to be gathered from the house of mourning, are, 1. By way of information; That is the end of all men; it is the end of man as to this world, a final period to his state here, he shall return no more to his house; it is the end of all men; all have sinned, and therefore death passes upon us; we must thus be left by our friends as the mourners are, and acquaint our own decease. What is the lot of others will be ours; the cup is going round, it will come to our turn to pledge it shortly. 2. By way of admonition: The living will lay it to his heart. Will they? It were well if they would, they that are spiritually alive will lay it to heart, and, as for all the survivors, one would think they should; it is their own fault if they do not; for nothing is more easy and natural than the death of others to be put in mind of our own. Some perhaps will lay that to heart, and consider their latter end, who would not lay a good sermon to heart.

For the further proof of this, (v. 4.) he makes it the character, (1.) Of a wise man, that his heart is in the house of mourning; he is much conversant with mournful subjects; and it is both an evidence and a furtherance of his wisdom; the house of mourning is the wise man’s school, where he has learned many a good lesson, and there, where he is serious, he is in his element. When he is in the house of mourning, his heart is there, to improve the spectacles of mortality that are presented to him; nay, when he is in the house of feasting, his heart is in the house of mourning, by way of sympathy with those that are in sorrow.

(2.) It is the character of a fool, that his heart is in the house of mirth; his heart is all upon it, to be merry and jovial, his whole delight is in sport and gaiety, in merry stories, merry songs, and merry company, merry days, and merry nights. If he be at any time in the house of mourning, he is under a restraint, his heart at the same time is in the house of mirth; this is his folly, and helps to make him more and more foolish.

IV. That gravity and seriousness better become us, and are better for us, than mirth and jollity, v. 3.

The common proverb says, “An ounce of mirth is worth a pound of sorrow.” It is true, but it is putting an example in exchange for a contrary lesson; Sorrow is better than laughter, more agreeable to our present state, where we are daily sinning, and suffering ourselves, more or less, and daily seeing the sins and sufferings of others. While we are in a vale of tears, we should conform to the temper of the climate; it is also more for our advantage, for by the sadness that appears in the countenance, the heart is often made better. Note, 1. That is best for us which is best for our souls, best for the heart to be made better, though it be displeasing to sense. 2. Sadness is often a happy means of seriousness, and that affliction which is impairing to the health, estate, and family, may be improving to the mind, and make such impressions upon that, as may alter its temper very much for the better; may make it humble and meek, loose from the world, penitent for sin, and careful of duty.

Vexatio doli intellectuum—Vexation sharps the intellect. Perpetual hissing, weeping, and mourning, if I had not been made wretched. It will follow, on the contrary, that by the mirth and frolicksome-ness of the countenance the heart is made worse, more vain, carnal, sensual, and secure, more in love with the world, and more estranged from God and spiritual things, (Job xxi. 12, 14.) till it become utterly unconcerned in the afflictions of Joseph, as those, Amos vi. 5, 6. and the king and Haman, Esth. iii. 15.

We should therefore make great allowances to those that are abused, and ill dealt with, and not be severe in our censures of them, though they do not act so discreetly as they should; we know not what we should do if it were our own case.

II. He argues against it; let us not fret at the power and success of oppressors, nor be envious at them, for,

1. The character of oppressors is very bad, so some understand, v. 7. If he that had the reputation of a wise man, becomes an oppressor, he becomes a mad man, his reason is departed from him, he is no better than a roaring lion and a raging bear, and the gifts, the bribes, he takes, the gains he seems to reap by his oppressions, do but destroy his heart, and quite extinguish the poor remains of sense and virtue in him, and therefore he is rather to be pitted than envied; let him alone, and he will act so foolishly, and drive so furiously, that in a little time he will ruin himself.

2. The issue, at length, will be good; Better is the end of a thing than the beginning thereof; by faith see what the end will be, and with patience expect it. When proud men begin to oppress their poor honest neighbours, they think their power will bear them out in it, they doubt not but to carry the day, and gain the point; but it will prove better in the end than it seemed in the beginning, their power will be broken, their wealth gotten by oppression will be wasted and gone, they will be humbled and brought down, and reckoned with for their injustice, and oppressed innocence will be both relieved and recompensed. Better was the end of Moses's treaty with Pharaoh, that proud oppressor, when Israel was brought forth with triumph, than the beginning of it, when the tale of bricks was doubled, and every thing looked discouraging.

He arms us against it with some necessary directions. If we would not be driven mad by oppression, but preserve the possession of our own souls,

1. We must be clothed with humility; for the proud in spirit are they that cannot bear to be trampled upon, but grow outrageous, and fret themselves, when they are hardly bested; that will break a proud man's heart which will not break a humble man's sleep. Morbid pride, therefore, and a lowly spirit will easily be reconciled to a low condition.

2. We must put on patience; bearing patience, to submit to the will of God in the affliction, and waiting patience, to expect the issue in God's due time. The patient in spirit are here opposed to the proud in spirit, for where there is humility, there will be patience; those will be thankful for any thing, who own they deserve nothing at God's hand, and the patient are said to be better than the proud, they are more easy to themselves, more acceptable to God, and more likely to see a good issue of their troubles.

3. We must govern our passion with wisdom and grace; (v. 9.) Be not hasty in thy spirit to be angry; those that are hasty in their expectations, and cannot brook delays, are apt to be angry if they be not immediately gratified: Be not angry at proud oppressors, or any that are the instruments of your trouble. (v. 4.) Be not soon angry, not quick in apprehension or action, and resenting it, nor let your heart be to express your resentment any longer; God is not long angry: for though anger may come into the bosom of a wise man, and pass through it as a way-faring man, it rests only in the bosom of fools, there it resides, there it remains, there it has the innermost and uppermost place, there it is hugg'd as that which is dear, and laid in the bosom, and not easily parted with. He therefore that would approve himself so wise as not to give place to the devil, must not let the sun go down upon his wrath. Eph. iv. 26, 27.

4. We must make the best of that which is; (v. 10.) Take it not for granted that the former days were better than these, nor inquire what is the cause that they were so, for therein thou dost not inquire wisely, since thou inquir'st into the reason of the thing before thou art sure that the thing itself is true; and besides, thou art so much a stranger to the times past, and such an incompetent judge even of the present times, that thou canst not expect a satisfactory answer to the inquiry, and therefore thou dost not inquire wisely; may, the supposition is a foolish reflection upon the providence of God in the government of the world. Note, (1.) It is folly to cry out of the badness of our own times, when we have more reason to cry out of the badness of our own hearts, (if men's hearts were better, the times would mend,) and when we have more reason to be thankful that they are not worse, but that even in the worst of times we enjoy many mercies, which help to make them not only tolerable, but comfortable. (2.) It is folly to cry up the goodness of former times, so as to derogate from the mercy of God to us in our own times; as if former ages had not the same things to complain of that we have, or if, perhaps, in some respects, they had not, yet as if God had been unjust and unkind to us in casting our lot in an iron age, compared with the golden ages that went before us; this arises from nothing but fretfulness and discontent, and an aptness to pick quarrels with God himself. We are not to think there is any universal decay in nature, or degeneracy in mankind, God has been always good, and men always bad; and if, in some respects, the times are now worse than they have been, perhaps, in other respects, they are better.

11. Wisdom is good with an inheritance; and by it there is profit to them that see the sun. 12. For wisdom is a defence, and money is a defence: but the excellency of knowledge is, that wisdom giveth life to them that have it. 13. Consider the work of God; for who can make that straight which he hath made crooked? 14. In the day of prosperity be joyful, but in the day of adversity consider: God also hath set the one over against the other, to the end that man should find nothing after him. 15. All things have I seen in the days of my vanity: there is a just man that perisheth in his righteousness, and there is a wicked man that prolongeth his life in his wickedness. 16. Be not righteous over-much; neither make thyself over-wise: why shouldst thou destroy thyself? 17. Be not over-much wicked, neither be thou foolish: why shouldst thou die before thy time? 18. It is good that thou shouldst take hold of this; yea, also from this withdraw not thy hand: for he that feareth God shall come forth of them all. 19. Wisdom strengtheneth the wise more than ten mighty men which are in the city. 20. For there is not a just man upon earth, that doeth good and sinneth not. 21. Also take no heed unto all words that are spoken, lest thou hear thy servant curse thee: 22. For oftentimes thinke thou, also were thine own heart knoweth that thou thyself likewise hast cursed others.

Solomon, in these verses, recommends wisdom to us as the best antidote against those distempers of mind, which we are liable to, by reason of the vanity and vexation of spirit that there are in the things of this world.

Here are some of the praises and the precepts of wisdom.

1. The praises of wisdom. Many things are here said, its commendation, to engage us to get and retain wisdom.

1. Wisdom is necessary to the right managing and improving of our worldly possessions; Wisdom is good with an inheritance; an inheritance is good for little without wisdom. Though a man have a great estate, though it come easily to him, by descent from his ancestors, if he have not wisdom to use it for the end for which he has it, he will also make friends in his destruction. (Prov. xvi. 9.)

Wisdom is as good as an inheritance, yea, better too, so the margin reads it; it is more our own, more our honour, will make our greater blessings, will remain longer with us, and turn to a better account.

2. It is of great advantage to us throughout the whole course of our passage through this world; by it there is real profit to them that see the sun, both to those that have it, and to their contemporaries. It is pleasant to see the sun, (ch. xi. 7.) but that pleasure is not comparable to the pleasure of wisdom. The light of this world is an advantage to us in doing the business of this world; (John xi. 9.) but to them that have that advantage, unless withal they have wisdom wherewith to manage their business, that advantage is worth little to them. The clearness of the eye of the understanding is of greater use to us than bodily eye-sight.

3. It contributes much to our safety, and is a shelter to us from the storms of trouble, and its scorching heat; it is a shadow, so the word is, as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land. Wisdom is a defence, and siomeny, that is, as money is a defence. As a rich man makes his wealth, so a wise man makes his wisdom, a strong city. In the shadow of wisdom, (so the words run,) and in the shadow of money, there is safety. He puts wisdom and money together, to confirm what he had said before, that wisdom is good with an inheritance. Wisdom is as a wall, and money may serve as a thorn-hedge, which protects the field.

4. It is joy and true happiness to a man. This is the excellency of knowledge, divine knowledge, not only above money, but above wisdom too, human wisdom, the wisdom of this world, that it gives life to them that have it. The fear of the Lord, that is, wisdom, and that is life, it prolongs life. Men's wealth exposes their lives, but their wisdom preserves them. Now whereas wealth will not lengthen out the natural life, true wisdom will give spiritual life, the earnest of eternal life; so much better is it to get wisdom than gold!

5. It will put strength into a man, and be his strength and support; (v. 19.) Wisdom strengthens the wise, strengthens their spirits, and makes them bold and resolve, by keeping them always on sure grounds; it strengthens their interest, and gains them friends. True wisdom doeth not in the dust as their friends, and doeth not for their sakes suffer their sufferings, and against the attacks that are made upon them, more than ten mighty men, great commanders, strengthen the city. They that are truly wise and good are taken under God's protection, and are safer than if ten of the mightiest men in the city, men of the greatest power and interest, should undertake to secure them, and become their patrons.

11. Some of the precepts of wisdom, that wisdom will be of so much advantage to us.

1. We must have an eye of God and lay his hand in every thing that befalls us; (v. 13.) consider the work of God. To silence our complaints concerning cross events, let us consider the hand of God in them, and not open our mouths against that which is his doing; let us look upon the disposal of our condition and all the circumstances of it as the work of God, and consider it as the product of his eternal counsel, which is fulfilled in every thing that befalls us. (1 Cor. x. 13.) God is wise, just, and good, and there is an admirable beauty and harmony in his works, and all will appear, at last, to have been for the best. Let us therefore give him the glory of all his works concerning us, and study to answer his designs in them. Consider the work of God, as that which we cannot make any alteration of. Who can make that straight which he has made crooked? Who can change the nature of things from what is settled by the God of nature? If he set a hedge too high, will he put a place? And if he hedge up the way with thorns, who can get forward? If desulting judgments go forth with commission, who can put a stop to them? Since therefore we cannot mend God's work, we ought to make the best of it.

We must accommodate ourselves to the various dispensations of Providence, that respect us, and do the work and duty of the day in its day, v. 14.

Observe,

1. How the appointments and events of Providence are counterchanged. In this world, at the same time, some are in prosperity, others are in adversity; the same persons, at one time, are in great prosperity, at another time, in great adversity; nay, one event prosperous, and another grievous, may occur to the same person at the same time; both come from the hand of God, out of his mouth both evil and good, (Isa. xlii. 26.) and he has set the one over against the other, so that there is a very short and easy passage between them, and they are a foil to each other; day and night, summer and winter, are set the one over against the other, that in prosperity we may rejoice as though we rejoiced not, and in adversity may weep as though we wept not, for we may plainly see the one from the other, and quickly exchange the one for the other; and it is to the end that man may find nothing after him, that he may not be at any certainty concerning future events, or the continuance of the present scene, but may live in a dependence upon Providence, and be ready for whatever happens. Or, that man may find nothing in the word of God which he can pretend to amend.

2. How we must comply with the will of God, in events of both kinds. Our religion, in general, must be the same in all conditions, but the particular exercises of wisdom and life must, according to the outward condition does, that we may walk after the Lord. [1.] In a day of prosperity, (and it is but a day,) we must be joyful, be in good, be doing good, and getting good, maintain a holy cheerfulness, and serve the Lord with gladness of heart in the abundance of all things. "When the world smiles, rejoice in God, and praise him, and let the joy of the Lord be thy strength." [2.] In time of adversity, (and that is not in all times, too,) consider. When times of affliction are proper times for consideration, then God calls to consider, (Hag. i. 5.) then, if ever, we are disposed to it, and no good will be gotten by the affliction without it. We cannot answer God's end in afflicting us, unless we consider why and wherefore he contends with us. And consideration is necessary also to our comfort and support under our afflictions.

3. We must not be offended at the greatest prosperity of wicked people, nor at the smallest calamities that may befall the godly in this life, v. 15. Wisdom will teach us how to construe those dark chapters of Providence, so as to reconcile them with the wisdom, holiness, goodness, and faithfulness of God. We must not think it strange; Solomon tells the reader of this kind in his time; "All things have been in the days of my vanity; I have taken notice of all that passed, and this has been as surprising and perplexing to me as anything." Observe, Though Solomon was so wise and great a man, yet he calls the days of his life the days of his vanity, for the best days on earth are so, in comparison with the days of eternity. Or perhaps he refers to the days of his apostasy from God, (those were indeed the days of his vanity,) and refers upon himself as one thing that required him to infidelity, or, at least, to indifference in religion, that he saw just men perishishing in their righteousness, that the greatest piety would not secure men from the greatest afflictions by the hand of God, nay, and sometimes did expose men to the greatest injuries from the hands of wicked and unreasonable men. Naboth perished in his righteousness, and Abel long before. He had also seen men prolonging their lives in their wickedness; they live, and become old, yea, and are mighty in power; (Job xxii. 7.) by their fraud and violence they screen themselves from the sword of justice. "Now, in this, consider the work of God, and let it not be a stumbling-block to thee." The calamities of the righteous are preparing them for their future blessedness, and the wicked, while their days are prolonged, are but ripening for ruin. There is a judgment to come, which will rectify this seeming irregularity, to the glory of God, and the full satisfaction of all his people, and we must wait with patience till then.

4. Wisdom will be of use both for caution to saints in their way, and for a check to sinners in their way.

(1.) As to saints, it will engage them to proceed and persevere in their righteousness, and yet will be an admonition to them to take heed of running into extremes; A just man may perish in his righteousness, (v. 14.) while that zeal which is directed to the defense and rash zeal, pull trouble upon his own head, and then reflect upon Providence as dealing hardly with him; (v. 16.) "Be not righteous over-much. In the acts of righteousness, govern thyself by the rules of prudence, and be not transported, no not by a zeal for God, into any intemperate heats or passions, or any practices unbefitting the character, or dangerous to thine interests. Note, There may be over-doing in well-doing. Self-deny and mortification of the flesh are good; but if we prejudice our health by it, and unfit ourselves for the service of God, we are righteous over-much. To reprove those that offend, is good, but to cast that pearl before swine, who will turn again and rend us, is to be righteous over-much. "Make not thyself overs Wise; be not opinionative, and conceited of thine own abilities; set not up for a dictator, nor pretend to give law, and give judgment upon, all about thee; set not up for a judge, that is said and done, nor busy thyself in other men's matters; as if thou knewest every thing, and couldst do any thing. Why shouldst thou destroy thyself as fools often do by meddling with strife that belongeth not to you? Why shouldst thou provoke authority, and run thyself into the briers, by needless conti dictions, and by going out of thy sphere to correct what is amiss? Beware as serpents, beware of men." (2.) As to sinners, let it not prevail with them to forsake their sins, yet it may restrain them from growing very exorbitant. It is true, there is a wicked man that pro longs his life in his wickedness; (v. 15.) but let none say, they are they may safely be as wicked as they will; no, be not over-much wicked, (v. 17.) do not run to an excess of riot. Many that will not be wrought upon by the fear of God, and a dread of the terrors of hell, to avoid all sin, will yet, if they have ever so little consideration, avoid these acts that are against their health and estate, and expect them to public justice. And Solomon here makes use of these considerations. "The magistrate bears not the sword in vain, has a quick eye and a heavy hand, and is a terror to evil-doers; therefore be afraid of coming within his reach, be not so foolish as to lay thyself open to the law, why shouldst thou die before thy time? Solomon, in these two cautions, had probably a special regard to some of his own subjects that were dissatisfied to his government of themselves meditating the revolt which was made immediately after his death. Some, it may be, quarreled with the sins of their governor, and made that their pretence; to them he says, Be not righteous over-much. Others were weary of the strictness of the government, and the temple-service, and that made them desirous to set up another king; but he frightens both from their seditious practices with the sword of justice, and others likewise." A just man may perish in his righteousness, they that are of a seditious spirit; from meddling with them that were given to change.

5. Wisdom will direct us in the mean between two extremes, and keep us always in the way of our duty, which we shall find a plain and safe way; (v. 18.) "It is good that thou shouldst take hold of this, wisdom, this 'care, not to run thyself into snares; yea, also from this withdraw not thine hand, never slacken thy diligence, nor abate thy resolution to maintain a due decorum, and a good government of thyself. But such as are of a seditious spirit, they must carefully manage their headsstrong passions must be held from hurrying thee into one mischief or other, as the horse and mule that have no understanding; and, having taken hold of it, keep thine hand, and withdraw not thine hand from it, for if thou do, the liberty that they will take will be as the forthing of water, and thou wilt not easily recover thy hold again. Be conscientious, and yet be cautious, and to this exercise thyself. Govern thyself steadily by the principles of God's word, for, God warns thee, if thou do fears God shall come forth out of all these straits and difficulties which they run themselves into that cast off that fear. The fear of the Lord is that wisdom which will serve as a clue to extricate us out of the most intricate labyrinths. Honesty is the best policy. They that truly fear God have but one end to serve, and therefore act steadily. God has likewise promised to direct those that fear him, and to order their steps not only in the right way, but out of every dangerous way, Ps. xxxviii. 23, 24.

6. Wisdom will teach us how to conduct ourselves in reference to the sins and offences of others, which commonly contribute more than any thing else to the disturbance of our repose, which contract both guilt and grief.

(1.) Wisdom teaches us not to expect that those we deal with should be faultless; we ourselves are not so, no other. True, there is the wise as much as any thing, and arms them against the danger that arises from provocation, (v. 19.) so that they are not put into disorder by it; they consider that those that they have dealings and conversation with are not incoramate angels, but sinfull sons and daughters of Adam, even the best are so, that such as there is a just man upon earth, that doth good, and sinneth not, v. 20. Solomon has this in his prayer, (1 Kings viii. 46.) in his proverbs, (Prov. xx. 9.) and here in his preaching.
It is the character of just men, that they do good; for the tree is known by its fruits. [2.] The best that do good, yet cannot be expected there are defects, no, not one thing of which they are perfectly free from sin: but many of those that are sanctified are not sinless. None that live on this side heaven live without sin; if we say, We have not sinned, we deceive ourselves. [3.] We sin even in our doing good; there is something defective, nay something offensive, in our best performances. That which, for the substance of it, is good, and pleasing to God, is not so well done as it should be, and omissions in duty are sins, as well as omissions in good. It is well to see what the earth that is subject thus to sin and infirmity; the spirits of just men, when they are got clear of the body, are made perfect in holiness, (Heb. xii. 23.) and in heaven they do good, and sin not.

(2.) Wisdom teaches us not to be quick-sighted, or quick-scented, in apprehending and resenting affronts; but to wink at many of the injuries that are done us, and act as if we did not see them; (v. 21.) "Take no heed to all words that are spoken, set not thy heart to them; vex not thyself at men's peevish reflections upon thee, or suspicions of thee, but be as a deaf man that hears not; (Ps. xxxviii. 13, 14.) be not solicitous or inquisitive to know what people say of thee; if they speak well of thee, it will feed thy pride, if ill, it will stir up thine passion; see therefore that thou approve thyself to God and thine own conscience, and then heed not what men say of thee.

Hearteners, we say, seldom hear good of themselves; if thou heed every word that is spoken, perhaps thou wilt hear thine own servant curse thee, when he thinks thou dost not hear him; thou wilt be told that he does, and perhaps told falsely, if thou have thine ear open to tale-bearers, Prov. xix. 12. Nay, perhaps it is true, and thou mayest stand behind the curtain, and hear it thyself, mayest hear thyself not only blamed and despised, but cursed, the worst said of thee, and wished to thee, and that by a servant, one of the meanest rank, of the meanest degree, thy own servant, who should be an advocate for thee, and protect thy good name, as well as thy other interests; perhaps it is a servant thou hast been kind to, and yet he requires thee thus ill: and this will vex thee, thou hadst better not have heard it. Perhaps it is a servant thou hast wronged, and dealt unjustly with, and thought he dares not tell thee so, he tells others so, and tells God so, and then thine own conscience will join with him in the reproach, which will make it much more uncomfortable. Thou standest at the mercy even of the meanest. And perhaps there is a great deal more evil said of us than we think there is, and by those from whom we little expected it. But we do not consult our own repose, no, nor our credit, though we pretend to be jealous of it, if we take notice of every word that is spoken diminishingly of us; it is easier to pass by twenty such affronts than to avenge one.

(3.) Wisdom is in midst of our own faults; (p. 22.) "Be not enraged at those that speak ill of thee, or wish ill to thee; for oftentimes, in that case, if thou retire into thyself, thy own conscience will tell thee that thou thyself hast cursed others, spoken ill of them, and wished ill to them, and thou art paid in thine own coin." Note, When any affront or injury is done us, it is reasonable to examine our consciences, whether we have not done the same, or been guilty of what is accused to others. If, upon reflection, we find we have, we must take the new repentance for it, must justify God, and make use of it to qualify our own resentments. If we be truly angry with ourselves, as we ought to be, for backbiting and censuring others, we shall be the less angry with others for backbiting and censuring us. We must show all meekness towards all men, for we ourselves were sometimes foolish, Tit. iii. 2, 3. Matth. vii. 1, 2. James iii. 1, 2.

All this have I proved by wisdom I said, I will be wise; but it was far from me. 24. That which is far off, and exceeding deep, who can find it out? I applied my heart to know, and to search, and to seek out wisdom, and the reason of things, and to know the wickedness of folly, even of foolishness and madness: 26. And I find more bitter than death the woman whose heart is snares and nets, and her hands as bands: whose pleasure God shall escape from her; but the sinner shall be taken by her. 27. Behold, this have I found, (saith the Preacher,) counting one by one, to find out the account. 28. Which yet my soul seeketh, but I find not: one man among a thousand have I found: but a woman among all those have I not found. 29. Lo, this only have I found, that God hath made man upright; but they have sought out many inventions.

Solomon had hitherto been proving the vanity of the world, and its utter insufficiency to make men happy; now here he comes to show the vileness of sin, and its certain tendency to make men miserable; and this, as the former, he proves from his own experience, and it was a dear-bought experience. He is here, more than any where in all this book, putting on the habit of a penitent. He reviews what he had been discoursing of already, and tells us that what he had said was what he knew, and was well assured of, and what he resolved to stand by; All this have I proved by wisdom, v. 23. Now here, 1. He owns and laments the deficiencies of his wisdom. He had wisdom enough to see the vanity of the world, and to experience that that would not make a portion for a soul; but, when he came to inquire further, he found himself at a loss, his eye was too dim, his line was too short, and though he discovered this, there were many other things which he could not prove by wisdom.

1. His searches were industrious. God had given him a capacity for knowledge above any; he set up with a great stock of wisdom; he had the largest opportunities of improving himself that ever any man had. And, (1.) He resolved, if it were possible, to gain his point; I said, I will be wise; he earnestly desired it as highly valuable, he fully designed it as that which he looked upon to be attainable, he determined not to sit down short of it, Prov. xviii. 1. Many are not wise, because they never said they would be so, being indifferent to it; but Solomon, it is plain for the most part, was always ambitious of wisdom. Whereas, if he made trial of unusual pleasures, he still thought to acquaint his heart with wisdom, (ch. ii. 3.) and not to be diverted from the pursuits of that; but perhaps he did not find it so easy a thing as he imagined, to keep up his correspondence with wisdom, while he addicted himself so much to his pleasures. However, his will was good; he said, I will be wise. And that was not all, (2.) He resolved to spare no pains; (v. 25.) "I applied my heart, and my heart turned every way, I left no stone unturned, no means untried, to compass what I had in view. I set myself to know, and to search, and to seek out, wisdom, to accomplish myself in all useful learning, philosophy, and divinity." If he had not thus closely applied himself to study, it had been but a jest.
for him to say, I will be wise; for those that will attain the end must take the right way. Solomon was a man much given to quickness, and yet, instead of using that (with many) as an excuse for slothfulness, he pressed it upon himself as an inducement to diligence, and the easier he found it to master a good notion, the more intent he would be that he might be master of the more good notions. Those that have the best parts should take the greatest pains, as those that have the largest stock should trade most. He applies it to his little ones, that not only to know what lay hid on the surface, but to search what lay hid out of the common view and road; nor did he search a little way, and then give it over, because he did not present find what he searched for, but he sought it out, went to the bottom of it; nor did he aim to know things only, but the reason of things, that he might give an account of them.

2. Yet his success was not answerable or satisfying; I said, I will be wise, but I am a far from me, I could not find out. After all, This only I know, that I know nothing, and the more I know, the more I see there is to be known, and the more sensible I am of my own ignorance. That which is far off, and exceeding deep, who can find it out? He means God himself, his counsels and his works; when he searched into these, he presently found himself puzzled and run astray; he could not order his speech by reason of darkness. It is higher than heaven, and deeper than hell. But he had taught, the more is nothing which we have to do which is not plain and easy; the word is nigh us; (Prov. viii. 9.) but there is a great deal which we would wish to know, which is far off, and exceeding deep, among the secret things which belong not to us. And, probably, it is a culpable ignorance and error that Solomon here laments, that his pleasures, and the many amusements of his court, had blinded his eyes, and cast a mist before them, so that he could not attain to true wisdom, as he designed.

II. He owns and laments the instances of his folly, in which he had exceeded, as, in wisdom, he came short. Here is,

1. His inquiry concerning the evil of sin. He applied his heart to know the wickedness of folly, even of foolishness and madness. Observe, (1.) The knowledge of sin is a difficult knowledge, and hard to be attained; Solomon took pains for it. Sin has many disguises with which it covers itself, as in innocence and sin, and it is very hard to strip it of these, and to see it in its true nature and colours. (2.) It is necessary to our repentance for sin, that we be acquainted with the evil of it, as it is necessary to the cure of a disease, to know its nature, causes, and malignity. St. Paul therefore valued the divine law, because it discovered sin to him, Rom. vii. 7. Solomon, who, in the days of his folly, had set his wits on work to invent pleasures, and sharpen them, and take advantage at it, now in the midst of seeing now that God had opened his eyes, is as industrious to find out the aggravations of sin, and so to put an edge upon his repentance. Ingenious sinners should be ingenious penitents, and wit and learning, among the other spoils of the strong man armed, should be divided by the Lord Jesus. (3.) It well becomes penitents to say the worst they can of sin, for the truth is, we can never speak ill enough of it. Solomon here, for sin, says, he that sinneth, and liveth, it is not by any means to be numbered. Of the sickness of sin; that is it which lays the greatest stress upon this inquiry, to know the wickedness of folly; by which perhaps he means his own iniquity, the sin of uncleanness, for that was commonly called folly in Israel, Gen. xxxix. 9. Or it may be taken there generally for all sin. Many extenuate their sins with this, They were folly; but Solomon sees wickedness in those follies; an offence to God, and a wrong to conscience; This is wickedness, Jer. iv. 18. Zech. v. 8. [2.] Of the folly of sin; for there is a wickedness in folly, so there is a folly in wickedness, even foolishness and madness. Wilful sinners are fools and madmen; they act contrary both to right reason and to their true interest.

2. The great fruit of this inquiry. (1.) He now discovered more than ever of the evil of that great sin which he himself had been guilty of, the loving of many strange women; (1 Kings xi.) this is that which he here most feelingly laments, and in very pathetic expressions. (2.) He found the remembrance of the sin very grievous. How oh heavy did it lie upon his conscience, what an agony was he in upon the thought of it; the wickedness, the foolishness, the madness, that he had been guilty of! I find it more bitter than death. As great a terror seized him, in reflection upon it, as if he had been under the arrest of death. Thus do they that have their sins set in order before them by a sound conviction, cry out against them; they are bitter as gall, nay, bitter as death, to all true penitents. Uncleanness is a sin that is, in its own nature, more paining than death itself. Death may be made honourable and comfortable, but uncleanness can be no other than shame and pain. Prov. v. 9, 11. [2.] He had found the temptation to the sin very dangerous, and that it was extremely difficult, and next to impossible, for those that ventured into the temptation to escape the sin, and for those that had fallen into the sin to recover themselves by repentance. The heart of the adulterous woman is snares and nets; she plays her game to ruin souls with as much art and subtlety as ever any fewer used to do in a small bird. The methods such sinners use are both deceiving and destroying as snares and nets are. The unwary souls are enticed into them by the bait of pleasure, which they greedily catch at, and promise themselves satisfaction in; but they are taken before they are aware, and taken irrecoverably. Her hands are as bands, with which, under colour of fond embraces, she holds these fast that she has seized; they are held in the cords of the own sin, and are not to be got out. Thus do they that live in uncleanness and lasciviousness, Rom. vi. 12. Lust gets strength by being gratified, and it is more prevalent. [3.] He reckoned it a great instance of God's favour to any man, if by his grace he has kept him from this sin; He that pleases God shall escape from her, shall be preserved either from being tempted to this sin, or from being overcome by the temptation. Those that are kept from this sin, must acknowledge it is God that keeps them, and not any strength or resolution of their own, must acknowledge it is God. St. Paul, as aationToken for you, the blessing of grace, sufficient for them, to arm them against this sin, must be careful to please God in every thing, by keeping his ordinances, Lev. xviii. 30. [4.] He reckoned it a sin, that is, as sore a punishment of other sins as a man can fall under in this life: The sinner shall be taken by her. First, Those that allow themselves in other sins, by which their minds are blinded, and their consciences debauched, are the more easily drawn to this. Secondly, It is just with God to leave those who fall into it. See Rom. i. 26, 28. Eph. iv. 18, 19. Thus does Solomon, as it were, with horror, bless himself from the sin in which he had plunged himself.

(2.) He now discovered more than ever of the general corruption of man's nature. He runs up that stream to the fountain, as his father had done before him, on a like occasion; (Ps. lxi. 5.) Behold, I was shapen in iniquity.
Ecclesiastes, 12, 8.

He endeavoured to find out the number of his actual transgressions; (v. 27.) "Behold, this I have found, I thought I could have understood my errors, and have brought in a complete list, at least, of the heads of them; I thought I could have counted them one by one, and have found out the account." He desired to find them out as a penitent, that he might the more particularly acknowledge them; and, generally, the more particular we are in the sense of our sins, the more comfort we have in the sense of the pardon; he desired it also, as a preacher, that he might the more particularly give warning to others. Note, A sound conviction of one sin will put us upon inquiring into the whole confederacy; and the more we see amiss in ourselves, the more diligently we should inquire further into our own faults, that what we see not may be discovered to us, Job xxxix. 32.

[2.] He soon found himself at home, and perceived that they were innumerable; (v. 28.) "which yet my soul seeks, I am still counting, and still desirous to find out the account, but I find not, I cannot count them all, nor find out the account of them to perfection. I still make new and amazing discoveries of the desperate wickedness that there is in my own heart," Jer. viii. 19, 10. Who can know it? Who can understand his errors? Who can tell how often he offendeth? Ps. xix. 12. He finds that if God enters into judgment with him, and accounts his actions, he is not able to answer for one of a thousand, Job ix. 3. This he illustrates, by comparing the corruption of his own heart and life with the corruption of the world, where he scarcely found one good man among a thousand, nay, among all the thousand wives and concubines which he had, he did not find one good woman; "Even so," says he, "when I come to recollect and review my own thoughts, words, and actions, and all the complexions of my character, perhaps among those that were many I might find one good among a thousand, and that was all, the rest even of these had some corruption or other in them." He found (v. 20.) that he had sinned even in doing good; but for those that were effeminate, that pissed in the indulgence of his pleasures, they were all naught; in that part of his life there did not appear so much as one of a thousand good. In our hearts and lives there appear good acts, and good intentions; but all is not well. Doubtless, this is not intended as a censure of the female sex in general; it is probable that there have been, and are, more good women than good men; (Acts xvii. 4, 12.) he merely alludes to his own sad experience; and perhaps there may be this further in it, he does, in his proverbs, warn us against the snares both of the evil man and of the strange woman, Prov. ii. 12, 16. v. 14. v. 3. Now he had observed the ways and works of the evil man, and seen to be more deceitful and dangerous than those of the evil men, that it was more difficult to discover their frauds and elude their snares; and therefore he compares sin to an adulteress, (Prov. ix. 13.) and perceives he can no more find out the deceitfulness of his own heart than he can that of a strange woman, whose ways are moveable; that thou canst not know them.

[3.] He therefore runs up all the streams of actual transgression to the fountain of original corruption, and the degeneracy from his primitive rectitude; (v. 29.) "Lo, this only have I found; when I could not find out the particulars, yet the gross account was manifest enough; it is as clear as the sun, that man is corrupt and revolted, and is not as he was made." Observe, First, How man was made by the wisdom and goodness of God; God made man upright; Adam the first man, so the Chaldee. God made him and he made him upright, such a one as he should be; being made a rational creature, he was, in all respects, such a one as a rational creature should be, upright, without any irregularity, one could find no fault in him; he was upright, determined to God only, in opposition to the many inventions which he afterwards turned aside to. Man, as he came out of God's hands, was (as we may say) a little picture of his Maker, upright, good and upright.

Secondly, How he was marred, and, in effect, unmade, by his own folly and badness; They have sought out many inventions; they, our first parents, or the whole race, all in general, and every one in particular. They have sought out great inventions, so some; inventions to become great as gods, Gen. iii. 5. Or, the inventions of the great ones, so some; of the angels that fell, the Magnifies, Or, many inventions. Man, instead of resting in what God had found for him, was for seeking to mend himself, like the prodigal that left his father's house, to seek his fortune. Instead of being for one, he was for many; instead of being for God's institutions, he was for his own inventions. The law of his creation would not hold him, but he would be at his own disposal, and follow his own sentiments and inclinations. Yain man would be wise, wiser than his Maker; is giddy and unsettled in his pursuits, and therefore has many inventions. That he forsakes God, wanders endlessly. Men's actual transgressions are multiplied. Solomon could not find out how many they are; (v. 28.) but he found they were very many. Many kinds of sins, and those often repeated; they are more than the hairs on our heads, Ps. xi. 12.

Chap. VIII.

Solomon, in this chapter, comes to recommend wisdom to us, as the most powerful anludate against both the temptations and vexations that arise from the vanities of the world. Here is, 1. The benefit and praise of wisdom, v. 1-7. Some particular instances of wisdom prescried to us. 1. We must keep in due subjection to the government God has set over us, v. 2. 2. We must get ready for sudden evils, and especially for sudden death, v. 6. 3. We must arm ourselves against the temptations of the wicked, v. 7. 4. We shall think it strange, v. 9, 10. The impuunity of oppressors makes them more daring, (v. 11.) but in the issue it will be well with the righteous and ill with the wicked; (v. 18, 19.) and therefore the present prosperity of the wicked and afflictions of the righteous ought not to be a stumbling-block to us, v. 14. 4. We must cheerfully use the gifts of God's providence, v. 15. We must with an entire satisfaction acquiesce in the will of God, and, not pretending to find the bottom, we must humbly and silently adore the depth of his unsearchable counsels, being assured they are all wise, just, and good, v. 16, 17.

1. Who is as the wise man? and who knoweth the interpretation of a thing? a man's wisdom maketh his face to shine, and the boldness of his face shall be changed. 2. I counsel thee to keep the king's commandment, and that in regard of the oath of God. 3. Be not hasty to go out of his sight: stand not in an evil thing; for he doeth whatsoever pleaseth him. 4. Where the word of a king is, there is power; and who may say unto him, What doest thou? 5. Whoso keepeth the commandment shall feel no evil thing; and a wise man's heart discerneth both time and judgment.

Here is,

1. An encomium of wisdom, (v. 1.) that is, of true piety, guided in all its exercises by prudence and discretion. The wise man is the good man, that knows God, and glorifies him, knows himself, and does well for himself; his wisdom is a great happiness to him; for,

1. It advances him above his neighbours, and makes him more excellent than they; Who is as the wise man? Not, Heavenly wisdom will make a man an incomparable man. No man without grace, though he be learned, or noble, or rich, is to be compared with a man that has true grace, and is therefore accepted of God.

2. It makes him useful among his neighbours, and very serviceable to them; Who but the wise man knows the interpretation of a thing, understands the times and the events of them, and their critical junctures, so as to direct what Israel ought to do? 1 Chron. xii. 32.

It makes him a joy in the eyes of his friends; it makes his face to shine, as Moses's did when he came down from the mount; it puts honour upon a man, and a lustre on his whole conversation, makes him to be regarded and taken notice of, and gains him respect; (as Job xxix. 7, &c.) it makes him lovely and amiable, and the darling and blessing of his country; The strength of his face, the sorrness and severity of his countenance, (so some understand, and make this clause, should be changed by it into that which is here so much obliged. Even whose natural temper is rough and morose, by wisdom are strangely altered, they become mild and gentle, and learn to look pleasant.

3. It imbolds a man against his adversaries, their attempts, and their scorn; The boldness of his face shall be doubled by wisdom; it will add very much to his courage in maintaining his integrity, when he not only has an honest cause to plead, but by wisdom knows how to urge it, and where to find the interpretation of a thing. He shall not be ashamed, but shall speak with his enemy in the gate.

II. A particular instance of wisdom pressed upon us, and that is, subjection to authority, and a dutiful and peaceable perseverance in our allegiance to the government which Providence has set over us. Observe,

How the duty of subjects is here described:

1. We must be observant of the laws. In all those things wherein the civil power is to interpose, whether legislative or judicial, we ought to submit to its order and constitutions; I counsel thee; it may as well be supplied, I charge thee, not only as a prince but as a preacher: he might do both; "I recommend it to thee as a piece of wisdom; I say, whatever those say that are given to change, keep the king's commandments; whoever the sovereign power is lodged, be subject to it. Observe the mouth of a king," (so the phrase is,) "say as he says, do as he bids thee; let his word be a law, or rather let the law be his word." Some understand the following clause as a limitation of this obedience; "Keep the king's commandments, yet so as to have a regard to the oath of God, so as to keep a good conscience, and not to violate thy obligations to God, which are prior and superior to thine obligations to the king;" but that is only near the edge that are Caesar's, but so as to reserve pure and entire to God the things that are his.

2. We must not be forward to find fault with the public administration, or quarrel with every thing that is not just according to our mind, nor quit our post of service under the government, and throw it up, upon every discontent; (v. 3.) "Be not hasty to go out of his sight, when he is displeased at this; (ch. x. 4.) or when thou art displeased with him; fly not off in a passion, nor entertain such jealousies of him as will tempt thee to renounce the court, or forsake the kingdom." Solomon's subjects, as soon as his head was laid low, went directly contrary to this rule, when, upon the rough answer which Rehoboam gave them, they were hasty to go out of his sight, would not take time for second thoughts, nor admit proposals of accommodation, but cried, To your tents, O Israel. "There may perhaps be a just cause for to go out of his sight; but be not hasty to do it, act with great deliberation.

3. We must not presume to try to show what is wrong, for it is shown us; "Stand not in an evil thing; in any offence thou hast given to thy prince, humble thyself, and do not justify thyself, for that will make the offence much more offensive. In any ill design thou hast, upon some discontent, conceived against thy prince, do not proceed in it; but if thou hast done foolishly in lifting up thyself, or hast thought evil, lay thy hand upon thy mouth." Prov. xxx. 32. We shall find, The wise man doth not argue into an evil thing, yet we must not stand in it, but recede from it as soon as it appears to us to be evil.

4. We must prudently accommodate ourselves to our opportunities, both for our own relief, if we think ourselves wronged, and for the redress of public grievances; A wise man's heart discerns both time and judgment; (v. 3.) it is the wisdom of subjects, in applying themselves to their prince, to consider both at what season, and in what manner, they may do it best and most effectually, to pacify his anger, obtain his favour, or obtain the revocation of any grievous measure prescribed. Either, in dealing with Ahasesurus, took a deal of pains to discern both time and judgment, and it sped accordingly. This may be taken as a general rule of wisdom, that every thing should be well timed; and our enterprises are then likely to succeed, when we embrace the exact opportunity for the man's prosperity.

2. What arguments are here used to engage us to be subject to the higher powers; they are much the same with those which St. Paul uses, Rom. xiii. 1, &c.

(1) We must needs be subject, for conscience-sake, and that is the most powerful principle of subject; we must be subject because of the oath of God, the oath of allegiance, which we have taken to be faithful to their master, to their king, and to the people as the king and the people, 2 Chron. xxiii. 16. David made a covenant, or contract, with the elders of Israel, though he was king by divine designation, 1 Chron. xi. 3. "Keep the king's commandments, for he has sworn to rule thee in the fear of God, and thou hast sworn, in that fear, to be faithful to him." It is called the oath of God, because he is a Witness to it, and will avenge the violation of it.

(2) For wrath's sake; because of the sword which the prince bears, and the power he is intrusted with, which make him very formidable; He does whatsoever pleases him; he has a great authority, and a great ability to support that authority; (v. 4.) Where the word of a king is, giving orders to seize a man, there is power; there are many that will execute his orders, which makes the wrath of a king, or supreme government, like the roaring of a lion, and like messengers of death. Who may safely face him, What dread thou! He that contemplates him, does it at his peril. Kings will not bear to have their orders disputed, but expect they should be obeyed. In short, it is dangerous contending with sovereignty, and what many have repented. A subject is an unequall match for a prince. He may command me, who has legs at command.

(3) For the sake of our own comfort; Whoso keeps the commandment, and lives a quiet and peaceful life, shall feel no evil thing; to which both of the apostle answers, (Rom. xiii. 3.) Will thou not then be afraid of the power of the king? Do that which is good, as becomes a dutiful and loyal subject, and knowledge, ordinarily, have praise of the same. He that does no ill, shall feel no ill, and needs fear none.

6. Because to every purpose there is time and judgment; therefore the misery of man is great upon him. 7. For he knoweth not that which shall be: for who can tell him when it shall be? 8. There is no man that hath power over the spirit, to retain the spirit; neither hath he power in the day of death; and there is no discharge in that war; neither shall wickedness deliver those that are given to it.

Solomon had said, (v. 5.) that a wise man’s heart discerns time and judgment; a man’s wisdom will go a great way, by the blessing of God, in moral prognostications; but here he shows that few have that wisdom, and that even the wisest may be surprised by a calamity which they had not any foresight of, and therefore it is our wisdom to expect, and prepare for, sudden changes. Observe,

1. All the events concerning us, with the exact time of them, are determined and appointed in the counsel and foreknowledge of God, and all in wisdom; To every purpose there is a time prefixed, and it is the best time, for it is time and judgment, time appointed both in wisdom and righteousness; the appointment is not chargeable with folly or iniquity.

2. We are very much in the dark concerning future events, and the time and season of them; Man knoweth not that which shall be himself, and who can tell him when or how it shall be? v. 7. It cannot either be foreseen by him, or foretold to him; the stars cannot foretell a man what shall be, nor any of the arts of divination; God has, in wisdom, concealed from us the knowledge of future events, that we may be always ready for changes.

3. It is our great unhappiness and misery, that, because we cannot foresee an evil, we know not how to avoid it, or guard against it, and, because we are not aware of the proper successful season of actions, therefore we lose our opportunities, and miss our way; Because to every purpose there is but one way, one method, one proper opportunity, therefore the misery of man is great upon him; because it is hard to hit that, and it is a thousand to one but he misses it. Most of the miseries men labour under had been prevented, if they could have been foreseen, and the happy time discovered to avoid them. Men are miserable, because they are not sufficiently sagacious and attentive.

4. Whatever other evils may be avoided, we are all under a fatal necessity of dying, v. 8. (1.) When the soul is required, it must be resigned, and whatsoever purpose to dispute it, either by arms or arguments, ourselves, or by any friend; There is no man that has power over his own spirit to retain it, when it is summoned to return to God who gave it. It cannot fly any where out of the jurisdiction of death, nor find any place where its rights do not run. It cannot abscond so as to escape death’s eye, though it is hid from the eyes of all living. A man has no power to adjourn the day of his death, nor can he by prayers or breathes, nor by no bulwark be taken, no es.......* protection, or impudence, f allowed. We have not power over the spirit of a friend, to retain that; the prince, with all his authority, cannot prolong the life of the most valuable of his subjects, nor the physician with his * Excuse - Ed. 1 Respite.—Ed. force, nor the orator, with his eloquence, nor the best saint, with his intercessions. The stroke of death can by no means be put by, when our days are determined, and the hour appointed us is come.

(2.) Death is an enemy that we must all enter the lists with, sooner or later; There is no discharge in that war, no dismission from it, either of the men of business, or of the faint-hearted, as there was among the Jews, Deut. xx. 5. 8. While we live, we are struggling with death, and we shall never put off the harness till we put off the body, never till the discharge till death has obtained the mastery; the youngest is not released as a fresh-water soldier, nor the oldest as miles emeritus—a soldier whose merits have entitled him to a discharge. Death is a battle that must be fought; There is no sending to that war, so some read it; no substituting another to muster for us, no champion admitted to fight for us; we must ourselves engage, and are concerned to provide accordingly, as for a battle.

3. Men’s wickedness, by which they often evade or outface the justice of the prince, cannot secure them from the after effects of death, nor can the most obstinate sinner harden his heart against those terrors. Though he strengthen himself ever so much in his wickedness, (Ps. lii. 7.) death will be too strong for him; the most subtle wickedness cannot outwit death, nor the most impudent wickedness outlive death. Nay, the wickedness which men give themselves to, will be so far from delivering them from death, that it will deliver them up to death.

9. All this I have seen, and applied my heart unto every work that is done under the sun: there is a time wherein one man ruleth over another to his own hurt. 10. And so I saw the wicked buried, who had come and gone from the place of the holy, and they were forgotten in the city where they had so done. This is also vanity. 11. Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil. 12. Though a sinner do evil a hundred times, and his days be prolonged, yet surely I know that it shall be well with them that fear God, which fear before him: 13. But it shall not be well with the wicked, neither shall he prolong his days, which are as a shadow; because he feareth not before God.

Solomon, in the beginning of the chapter, had warned us against having any thing to do with sedition subjects; here, in these verses, he encourages us, in reference to the mischief of tyrannical and oppressive power, such as he had complained of before, ch. iii. 16.—iv. 1.

1. He had observed many such rulers, v. 9. In the serious views and reviews he had taken of the children of men and their state, he had observed that many a time one man rules over another to his hurt; that is, (1.) To the hurt of the ruled, many understand it so; whereas they ought to be God’s ministers unto their subjects for their good, (Rem. xi. 4.) to administer justice, and to preserve the public peace and order. this judge should employ their power for their hurt, to invade their property, encroach upon their liberty, and patronize the acts of injustice. It is sad with a people, when these that should protect their religion and rights aim at the destruction of both. (2.) To the hurt of the rulers, so we renede-11, to their own hurt, to the feeding of their pride and covetousness, the gratifying of their passion and revenge, and so, to the filling up of the measure of their sins, and the hastening and aggravating of their ruin.

Agno agenda reputatis—What hurt men do to others, will return, in the end, to their own hurt.

2. He had observed them to prosper and flourish in the abuse of their power; (v. 10.) I saw those wicked rulers come and go from the place of the Holy One, being acquitted, and return in peace from the place of judicature, (which is called the place of the Holy One, because the judgment is the Lord's, (Deut. i. 17.) and he judges among the gods, (Ps. lxxii. 1.) and is with them in the judgment, (2 Chron. xix. 6.) and they continued all their days in office, never reckoned with for their mal-administration, but died in honour, and were buried magnificently; their commissions were durams vitae—during life, and not quasi ad suum finem, during good behaviour; and they were forgotten in the city where they had so done; their wicked practices were not remembered against them to their reproach and infamy when they were gone. Or rather, it denotes the vanity of their dignity and power, for that is his remark upon it in the close of the verse; This is also vanity. They are proud of their wealth, and power, and honour, because they sit in the place of gods. (Job xii. 20.) Man is in the dust; (1.) Their bodies from being buried in the dust; I saw them laid in the grave; and their pomp, though it attended them thither, could not descend after them, Ps. xlix. 17. (2.) Nor their names from being buried in oblivion; for they were forgotten, as if they had never been.

3. He had observed that their prosperity hardened them in their wickedness, v. 11. It is true of all sorts in general, an unfeigned, unexampled hardness of wicked rulers, that, because sentence against their evil works is not executed speedily, they think it will never be executed, and therefore they set the law at defiance, and their hearts are full in them to do evil; they venture to do so much the more mischief, fetch a greater compass in their wicked designs, and are secure and fearless in it, and commit iniquity with a high hand. Observe, (1.) Sentence is past against evil works, and evil workers, by the righteous Judge of heaven against the evil works of princes and great men, as well as of inferior persons. (2.) The execution of this sentence is often delayed a great while, and the sinner goes on, not only unpunished, but prosperous and successful. (3.) Impunity hardens sinners in impiety, and the patience of God is shamefully abused by many, who, instead of being led by it to repentance, are confirmed by it in their imperenity. (4.) Sinners herein do have themselves, for though the sentence be not executed speedily, it will be executed the more severely, at last. Vengeance comes slowly, but it comes surely; and wrath is in the mean time treasured up against the day of wrath.

4. He foresaw such an end of all these things as would be sufficient to keep us from quarrelling with the Divine Providence upon account of them. He supposes a wicked ruler to do an unjust thing a hundred times, and that yet his punishment is deferred, and God's patience toward him is prolonged, much beyond what was expected, and the days of his power are lengthened out, so that he continues to oppress; yet he intimates that he should not be discouraged.

(1.) God's people are certainly a happy people, though they be oppressed; It shall be well with them for God, I say, with all them, and them only, which fear before him. Note, (1.) It is the character of God's people that they fear God, have an awe of him upon their hearts, and make conscience of their duty to him; and this, because they see his eye always upon them, and they know it is their concern to approve themselves to him. When they be at the mercy of proud oppressors, they fear God more than they fear them. They do not quarrel with the providence of God, but submit to it. (2.) It is the happiness of all that fear God, that in the worst of times it shall be well with them; their happiness in God's favour cannot be prejudiced, nor their communion with God interrupted, by their troubles, if they are in a good case, for they are kept in a good frame under their troubles, and in the end they shall have a blessed deliverance from, and an abundant recompense for, their troubles. And therefore surely I know, I know it by the promise of God, and the experience of all the saints, that, however it goes with others, it shall go well with them. All is well that ends well.

(2.) Wicked people are certainly a miserable people, though they prosper, and prevail, for a time, the curse is as sure to them as the blessing is to the righteous; It shall not be well with the wicked, as others think it is, who judge by outward appearance, and as they themselves expect it will be; nay, we to the wicked, it shall be ill with them; (Isa. iii. 10, 11.) they shall be reckoned with for all the ill they have done; nothing that befalls them shall be really well for them. Nihil potest ad males pervenire quod prostitit, into nihil quod non necat—No event can accrue to the wicked which will do them good, rather, no event which will not hurt them. Seneca. Note, (1.) The wicked man's days are as a shadow, not only uncertain and declining, as all men's days are, but altogether unpromising. A good man's days have some substance in them; he lives to a good purpose; a wicked man's days are all as a shadow, empty and worthless. (2.) These days shall not be prolonged to what he promised himself; he shall not live out half his days, Ps. lv. 23. Though they may be prolonged, (v. 12.) beyond what others expected, yet his day shall come to fall. He shall fall short of everlasting life, and then his long life on earth will be worth little. (3.) God's great quarell with wicked people is for their not fearing before him; that is at the bottom of their wickedness, and cuts them off from all happiness.

14. There is a vanity which is done upon the earth; that there be just men, unto whom it happeneth according to the work of the wicked: again, there be wicked men, to whom it happeneth according to the work of the righteous. I said, that this also is vanity. 15. Then I commended mirth, because a man hath no better thing under the sun, than to eat, and to drink, and to be merry; for that shall abide with him of his labour the days of his life, which God giveth him under the sun. 16. When I applied my heart to know wisdom, and to see the business that is done upon the earth: (for also there is that neither day nor night seeth sleep with his eyes:) 17. Then I beheld all the work of God, that a man cannot find out the work that is done under the sun; because though a man labour to seek it out, yet he shall not find it; yea, further, though a wise man think to know it, yet shall he not be able to find it.

Wise and good men have, of old, been perplexed with this difficulty, how the prosperity of the wicked and the troubles of the righteous can be reconciled with the holiness and goodness of the God that governs the world; concerning this, Solomon here gives us his advice.

1. He would not have us to be surprised at it, as though some strange thing happened, for he himself saw it in his days, v. 14. (1.) He saw just men, to whom it happened according to the work of the wicked, who, notwithstanding their righteousness, suffered very hard things, and continued long to do so, and to be punished for some great wickedness. (2.) He saw wicked men, to whom it happened according to the work of the righteous, who prospered as remarkably as if they had been rewarded for some good deed, and that from themselves, God, from men. We see the just troubled and perplexed in their own minds, the wicked easy, fearless, and secure; the just crossed and afflicted by the Divine Providence, the wicked prosperous, successful, and smiled upon; the just censured, reproached, and run down, by the higher powers, the wicked applauded and preferred.

2. He would have us to take occasion hence, not to charge God with iniquity, but to charge the world with vanity. No fault is to be found with God; but as to the world, This is vanity upon the earth, and again, This is also vanity, it is a certain evidence that the things of this world are not the best things, nor were ever designed to make a portion and happiness for us, if they had. God only would have not allotted so much of this world’s wealth to his worst enemies, and so much of its troubles to his best friends; there must therefore be another life after this, the joys and griefs of which must be real and substantial, and able to make men truly happy or truly miserable, for this world does neither.

3. He would have us not to fret and perplex ourselves about it, or make ourselves uneasy, but cheerfully to enjoy what God has given us in this world, to be content with it, and make the best of it, though it be much better with others, and such as we think very unworthy; (v. 15.) Then I commended joy, a holy security and serenity of mind, arising from a confidence in God, and his power, providence, and promise, because a man has no better thing under the sun (though a good man has much better things above the sun) than to eat and drink, that is, soberly and thankfully to make use of the things of this life according as his rank is, and to use them as he can or will, that is, to dwell with him of his labour, that is all the fruit he has for himself of the pains that he takes in the business of the world; let him therefore take it, and much good may it do him; and let him not deny himself that, out of a peevish discontent, because the world does not go as he would have it; That shall abide with him during the days of his life which God gives him under the sun. Our present life is a life under the sun, but the life of the world above is the life of the world to come, which will commence and continue when the sun shall be turned into darkness, and shine no more. This present life must be reckoned by days; this life is given us, and the days of it allotted to us, by the counsel of God, and therefore, while it does last, we must accommodate ourselves to the will of God, and study to answer the ends of life.

4. He would not have us undertake to give a reason for, or why this is so, for his way is in the sea, and his path in the great waters, past finding out, and therefore we must be contented and piously ignorant of the meaning of God’s proceedings in the government of the world, v. 16, 17. Here he shows,

(1.) That both he himself and many others had very closely studied the point, and searched far into the reasons of the prosperity of the wicked and the afflictions of the righteous; he, for his part, had applied his heart to know this wisdom, and to see the business that is done, by the Divine Providence, upon the earth, to find out if there were any certain scheme, any constant rule or method, by which the affairs of this lower world were administered, any course of government as sure and steady as the course of nature, so that by what is done now we might as certainly foretell what will be done next, as by the moon’s changing now we can foretell when it will be at the full; this he would fain have found out. Of this sort had likewise set themselves to make this inquiry with so close an application, that they could not find time for sleep, either day or night, nor find in their hearts to sleep, so full of anxiety were they about these things. Some think Solomon speaks of himself, that he was so eager in prosecuting this great inquiry, that he could not sleep for thinking of it.

(2.) That it was all labour in vain, v. 17. When we look upon all the works of God, and his providence, and compare one part with another, we cannot find that there is any such certain method by which the work that is done under the sun is directed; we cannot discover any key by which to decypher the character, nor, by consulting precedents, can we know the practice of this court, nor what the judgment will be. [1.] Though a man be ever so industrious, though he labour to seek it out; [2.] Though he be ever so ingenious, though he be a wise man; and, [3.] Solomon, and can fathom the counsels of kings themselves, and trace them by their footsteps; nay, [3.] Though he be very confident of success, though he think to know it, yet he shall not, he cannot, find it out. God’s ways are above ours, nor is he tied to his own former ways, but his judgments are a great deep.

CHAP. IX.

Solomon, in this chapter, for a further proof of the vanity of this world, gives us four observations which he had made upon a survey of the state of the children of men in it. 1. He observed, that, commonly, as to outward things, good and bad men fare much alike, v. 1, 3, 11. That death puts a final period to all our employments and enjoyments in this world, (v. 4, 6) whence he infers that it is our wisdom to enjoy the comforts of life, and mind the business of life, while it lasts, v. 7, 10. III. That the world’s providence often crosses the fairest and most hopeful probabilities of men’s endeavours, and great calamities often surprise men ere they are aware, v. 11, 12, 14. That wisdom often makes men very useful, and yet gains them little respect, and that persons of great merit are slighted, v. 12, 13. And what is there then in this world, that should make us fond of it?

1. For all this I considered in my heart, even to declare all this, that the righteous, and the wise and their works, are in the hand of God: no man knoweth either love or hatred by all that is before them. 2. All things come alike to all: there is one event to the righteous and to the wicked; to the good, and to the clean, and to the unclean; to him that sacrificeth, and to him that sacrificeth not: as is the good, so is the sinner; and he that sweareth, as he that feareth an oath. 3. This is an evil among all things that are done under the sun, that there is one event unto all: yea also, the heart of the sons of men is full of evil, and madness is in their heart while they live, and after that they go to the dead.

It has been observed concerning those who have pretended to search for the philosopher’s stone, that though they could never find what they sought for, yet in the search they have hit upon many other useful discoveries and experiments. Thus Solomon, when, in the close of the foregoing chapter, he affi-tied his heart to know the work of God, and took a great deal of pains to search into it, though he expected of finding it out, yet he found out that which abundantly recompensed him for the search, gave him some satisfaction, which he here gives us; for therefore he considered all this in his heart, and weighed it deliberately, that he might declare it the good of others. Note, What we are to declare we should first consider, think twice before we speak once; and what we have considered we should then declare; I believed, therefore have I spoken.

The great difficulty which Solomon met with in studying the book of providence, was, the little difference that is made between good men and bad, in the distribution of comforts and crosses, and the disappearance of events: this has perplexed the minds of many wise and contemplative men; Solomon discourses of it in these verses, and though he does not undertake to find out this work of God, yet he says that which may prevent its being a stumbling-block to us.

1. Before he describes the temptation in its strength, he lays down a great and unquestionable truth, which he resolves to adhere to, and which, if it should be necessary, shall be sufficient to break the force of the temptation. This has been the way of God's people in grappling with this difficulty. Job, before he discourses of this matter, lays down the doctrine of God's omniscience, (Job xxiv. 1.) Jeremiah the doctrine of his righteousness, (Jer. xii. 1.)
another prophet that of his holiness, (Hab. 1. 13.)
the psalmist that of his goodness and peculiar favour to his own people; (Ps. lxxiii. 1.) and that is it which Solomon here fastens upon, and resolves to abide by,
that though good and evil seem to be dissimilar, and promiscuously, yet God has a particular care of and concern for, his own people; The righteous and the wise, and their works, are in the hand of God, under his special protection and guidance; all their affairs are managed by him for their good; all their wise and righteous actions are in his hand, to be recompensed in the other world, though not in this.
They seem as if they were given up into the hand of good and evil. This is not an instance against them, but what is given them from above; the events that affect them do not come to pass by chance, but all according to the will and counsel of God, which will turn that to be for them which seemed to be most against them. Let this make us easy, whatever happens, that all God's saints are in his hand, Deut. xxxiii. 3. John x. 29. Psalms xxxii. 11.

2. He lays this down for a rule, That the love and hatred of God are not to be measured and judged of by men's outward condition. If prosperity were a certain sign of God's love, and affliction of his hatred, then it might justly be an offence to us to see the wicked and godly fare alike. But the matter is not so; No man knows either love, or hated, by all that is before them in this world, by those things that are the objects of sense. These we may judge by those who are suffered; if we love God with all our heart, thereby we may judge of that he loves us; as we may know likewise that we are under his wrath, if we be governed by that car nul mind which is enmity to him; these will be known by that which shall be hereafter, by men's everlasting state; it is certain that men are happy or miserable, according as they are under the love or hated of God, but not according as they are under the smiles or frowns of the world, and therefore if God loves a righteous man, (as certainly he does,) he is happy, though the world frown upon him; and if he hate a wicked man, (as certainly he does,) he is miserable though the world smile upon him; then is the offence of this promiscuous distribution of events ceased.

3. Having laid down these principles, he acknowledges that all things come alike to all; so it has been formerly, and therefore we are not to think it strange, if it be so now, if it be so with us and our families. Some make this, and all that follows to
v. 13. to be the perverse reasonings of the atheists against the notion of God's providence; but I rather take it to be Solomon's concession, which he might the more freely make, when he had fixed those truths which are sufficient to guard against any ill use that may be made of what he grants.
Observe here, v. 2.

(1.) The great difference that there is between the characters of the righteous and the wicked, which, in several instances, are set the one over against the other, to show that though all things come alike to all, yet that does not in the least confound the eternal distinction between moral good and evil, but that remains immutable. [1.] The righteous are clean, have clean hands and pure hearts;
the wicked are unclean, under the dominion of unclean lusts, pure perhaps in their own eyes, but not cleansed from their filthiness. God will certainly put a difference between the clean and the unclean, the precious and the vile, in the other world, though he does not seem to do so in this.

(2.) The righteous sacrifice, they make conscious of worshipping God according to his will, both with inward and outward worship; the wicked sacrifice not, they live in the neglect of God's worship, and grudge to part with any thing for his honour. What is the Almighty, that they should serve him? [3.]
The righteous are good, good in God's sight, they do good in the world; the wicked are sinners, viclating the laws of God and man, and provoking to both. [4.] The wicked man swears, has a veneration for the name of God, but profanes it by swearing rashly and falsely; but the righteous man fears on oath, swears not, is sworn, and then with great reverence; he fears to take an oath, because it is a solemn appeal to God as a Witness and Judge; he fears, when he has taken an oath, to break it, because God is righteous, who takes vengence.

(2.) The little difference there is between the conditions of the righteous and the wicked in this world; There is one event to both. Is David rich?
So is Nabal. Is Joseph favoured by his prince? So is Haman. Is Ahab killed in a battle? So is Josiah. Are the bad figs carried to Babylon? So are the good, Jer. xxiv. 1. There is a vast difference between the original, the design, and the nature; of the same event to the one and to the other; the effects and issues of them are likewise vastly different; the same providence to the one is a favour of life unto life, to the other, of death unto death, though, to outward appearance, it is the same.

4. He owns this to be a very great grievance to those that are wise and good; This is an evil, the greatest perplexity, among all things that are done under the sun; (v. 3.) nothing has given me more disturbance than this, that there is one event unto all, that all men are alike affected and governed by evil-doers; for therefore is it that the hearts of the sons of men are full of evil, and fully set in them to do evil, ch. viii. 11. When they see that there is one event to the righteous and the wicked, they wickedly infer thence, that it is all one to God whether they are righteous or wicked, and therefore they stick at nothing to gratify their lusts.

5. For the further clearing of this great difficulty, as he began this discourse with the doctrine of the

ECCLESIASTES, IX. 827
happiness of the righteous, (whatever they may suf- fer, they and their works are in the hands of God, and therefore in good hands, they could not be in better,) so he concludes with the doctrine of the misery of the wicked; however they may prosper, madness is in their heart while they live, and after that they go to the dead. Envy not the prosperity of evil-doers, for, (1.) They are now madmen, and all the delights they seem to be blessed with are but like the pleasant dreams and fancies of a distracted man. They are mad upon their idols, (Jer. 1. 38.) and mad against God's people. Acts xxvi. 11. When the prodigal repented, it is said, He came to himself, (Luke xv. 17,) which intimates that he had been be- side himself before. (2.) They will shortly be de- ad men. They make a mighty noise and bustle while they live, but after awhile they go to the dead, and there is an end of all their pomp and power; they will then be reckoned with for all their madness and outrage in sin. Though, on this side death, the righ- teous and the wicked seem alike, on the other side death there will be a vast difference between them.

4. For to him that is joined to all the liv- ing there is hope: for a living dog is better than a dead lion. 5. For the living know that they shall die: but the dead know not any thing, neither have they any more a re- ward; for the memory of them is forgotten. 6. Also their love and their hatred, and their envy, is now perished; neither have they any more a portion for ever in any thing that is done under the sun. 7. Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart; for God now accepteth thy works. 8. Let thy garments be alway white; and let thy head lack no ointment. 9. Live joyfully with the wife whom thou lovest all the days of the life of thy vanity, which he hath given thee under the sun, all the days of thy vanity: for that is thy por- tion in this life, and in thy labour which thou takest under the sun. 10. Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave whither thou goest.

Solomon, in a fret, had praised the dead more than the living; (ch. iv. 2.) but here, considering the ad- vantages of life to prepare for death, and make sure the hope of a better life, he seems to be of another mind.

I. He shows the advantages which the living have above those that are dead, v. 4–6.

1. While there is life there is hope. Deum spiro, spero—While I breathe, I hope. It is the privilege of the living, that they are joined to the living, in relation, commerce, and conversation, and, while they are so, there is hope. If a man's condition be, upon any account, bad, there is hope it will be amened; if the heart be full of evil, and madness be in it, yet, while there is life, there is hope, that, by the grace of God, there may be a blessed change wrought; but after men go to the dead, (v. 3.) It is too late then: what is then frit, is then laid aside for ever filthy. If men be thrown aside as useless, yet, while they are joined to the living, there is hope that they may yet again take root, and bear fruit; he that is alive, is, or may be, good for something, but he that is dead, as to this world, is not capable of being any further serviceable; therefore a living dog is better than a dead lion, the meanest beggar alive has that comfort of this world, and does that service to it, which the greatest prince, when he is dead, is utterly incapable of.

2. While there is life, there is an opportunity of preparing for death; The living know that which the dead have no knowledge of, particularly they know that they shall die, and are, or may be, there- by influenced to prepare for that great change, which will come certainly, and may come suddenly. Note, The living cannot but know that they shall die, that they must ends die; they know they are under a sentence of death; they are necessarily affected in mo- tory by its messengers, and feel themselves declin- ing. This is a needful, useful, knowledge; for what is our business, while we live, but to get ready to die! The living know they shall die, it is a thing yet to come, and therefore provision may be made for it; the dead know they are dead, and it is too late, they are on the other side the great gulf fixed.

3. When life is gone, all this world is gone with it, as touts. (1.) There is an end of all our account- ance with this world, and the things of it; The dead know not any thing of that which, while they lived, they were intimately conversant with. It does not appear that they know any thing of what is done by those they leave behind. Abraham is ignorant of us; they are removed into darkness, Job x. 22. (2.) There is an end of all their enjoyments in this world; They have no more a reward for their toils about the world, but all they got must be left to others; they have a reward for their holy actions, but none for their worldly ones; the meats and the belly will be destroyed together, John vi. 27. 1 Cor. vi. 13. It is explained, v. 6. Neither have they any more a portion for ever; none of that which they imagined would be a portion for ever, of that which is done, and got under the sun. The things of this world will not be a portion for the soul, because they will not be a portion for ever; they that choose them, and have them for their good things, have only a por- tion in this life. Ps. xvii. 14. The world can only be an ammity for life, not a portion for ever. (3.) There is an end of their name; there are but few whose names survive them long, the grave is a land of forgetfulness, for the memory of them that are laid there, is soon forgotten; their place knows them no more, nor the lands they called by their own names. (4.) There is an end of their affections, their friendships, and enmities; Their love, and their hatred, and their envy, are now vanished; the good things they loved, the evil things they hated, the prosperity of others, which they envied, are now all at an end with them. Death parts those that loved one another, and puts an end to their friendship, and those that hated one another too, and puts an end to their quarrels. Actio moritur cum persona—The person and his actions die to- gether. There we shall be never better for the friends, their love can do us no kindness; nor ever the worse for the enemies, their hate will no more reach us, nor can we do us no damage. There the wicked cease from troubling. Those things which now so affect us, and fill us, which we are so concerned about, and so jealous of, will there be at an end.

II. Hence he infers that it is our wisdom to make the best use of life that we can, while it does last, and manage wisely what remains of it.

1. Let us reish the comforts of life while we live and cheerfully take our share of the enjoyments of it. Solomon himself was one of those who are ensnared by the abuse of sensitive delights, warns others of the dan- ger, not by a total prohibition of them, but by di- recting the sober and moderate use of them; we may use the world, but must not abuse it; take what is to be had out of it, and expect no more.
ing and melancholy, go thy way, like a fool as thou art, and get into a better temper of mind.

[1.] "Let thy spirit be easy and pleasant, then let there be joy and a merry heart within; a good heart, so the word is; which distinguishes this from carnal mirth and sensual pleasure, which are the evil of the heart, but this is purely spiritual. We must enjoy ourselves, we must enjoy our friends, enjoy our God, and be careful to keep a good conscience, that nothing may disturb us in these enjoyments. We must serve God with gladness, in the use of what he gives us, and be liberal in communicating it to others, and not suffer ourselves to be oppressed with inordinate care and grief about the world. We must eat our bread as Israelites, not in our mourning; (Deut. xxvi. 14.) as Christ, "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me because he hath anointed me;" Acts ii. 46. See Deut. xxviii. 47.

[2.] "Make use of the comforts and enjoyments which God has given thee; eat thy bread, drink thy wine, thine, not another's; not the bread of deceit, or the wine of violence, but that which is honestly got, else thou canst not eat it with any comfort, nor expect a blessing upon it; thy bread, and thy wine, such as are agreeable to thy place and station, not excelling what others have; now it is, 'Thou hast given thy angels charge over thee, the ends for which thou art intrusted with it, as being but a steward.'

[3.] 'Evidence thy cheerfulness; (v. 8.) Let thy garments be always white; observe a proportion in thine expenses; reduce not thy food, in order to gratify thy pride, nor thy clothing, in order to gratify thy voluptuousness. Be neat, wear clean linen, and be not slovenly. Or, 'Let thy garments be white, in token of joy and cheerfulness,' which were expressed by white raiment; (Rev. iii. 4.) "and, as a further token of joy, let thy head lack no ornament that is fit for it;" our Saviour admitted this piece of pleasure at a feast, (Matt. xxvi. 7.) and David observes it among the gifts of God's bounty to him, (Ps. xxiii. 5.) 'Thou anointest my head with oil.' Not that we must place our happiness in any of the delights of sense, or set our hearts upon them, but what God has given us we must make as comfortable a use of as we can afford, under the fear of the Lord, the impression of conscience, and the contempt of world, and not for getting the poor.

[4.] "Make thyself agreeable to thy relations; I've joyfully with the wife whom thou lovest; do not engross thy delights, making much of thyself only, and not caring what becomes of those about thee, but let them share with thee, and make them easy too. Have a wife; for even in paradise it was not good for man to be alone. Keep to thy wife, to one, and do not multiply wives; (Solomon had found the mischief of that;) "keep to her only, and have nothing to do with any other." How can a man live joyfully with one with whom he does not live honestly? 'Love thy wife; and the wife whom thou lovest wilt be likely to live joyfully with.' When we do the duty of relations, we may expect the comfort of them. See Prov. v. 19. "Live with thy wife, and delight in her society; live joyfully with her, and be most cheerful when thou art with her. Take pleasure in thy family, thy vine and thy olive plants.'

(2.) The qualifications necessary to this cheerfulness; "Rejoice, and have a merry heart, if God now accepts thy works. If thou art reconciled to God, and recommended to him, then thou hast reason to be cheerful, otherwise not." Rejoice not, O Israel, for joy, as other people, for thou hast gone a whoring from thy God, Hos. ix. 1. Our first care must be to make our peace with God, and obtain his favour, to do that which he will accept of, and then, Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy. Note, these whose works God has accepted have reason to be cheerful, and ought to be so. "Now that thou cutest the bread of thy sacrifices with joy, and partakest of the wine of thy drink-offerings with a merry heart, now God accepts thy works; thy religious services, when performed with holy joy, are pleasing to God; he loves to have his servants sated at the table of his bounty, and take a hearty relish of it." (3.) The reasons for it; "Live joyfully, for;"

[1.] "It is all little enough to make thy passage through this world easy and comfortable; The days of thy life are the days of thy vanity; there is nothing here but trouble and disappointment; thou wilt have time enough for sorrow and grief when thou canst not help it, and therefore live joyfully while thou canst, and perplex not thyself with thoughts and cares about to-morrow; sufficient for the day is the evil thereof. Let a gracious serenity of mind be a powerful antidote against the vanity of the world."

[2.] "It is all thou canst get from this world; That is thy portion in the things of this life; in God, and another life, thou shalt have a better portion, and a better recompense for thy labours in religion; but for thy pains which thou takest about the things under the sun, this is all thou canst expect, and therefore therefore, why shouldst thou "sigh in secret, and cry to me" in "the days of thy vanity?""

2. Let us apply ourselves to the business of life, while life lasts, and so use the enjoyments of it, as by them to be fitted for the employments; "Therefore eat with joy, and a merry heart, not that thy soul may take its ease, (as Luke xix. 19.) but that thy soul may take the more pains, and the joy of the Lord may be its strength, and oil to its wheels," v. 10. Whatever thy hand finds to do, do it with thy might. Observe here, (1.) There is not only a work for us to do in this life, and the chief good we are to inquire after, is, the good we should do, Eccl. i. 3. This is the world of service, that to come is the world of recompense; this is the world of preparation and preparation for eternity; we are here upon business, and upon our behaviour. (2.) Opportunity is to direct and quicken duty; that is to be done, which our hand finds to do, which occasion calls for; and an active hand will always find something that can be "turned to account to the glory of God. What can be done, of necessity, our hand will here find a price in it for the doing of, Prov. xvii. 16. (3.) What good we have an opportunity of doing, we must do, while we have the opportunity, and do it with our might, with care, vigour, and resolution, whatever difficulties and discouragements we may meet with in it. Harvest-days are busy days; and we must make hay while the sun shines. Servings God and working out our salvation must be done with all that is within us; and all little enough. (4.) There is good reason why we should work the works of him that sent us, while it is day, because the night comes, wherein no man can work, John ix. 4. We must up and be doing now with all possible diligence, because our doing-time will be done shortly, and we know not how soon. But this we know, that if the work of life be not done when our time is done, we are undone for ever; There is no work to be done, no device to do it, no knowledge for speculation, nor wisdom for practice, in the grave, whither thou goest. We are all going toward the grave, every day brings us a step nearer it; when we are in the grave, it will be too late to mend the errors of life, too late to repent, and make our peace with God, too late to lay up any thing in store for eternal life; it must be done now or never. The grave is a land of darkness and silence, and therefore there is no doing any thing for our souls there, it must be done now or never; John xii. 35.

11. I returned, and saw under the sun..."
ECCLESIASTES, and men; The yet torious, retard ways have known you mightv of encouraging, to overfilling, to overconfidence, to overworks; man and wise, 8.30 of which to us seem casual, and we call them chance, but really they are according to the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, here called time in the language of this book, ch. iii. 1. Ps. xxxi. 15 Time and chance happen to them all. A sovereign Providence breaks men's measures, and blasts their hopes, and teaches them that the way of man is not in himself, but subject to the divine will. We must use means, but not to trust to; if we succeed, we must give God the praise; (Ps. xlv. 3.) if we be crossed, we must acquiesce in his will, and take our lot.

2. We are often surprised with the evils we were in little fear of; (v. 12.) Man known not his time, the time of his calamity, his fall, his death, which, in scripture, is called our day, and our hour. (1.) We know not what troubles are before us, which will take us off our business, and take us out of the world, what time and chance will happen to us, nor what one day, or a night, may bring forth. It is not for us to know the times, no, not our own time, when, or how, we shall die. God has, in wisdom, kept us in the dark, that we may be always ready. (2.) Perhaps we may meet with trouble in that very thing wherein we promise ourselves the greatest satisfaction and advantage; as the fishes and the birds are drawn into the snare and net by the bait laid to allure them, which they are grieved to know are the sons of men often snared in an evil time, when it falls suddenly upon them, before they are aware. And these things too come alike to all. Men often find their bane where they sought their bliss, and catch their death where they thought to have found a prize. Let us therefore never be secure, but always ready for changes, that, though they may be sudden, they may be no surprise or terror to us.

13. This wisdom have I seen also under the sun, and it seemed great unto me: 14. There was a little city, and few men within it; and there came a great king against it, and besieged it, and built great bulwarks against it. 15. Now there was found in it a poor wise man, and he by his wisdom delivered the city; yet no man remembered that same poor man. 16. Then said I, Wisdom is better than strength: nevertheless the poor man's wisdom is despised, and his words are not heard. 17. The words of wise men are heard in quiet, more than the cry of him that ruleth among fools. 18. Wisdom is better than weapons of war: but one sinner destroyeth much good.

Solomon still recommends wisdom to us as necessary to the preserving of our peace and the perfection of our business, notwithstanding the vanities and crosses which human affairs are subject to. He had said, (v. 11.) Bread is not always to the wise; yet he would not therefore be thought either to disparage, or to discourage, wisdom; no, he still retains his principle, that wisdom excels folly as much as light excels darkness, (Ch. ii. 13.) and we ought to love and embrace it, and be governed by it, for the sake of its own intrinsic worth, and the capacity it gives us of being serviceable to others, though we ourselves should not get wealth and preferment by it. This wisdom, this which he here describes, wisdom which enables a man to serve his country, out of pure affection to its interests, when he himself gains no advantage by it, no, not so much as thanks for his pains, or the reputation of it, this is the wisdom which, Solomon says, seemed great unto him, v. 15.
A public spirit, in a private sphere, is wisdom, which those who understand things that differ, cannot but look upon as very magnificent.

I. Solomon here gives an instance, which, probably, was a case in fact, in some neighbourhood, (for his instruction did great service in a time of public distress and danger; (v. 14.) There was a little city, (no great prize, whoever was master of it,) there were but few men within it to defend it, and men, if men of fortitude, are the best fortifications of a city; here were few men, and, because few, feeble, fearful, and ready to give up their city as not tenable. Against this little city a great king came with a numerous army, and besieged it, either in pursuit of some business and purpose of it, or in revenge for some affront given him, to chastise and destroy it; thinking it stronger than it was, he built great bulwarks against it, from which to batter it, and doubted not in a little time to make himself master of it. What a great deal of unjust vexation do ambitious princes give to their harmless neighbours! This great king needed not fear this little city; why then should he frighten it? It would be little profit to him; why then should he put money into his expectation of it? But, as unreasonably and insatiably greedy as little people sometimes are to lay house to house, and field to field, great kings often are, to lay city to city, and province to province, that they may be placed alone in the earth, (Isa. v. 8.) Did victory and success attend the strong? No; there was found in this little city, among the few men that were in it, one poor wise man; a wise man, and yet poor, and not preferred in any place of profit or power, in the city; and yet not given to men according to their merit, and meekness for them, else such a wise man as this had not been a poor man. Now,

1. Being wise, he served the city, though he was poor; in their distress they found him out, (Judg. xi. 7.) and begged his advice and assistance; and he by his wisdom delivered the city, either by prudent instructions given to the besieged, directing them to some unthought-of stratagem for their own security, or by a prudent treaty with the besiegers, as the woman at Abel, 2 Sam. xx. 16. He did not upbraid them with the contempt they had put upon him, in leaving him out of their council, nor tell them he was poor, and had nothing to lose, and therefore cared not what became of the city; but did his best for it, and was blessed with success. Note, Private interests and personal resentments must always be sacrificed to the public good, and forgotten when the common welfare is considered.

2. Being poor, he was slighted by the city, though he was wise, and had been an instrument to save them all from ruin; No man remembered that same poor man, his good services were not taken notice of, no recompense was made him, no marks of honour put upon him, but he lived in as much poverty and obscurity as he had done before; riches were not to this man of understanding, nor favour to this man of discretion, he was not much thought of for his name and for his person. Men and princes are not rich who have well merited of their prince and country have been ill paid; such an ungrateful world do we live in. It is well that useful men have a God to trust to, who will be their bountiful Rewarder; for, among men, great services are often envied, and rewarded with evil for good.

II. From this instance he draws some useful inferences; looks upon it, and receive instruction.

1. Hence he observes the great usefulness and excellency of wisdom; it makes men wise, as a prudent man, which is the honour of a man, is to be preferred before a robust body, in which many of the brute creatures excel man. A man may by his wisdom effect that which he could never compass by his strength; and may overcome those, by outwitting them, who are able to overpower him. Nay, wisdom is better than weapons of war, offensive or defensive, v. 18. Wisdom, that is, religion and piety, (for a wise man is here expresse to a sinner,) this is better than all military endowments or accoutrements, for it will engage God for us, and then we are safe in the greatest perils, and successful in the greatest enterprises. If God be for us, who can be against us, or stand before us?

2. Hence he observes the commanding force and power of wisdom, though it labour under external disadvantages; (v. 17.) The words of wise men are such as they speak, being rational and to the purpose, being spoken calmly and with deliberation, (though, not being rich and in authority, they dare not speak loud, nor with any great assurance,) will be hearkened to and regarded, will gain respect, nay, will gain the point, and sway with men, more than the imperious champed of him that rules among fools, who, like fools, chose him to be their ruler, for his noise and blistering, and, like fools, do it, to gain the loud assent of all that is there with every body else. A few close arguments are worth a great many big words; and those will strike sail to fair reasoning, who will answer them that he is a sour and insolent according to their folly. How forcible are right words! What is spoken wisely should be spoken calmly, and then it will be heard in quiet, and calmly considered. But passion will lessen the force even of reason, instead of adding any force to it.

3. Hence he observes that wise and good men, notwithstanding this, must often content themselves with the satisfaction of having done good, or, at least, endeavoured it, and offered it at it, when they cannot do the good they would do, nor have the praise they should have. Wisdom capacitates a man to serve his neighbours, and he offers his service; but, alas, if he be poor, his wisdom is despised, and his words are not heard, v. 16. Many a man is buried alive in poverty and obscurity, who, if he had but fit encouragement given him, might be a great blessing to the world; many a pearl is lost in its shell. But there is a day coming, when wisdom and goodness shall be in honour, and the righteous shall shine forth.

4. From what he had observed of the great good which one wise and virtuous man may do, he infers what a great deal of mischief one wicked man may do, and what a great deal of good he may be the hindrance of; One sinner destroyeth much good. As to himself, a sinful condition is a wasteful condition. How many of the good gifts both of nature and Providence does one sinner destroy, and make waste of—good sense, good parts, good learning, a good disposition, a good estate, good meat, good drink, and abundance of God's good creatures, all made use of in the service of sin, and so destroyed and lost, and the end of giving them frustrated and perverted! He who destroys his own soul destroys much good. A wise man, with what a great deal of mischief may one wicked man do in a town or country! One sinner, who makes it his business to deal with others, may defeat and frustrate the intentions of a great many good laws, and a great deal of good preaching, and draw many into his pernicious ways; one sinner may be the ruin of a town, as one Achab troubled the whole camp of Israel. The wise man, who delivered the city, had had his Due respect to the pernicious ways of the city, but the sinner hindered it, and invidiously diminished the service. And many a good project, well laid for the public welfare, has been destroyed by some one subtle adversary to it. The wisdom of some would have healed the nation, but through the wickedness of a few, it would not be healed. See who are a kingdom's friends and enemies, if one saint does much good, and one sinner destroys much good.

CHAP. X.
This chapter seems to be like Solomon's proverbs, a collection of wise sayings and observations, rather than a part of his sermon; but the preacher studied to be sententious, and to aggravate every point that he brought in his preaching. Yet the general scope of all the observations in this chapter, is, to recommend wisdom to us, and its precepts and rules, as of great use for the right ordering of our conversation, and to caution us against folly.

1. He recommends wisdom to private persons, who are in an inferior station. 1. It is our wisdom to preserve our reputation, in managing our affairs dexterously, v. 1. 2. To be submissive to our superiors, if at any time they do us wrong, v. 4. 3. To keep our conversation quiet and peaceable lives, and not to meddle with those that are factious and seditionist, and are endeavouring to disturb the government, and the public peace; the folly and danger of which is hinted in this verse.

2. Folly is easily and readily brought into our conversation, as well as all the other vices. 1. There are many who would bring folly into our conversation, it may be, to make their speech more lively, and to savour: a foolish man's speech shows, v. 3. 2. To govern our tongues well, v. 12. 15. 5. To be diligent in our business and provide well for our families, v. 18, 19. 6. Not to speak ill of our rulers, nor in secret, v. 20. 11. He recommends wisdom to rulers; let them not think that, because their subjects must be quiet under them, therefore they may do what they please; nor, but, 1. Let them be careful whom they prefer to places of trust and power, v. 3. 7. Let rulers not make it a custom to speak discreetly, he generon and not childish; temperate, and not luxurios, v. 16, 17. Happy the nation, when princes, and people, make conscience of their duty, according to these rules.

DEAD flies cause the ointment of the apothecary to send forth a stinking savour: so doth a little folly him that is in reputation for wisdom and honour. 2. A wise man's heart is at his right hand; but a fool's heart at his left. 3. Ye also, when he that is a fool walketh by the way, his wisdom faileth him, and he saith to every one that he is a fool.

In these verses, Solomon shows, 1. What great need wise men have to take heed of being guilty of any instance of folly; for a little folly is a great blemish to him that is in reputation for wisdom and honour, and is as hurtful to his good name as dead flies are to a sweet perfume, not only spoiling the sweetness of it, but making it to send forth a stinking savour. Note, (1.) True wisdom is true honour, and will gain a man a reputation, which is like a box of precious ointment, pleasing and very valuable. (2.) The reputation that is got honestly, and by a great deal of wisdom, may be easily lost, and by a little folly; because envy fastens upon eminency, and makes the worst of the mistakes and miscarriages of those who are cried up for wisdom, and improves them to their disadvantage; so that the folly which in another would not be taken notice of, in them is severely censured. Those who make a great profession of religion have need to walk very circumspectly, to abstain from all appearances of evil, and approaches towards it, because many eyes are upon them, that watch for their halting; their character is soon sullied, and they have a great deal of reputation to lose.

2. What a great advantage a wise man has above a fool in the management of business; (v. 2.) A wise man's heart is at his right hand, so that he goes about his business with dexterity, turns his hand readily to it, and goes through it with despatch; his counsel and diligence are ready to him, whenever he has occasion for them; but a fool's heart is at his left hand, it is always to seek when he has any thing to do that is of importance, and therefore he goes awkwardly about it, like a man that is left-handed; he is soon at a loss, and at his wit's end.

3. How apt fools are, at every turn, to proclaim their own folly, and expose themselves; he that is either witless or graceless, either silly or wicked, if he be ever so little from under the check, and control, to his own places of power and use, the way, soon shows what he is; his wisdom fails him, he is guilty by some impropriety or other, he says to every one he meets, that he is a fool, (v. 3.) he discovers it as plainly as if he had told them so. He cannot conceal it, and he is not ashamed of it. Sin is the reproach of sinners, wherever they go.

4. If the spirit of the ruler rise up against thee, leave not thy place; for yielding pacifieth great offences. 5. There is an evil which I have seen under the sun, as an error which proceedeth from the ruler: Folly is set in great dignity, and the rich sit in low place. 7. I have seen servants upon horses, and princes walking as servants upon the earth. 8. He that diggeth a pit shall fall into it; and whose breaketh a hedge, a serpent shall bite him. 9. Whoso removeth stones shall be hurt therewith; and he that cleaveth wood shall be endangered thereby.

The scope of these verses is to keep subjects loyal and dutiful to the government; in Solomon's reign, the people were very rich, and lived in prosperity, which perhaps made them proud and peevish, and when the taxes were high, they thought they had enough to pay them with, it is probable that many carried it insolently toward the government, and threatened to rebel. To such Solomon here gives some necessary cautions.

I. Let not subjects carry on a quarrel with their prince upon any private personal disgust; (v. 4.) "If the spirit of the ruler rise up against thee, if, upon some misinformation given him, or some miscarriage of his, he is displeased at thee, and threaten thee, yet leave not thy place, forget not the duty of a subject, revolt not from thy allegiance, do not, in a passion, quit thy post in his service, and throw up thy commission, as despairing ever to regain his favor; no, wait awhile, and then wilt find he is not implacable, but that yielding pacifieth great offences." Solomon speaks for himself, and for every wise and good man that is a master, or a magistrate, that he could easily forgive those, upon their submission, whom yet, upon their provocation, he had been very angry with. It is fairer and better to yield to an angry prince than to contend with him.

II. Let not subjects commence a quarrel with their prince, though the public administration be not in every thing as they would have it. He grants there is an evil often seen under the sun, and it is a king's evil, an evil which the king only can cure, for it is an error which proceedeth from the ruler; (v. 5.) it is a mistake which rulers, consulting their personal affections more than the public interests, are too often guilty of, that men are not preferred according to their merit, but folly is set in great dignity, men of shattered brains, and broken fortunes, are made the business of others and present, while the rich men of good sense and good estates, whose interest would oblige them to be true to the public, and whose abundance would be likely to set them above temptations to bribery and extortion, yet sit in low places, and can get no preferment; (v. 6.) either the ruler knows not how to value them, or the terms of their advancement, diligence, or talent do not comply with. It is ill with a people, when vicious men are advanced, and men of worth are kept under. This is illustrated; (v. 7.) I have seen servants upon horses; men not so much of mean extraction and education, (if that were all, it were the more excusable, nay, there is many a wise servant, who with good reason has rule over a son that causes shame,) but of sordid, servile, mercenary, dispositions, I have observed these rise against their princes, while princes, men of noble birth and qualities, fit to rule a kingdom, have been forced to walk as servants upon the earth, poor, and despised. Thus God, in his providence, punishes a wicked people; but as far as it is the ruler's act and deed, it is certainly his error, and a great evil, a grievance to the subject, and very provoking; but it is an error under the sun, which will certainly be rectified above the sun, and when it shall shine no more, for in heaven it is only wisdom and holiness that are set in great dignity. But if the prince be guilty of this error, yet let not the subjects leave their places, nor rise up against the government, nor form any project for the alteration of it; nor let the prince carry on the humour too far, nor set such servants, such beggars, on horseback, as will ride furiously over the ancient landmarks of the constitution, and threaten the subversion of it.

Thus people violently attempt any changes, nor make a forcible entry upon a national settlement, for they will both find it of dangerous consequence, which he shows here by four similitudes, the scope of which is to give us a caution not to meddle to our own hurt. Let not princes invite the rights and liberties of their subjects; let not subjects mutiny and rebel against their princes: for, (1.) He that diggeth a pit for another, it is ten to one but he falls into it himself, and his vengeful dealing returns upon his own head. If princes become tyrants, or subjects become rebels, all histories will tell both what is likely to be their fate, and that it is at their utmost peril, and it were better for both to be content within their own bounds. (2.) Whoso breaks a hedge, an old hedge, that has long been a landmark, let him expect that a serpent or adder, such as harbour in rotten hedges, will bite him; some viper or other will rise upon his hand, Acts xxviii. 3. God, by his ordinance, as a hedge, has enclosed the prerogatives and powers of princes, their persons are under his special protection; those therefore that form any treasonable designs against their peace, their crown and dignity, are but twisting halters for themselves. (3.) Whoso removes stones, to pull down a wall or building, does but pluck them upon himself, he shall be hurt therewith, and will wish that he had let them alone. Those that aspire after a well-built, well-settled, government, under colour of redressing some grievances, and correcting some faults in it, will quickly perceive, not only that it is easier to find fault than to mend, to demolish that which is good than to build up that which is better, but that they thrust their own fingers into the fire, and overwhelm themselves in the ruin they occasion. (4.) He that cleaveth the wood, especially if, as it follows, he doth so for himself, is derged thereby; the chimney, or his own axe-head, will fly in his face. If we meet with knotty pieces of timber, men of perverse and ungodly spirits, and we think to master them by force and violence, and hew them to pieces, they may not only prove too hard for us, but the attempt may turn to our damage.

2. Rather let both prince and people act towards each other with prudence, mildness, and good temper; Wisdom is profitable to direct the ruler how to manage a people that are inclined to be turbulent, so as neither, on the one hand, by a supine negligence of duty, and the neglect of correction, nor on the other hand, by rigour and severity, to exasperate and provoke them to any seditionary practices. It is likewise profitable to direct the subjects how to act towards a prince that is inclined to bear hard upon them, so as not to alienate his affections from them, but to win upon him, by humble remonstrances, (not insolent demands, such as the people made upon Rehoboam,) by patient submissions, and peaceable entreaties. The same rule is to be observed in all relations, for the preserving of the comfort of them; let wisdom direct to gentle methods, and forbear violent ones.

1. Wisdom will teach us to whet the tool we are to make use of, rather than, by leaving it blunt, oblige ourselves to put to so much the more strength, (v. 10.) We might save ourselves a great deal of labour, and prevent a great deal of danger, if we did what before we cut, consider and premeditate what is fit to be said and done in every difficult case, that we may accommodate ourselves to it, and may do our work smoothly and easily both to others and to ourselves. Wisdom will direct how to sharpen and put an edge upon both ourselves and those we employ, not to work deceitfully, (Ps. lxi. 2.) but to work cleanly and cleverly. The mower loses no time when he is whetting his scythe.

2. Wisdom will teach us to enchant the serpent we are to meddle with, rather than think to out-hiss it; (v. 11.) The serpent will bite, if he be not by singing and music charmed and enchanted, against which therefore he stoppeth his ears; (Ps. lxi. 4, 5.) and a babber is no better to all those who enter the lists with him, and therefore must not think by dint of words to out-talk him, but by prudent management to enchant him. He that is lord of the tongue, so the phrase is, (a foolish man is lord of his speech,) and may say what he will, it is as dangerous dealing with him, as with a serpent uncharmed; but, if you use the enchantment of a mild and humble submission, you may be safe, and out of danger; herein wisdom, the meekness of wisdom, is profitable to direct. By long forbearing is a prince persuaded, Prov. xxv. 15. Jacob enchanted Esau with a present, and Abigail David. To th' sword may say any thing, it is wisdom to say not that is provoking.

12. The words of a wise man's mouth are gracious: but the lips of a fool will swallow up himself. 13. The beginning of the words of his mouth is foolishness: and the end of his talk is mischief and madness. 14. A fool also is full of words: a man cannot tell what shall be; and what shall be after him who can tell him? 15. The labour of the foolish weareth every one of them; because he knoweth not how to go to the city.

Solomon having showed the benefit of wisdom, and of what great advantage it is to us in the management of business; and having encouraged the use of folly, and how it exposes men, which perhaps comes in as a reflection upon those rulers who set folly in great dignity. 1. Fools talk a great deal to no purpose, and they show their folly as much by the multitude, impertinence, and mischieffulness of their words, as by any thing; whereas the words of a wise man's mouth are gracious, are grace, manifest grace in his heart, and minister grace to the hearers, are good, and such as become him, and good to all about him.
the lips of a fool not only expose him to reproach, and make him ridiculous, but will swallow him self, and bring him to ruin, by provoking the government to take cognizance of his sedious talk, and call him to an account for it. Adonijah foolishly speak against his own life, 1 Kings ii. 23. Many a man has been sunk by having his own tongue fall upon him, Ps. lxiv. 8. See what a fool’s talk is.

(1.) It takes rise from his own weakness and wickedness: The beginning of the words of his mouth is foolishness; the foolishness bound up in his heart, that is the corrupt spring out of which all these polluted streams flow, the evil treasure out of which evil things are brought. As soon as he begins to speak, you may perceive his folly; at the very first he talks idly, and passionately, and like himself.

(2.) It rises up to fury, and tends to the hurt and injury of others; The end of his talk, the end it comes to, is madness; he will presently talk himself into an indescribable ure, and break out into the wild extravagancies of a distracted man; the end he aims at, is, mischief: as, at first, he appeared to have little government of himself, so, at last, it appears he has a great deal of malice to his neighbours; that root of bitterness bears gall and wormwood. Note, It is not strange if those that begin foolishly, end foolishly; for an ungoverned tongue, the more you keep it, the more it gives out, and grows the more violent.

(3.) It is all the same over and over; (v. 14.) A fool also is full of words, a passionate fool especially, that runs on endlessly, and never knows when to take up; he will have the last word, though it be but the same with that which was the first; what is wanting in the weight and strength of his words, he endeavours in vain to make up in the number of them; and they must be repeated, because otherwise there is nothing in them to make them regarded.

Note, Many, who are empty of sense, are full of words, and the least solid are the most noisy. The following words may be taken either, [1.] As checking him for his vainglorious boasting in the multitude of his words, what he will do, and what he will have, not considering that which every body knows, that a man cannot tell what shall be in his own time, while he lives, (Prov. xxvii. 1.) much less can one tell what shall be after him, when he is dead and gone. Would we duly consider our own ignorance, and uncertainty about, future events, it would cut off a great many of the idle words we foolishly multiply. Or, [2.] As mocking him for his talkologies; he is full of words, for, if he do but speak the most trite and common thing, a man cannot tell what shall be, because he loves to hear himself talk, he will say it again, what shall be after him, who can tell him? Like Battus in Ovid:

Sub illis—

Under those mountains were they,

They were under those mountains, I say.

 whence vain repetitions are called Battologies, Matth. vi. 7.

2. Fools toil a great deal to no purpose; (v. 15.) The labour of the foolish, to accomplish their designs, wears every one of them. (1.) They weary themselves in that labour which is very foolish and absurd. All their labour is for the world and the body, but that perisheth, and in this talk, they spend their strength and exhaust their spirits, and weary themselves for very vanity, Hab. ii. 13. Isa. iv. 2. They choose that service which is perfect drudgery, rather than that which is perfect liberty. (2.) That labour which is necessary, and would be profitable, and might be gone through with ease, weary them, because they go about it awkwardly, and foolishly, and so make their business a toil to them, which, if they applied them selves to it prudently, would be a pleasure to them. Many complain of the labours of religion as grievous, which they would have no reason to complain of, if the exercises of Christian piety were always under the direction of Christian prudence. The foolish tire themselves in endless pursuits, and never bring any thing to pass, because they know not how to go to the city, because they have not capacity to apprehend the plainest thing, such as the entrance into a great city is, where one would think it were impossible for a man to miss his road. Men’s imprudent management of their business robs them both of the comfort and of the benefit of it. But it is the excellency of the way to the heavenly city, that it is a highway, in which the way-faring men, though fools, shall not err; (Isa. xxxv. 8.) yet sinful folly makes men miss that way.

16. Wo to thee, O land, when thy king is a child, and thy princes eat in the morning! 17. Blessed art thou, O land, when thy king is the son of nobles, and thy princes eat in due season, for strength, and not for drunkenness! 18. By much slothfulness the building decayeth; and through idleness of the hands the house droppeth through.

19. A feast is made for laughter, and wine maketh merry; but money answereth all things. 20. Curse not the king, no, not in thy thought; and curse not the rich in thy bed-chamber: for a bird of the air shall carry the voice, and that which hath wings shall tell the matter.

Solomon here observes,

Now how much the happiness of a land depends upon the character of its rulers; it is well or ill, with the people, according as the princes are good or bad.

(1.) The people cannot be happy when their princes are childish and voluptuous; (v. 16.) Wo unto thee, O land, even the land of Canaan itself, though otherwise the glory of all lands, when thy king is a child, not so much in age (Solomon himself was young when his kingdom was established) as in understanding; when the prince is weak and foolish as a child, fickle and fond of changes, fretful and humourous, easily imposed upon, and hardly brought to business, it is ill with the people. The body staggers, if the head be giddy. Perhaps Solomon wrote this, with a foresight of his son Rehoboam’s ill conduct; (2 Chron. xiii. 7.) he was a child all the days of his life, and his family and kingdom fared the worse for it. Nor is it much better to be a people, when their princes eat in the morning, make a god of their belly, and make themselves slaves to their appetites. If the king himself were a child, yet if the princes and privy counsellors are wise and faithful, and apply themselves to business, the land may do the better; but if they addict themselves to their pleasures, and prefer the gratifications of the flesh before the despatch of the public business, which they disdained for by eating and drinking in a morning, when judges are employed, and do not eat to live, but live to eat, what good can a nation expect?

(2.) The people cannot but be happy, when their rulers are generous and active, sober and temperate, and men of business, v. 17. The land is then blessed, [1.] When the sovereign is governed by principles of honour, when the king is the son of nobles, actuated and animated by a noble spirit, which scorns to do any thing base, and unbecoming so high a character, which is solicitous for the public welfare, and prefers that before any private interests. Wisdom, virtue, and the fear of God, beneficence, and a readiness to do good to all mankind, these enoble the royal blood. [2.] When the subordinate magistrates, not being in such a hurry about the things they have in hand, to gratify their appetites, when they eat in due season, that is, when they have despatched their business, and get them an appointment. God gives the creatures their meat in due season, (Ps. cxlv. 15.) let us not take ours unseasonably, lest we lose the comfort of seeing God give it us. Magistrates should eat for strength, that their bodies may be fitted to serve their souls in the service of God and their country, and not for drunkenness, to make their habits suit them for God or man, and particularly to sit in judgment, for they will err through wine, (Isa. xxviii. 7.) will drink and forget the law, (Prov. xxxi. 5.) It is well with a people, when their princes are examples of temperance, when those that have most to spend upon themselves know how to deny themselves.

2. Of what ill consequence slothfulness is both to private and public affairs; (v. 18.) By much slothfulnes, and idleness, the neglect of business, and the love of ease and pleasure; the building decays, drops through first, and by degrees drops down; if it be not kept well covered, and care not be taken to repair the breaches, as any happen, it will rain in, and the timber will rot, and the house will become unfit to dwell in: it is so with the family and the affairs of it; if men cannot find in their hearts to take pains in their callings, to tend their shops, and look after their own business, they will soon run in debt, and go behind-hand, and, instead of making what they have, more, for their children, will make it less; it is so with the public; if the king be a child, and will take no care, if the princes eat in the morning, and will take no pains, the affairs of the nation suffer loss, and its interests are prejudiced, its honour sullied, its power weakened, its borders encroached upon, the course of justice obstructed, the treasure exhausted, and all its foundations out of course; and all this, through the slothfulness and self-seeking of those that should be the repairers of its breaches, and the restorers of paths to dwell in, Isa. lviii. 12.

3. How industrious, generally, all are, both princes and people, to get money, because that serves for all purposes, v. 19. He seems to prefer money before mirth; A feast is made for laughter, not merely for eating, but chiefly for pleasant conversation, and the society of friends; nor the laughter of the fool, which is madness, but that of wise men by which they fit themselves for business, and severe studies. Spiritual feasts are made for spiritual laughter, holy joy in God. Wine makes merry, makes glad the life, but money is the measure of all things, and answers all things. Pecunia obdient omnia—Money commands all things. Though wine makes merry, it will not be a house for us, nor a bed, nor clothing, nor provisions and portions for children, nor money, nor anything of this kind, but what all these. The feast cannot be made without money, and though men have wine, they are not so much disposed to be merry, unless they have money for the necessary supports of life. Money, of itself, answers nothing; it will neither feed nor clothe, but, as it is the instrument of commerce, it answers all the occasions of this present life; what is to be had, may be had for money, but it answers nothing to the soul, it will not procure the pardon of sin, the favor of God, the peace of conscience, nor the soul, as it is not redeemed, so it is not maintained, with corruptible things, as silver and gold. Some refer this to rulers; it is ill with the people when they give up themselves to luxury and riot, feasting and making merry, not only because their business is neglected, but because money must be had, to answer all these things, and, in order to that, the people squeezed by heavy taxes.

4. How cautious subjects have need to be, that they harbour not any disloyal purposes in their minds, nor to array up any factious cabals or consultations against the government, because it is ten to one that they are discovered and brought to light, v. 20. "Though rulers should be guilty of some errors, yet be not, upon all occasions, arraigning their administration and running them down, but make the best of them. "Here, (1.) The command teaches us our duty; Curse not the king, nor in thy thought, do not wish ill to the government in thy mind." All sin begins there, and therefore the first rises of it should be curbed and suppressed, and particularly that which proceeds from sedition. Curse not the rich, the princes and governors, in thy bed-chamber, in a conclave or club, of persons disaffected to the government; associate not with such; come not into their secret; join not with them in speaking ill of the government, or plotting against it. (2.) The reason consults our safety; "Though the design be carried on ever so secretly, every act of the air shall carry the voice to the king, who has more spies of that kind than of any other, and that which has wings shall tell the matter, to thy confusion and ruin." God sees what men do, and hears what they say, in secret; and, when he pleases, he can bring to light by strange and unsuspected ways. Wouldst thou then not be hurt by the powers that be, nor be afraid of them? Do that which is good, and thou shalt have praise of the same; but if thou do that which is evil, be afraid, Rom. xiii. 3, 4.

CHAP. XI.

In this chapter, we have, 1. A pressing exhortation to works of charity and bounty to the poor, as the best cure of the vanity which our worldly riches are subject to, and the only way of making them turn to a substantial good account, v. 1-6. 2. A serious admonition to prepare for death and judgment, and to begin betimes, even in the days of our youth, to do so, v. 7-10.

1. OAST thy bread upon the waters: for thou shalt find it after many days. 2. Give a portion to seven, and also to eight: for thou knowest not what evil shall be upon the earth. 3. If the clouds be full of rain, they empty themselves upon the earth: and if the tree fall toward the south, or toward the north, in the place where the tree falleth, there it shall be. 4. He that observeth the wind, shall not sow; and he that regardeth the clouds shall not reap. 5. As thou knowest not what is the way of the wind, nor how the bones do grow in the womb of her that is with child; even so thou knowest not the works of God who maketh all. 6. In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thy hand: for thou knowest not whether thou shalt prosper, either this or that, or whether they both shall be alike good.

Solomon had often, in this book, pressed it upon rich people to take the poor part of other men as themselves; here he presses it upon them to do good to others with them, and to abound in liberality to the poor, which will, another day, abound to their account. Observe,
ECCLESIASTES.

1. How the duty itself is recommended to us, v. 1.

1. Cast thy bread upon the waters, thy bread-corn upon the low places, so some understand it, alluding to the husbandman, who goes forth, bearing precious seed, sparing bread-corn from his family for his seediness, knowing that, without that, he can have no harvest another year; thus the charitable man takes from his bread-corn for seed-corn, abridges himself to supply the poor, that he may sow besides all waters, (Isa. xxxiii. 20.) because, as he sows, he must reap, Gal. vi. 7. We read of the harvest of the river, Isa. xxxii. 5. Waters, in scripture, are put for multitudes, (Rev. xvi. 5.) and there are multitudes of poor, we do not want objects of charity; waters are put also for mourners, the poor are men of sorrows. Thou must give bread, the necessary supports of life, not only give good words, but good things, Isa. lviii. 7. It must be thy bread, that which is honestly got; it is no charity, but injury, to give that which is none of charity to give; first, do justly, and then love mercy. "Thy bread, which thou didst design for thyself, let the poor have a share with thee, as they had with Job, ch. xxxi. 17. Give freely to the poor, though it may seem thrown away and lost, as that which is cast upon the waters. Send it a voyage, send it at a venture, as merchants that trade by sea; trust it upon the waters, it shall not sink.

2. Give a portion to seven, and also to eight; be not a scrupulous dispenser of works of charity." (1.) "Give much, if thou hast much to give, not a pitance, but a portion, not a bit or two, but a mess, a meal; give a large dole, not a paltry one; give good measure, (Luke vi. 38.) be generous in giving, as they were, when, on festival days, they sent portions to them for whom nothing was prepared, (Neh. viii. 10.) worthy portions." (2.) "Give to many, to seven, and also to eight; if thou meet with seven objects of charity, give to them all, and then, if thou meet with an eighth, give to that, and if with eight more, give to them also; to give one not thyself with the good thou hast done, from the good thou hast further to do, but hold on, and mend. In hard times, when the number of the poor increases, let thy charity be proportionably enlarged." God is rich in mercy to all, to us, though unworthy, he gives liberally, and upbraideth not with former gifts, and we must be merciful, as our heavenly Father is.

II. The reasons with which it is pressed upon us.

Consider,

1. Our reward for well-doing is very certain. "Though thou cast it upon the waters, and it seem lost, thou thinkest thou hast given thy good word with it, and art likely never to hear of it again, yet thou shalt find it after many days, as the husbandman finds his seed again in a plentiful harvest, and the merchant his venture in a rich return. It is not lost, but well laid out, and well laid up; it brings in full interest, in the present gifts of God's providence, and graces and comforts of his spirit; and the present receipt is but the earnest of the reward to come, as that of the Lord." Seneca, a heathen, could say, Nihil magis possidere me credam quam bene donata—I possess nothing so completely as that which I have given away. Hoc habeo quodcumque dedi; he sunt divini certa in quacunque sorte humana levitate—Whatever I have imparted I still possess; these riches remain with me through all the vicissitudes of life. "Thou shalt find it, perhaps not quickly, but after many days; the return may be slight, but it is sure, and will be so much the more plentiful." Wheat, the most valuable grain, lies longest in the ground. Long voyages make the best returns.

2. Our opportunity for well-doing is very uncertain; "Thou knowest not what evil may be upon the earth, which may deprive thee of thine estate, and put thee out of a capacity to do good, and therefore, while thou hast wherewithal, be liberal with it; im prove the present season, as the husbandman in sowing his ground, before the frost comes," We have reason to expect evil upon the earth, for we are born to trouble; what the evil may be we know not, but, that we may be ready for it, whatever it is, it is our wisdom, in the day of prosperity, to be in good, to be doing good. Many make use of this as an argument against giving to the poor, because they know not what hard times may come, when they may want themselves; whereas we should therefore the rather be charitable, that, when evil days come, we may have the comfort of having done good while we were able; we would then hope to find mercy both with God and man, and therefore should now show mercy. If by charity we trust God with what we have, we put it into good hands, against bad times.

III. How he obviates the objections which might be made against this duty, and the excuses of the uncharitable.

1. Some will say, that what they have is their own, and they have it for their own use, and will ask, Why should we cast it thus upon the waters? Why should I take my bread, and my flesh, and give it to I know not whom? So Nabal pleaded, 1 Sam. xxv. 11. Look up, man, and consider how soon thou wouldst be starved in a barren ground, if the clouds over thy head should plead thus, that they have the waters, but thou hast not the clouds to bring them to thee. If they are full of rain, they empty themselves upon the earth, to make it fruitful, till they are wearied and spent with watering it, Job xxxvii. 11. Are the heavens thus bountiful to the poor earth, that is so far below them, and wilt thou grudge thy bounty to thy poor brother, who is bone of thy bone?—Or thus; some will say, Though we give but little to the poor, yet, thank God, we have as charitable a heart as any. Nay, says Solomon, if the clouds be full of rain, they will empty themselves; if there be charity in the heart, it will show itself, Jam. ii. 15. 16. He that draweth out his soul to the hungry will reach forth his hand to them as he has ability.

2. Some will say, that their sphere of usefulness is low and narrow, they cannot do the good that they see others can, who are in more public stations, and therefore they will sit still, and do nothing. Nay, says he, in the place where the tree falls, or happens to be, there it shall be, for the benefit of those who walk by it. To do good is the duty of every christian, and may be a blessing to that place, whatever it is, where the providence of God casts him; wherever we are, we may find good work to do, if we have but hearts to do it. Or thus; some will say, "Many present themselves as objects of charity who are unworthy, and I do not know whom it is fit to give it to." "Trouble not thyself about that," (says Solomon;) "give as discreetly as thou canst, and then be satisfied, that, though the person should prove undeserving of the bounty, yet, if it be given with an honest heart, thou shalt not lose thy reward; which way soever the charity is directed, north or south, thine shall be the benefit of it." This is commonly applied to death; therefore let us do good, and, as good trees, bring forth the fruits of righteousness, because death will shortly come, and cut us down, and we shall then be determined to an unchangeable state of happiness or misery, according to what was done in the body. As the tree falls at death, so it likely will be, as the tree planted in the earth.

3. Some will object the many discouragements they have met with in their charity; they have been reproached for it as proud and pharisaical; they have but little to give, and they shall be despised, if they do not give as others do; they know not but their children may come to want it, and they had better lay it up for them; they have taxes to pay, and purchases to make; they know not what use will be made of their charity, nor what construction will be put upon it; these, and a hundred such objections, he answers in one word; (v. 4.) He that observes the wind shall not sow, which signifies doing good; and he that regards the clouds shall not reap, which signifies getting good; if we stand thus magnifying every little difficulty, God will make us to do without a sail, and many a thing will be easily done, and facing hard ship and danger where there is none, we shall never go on, much less go through, with our work, nor make any thing of it. If the husbandman should decline or leave off sowing for the sake of every flying cloud, and reaping for the sake of every blast of wind, he would make but an ill account of his husbandry at the year’s end. The duties of religion are as necessary as sowing and reaping, and will turn so much to our own advantage; the discouragements we meet with in these duties are but as winds and clouds, which will do us no harm; and which those that put on a little courage and resolution will despise and easily break through. Note, Those that will be deterred and driven off by small and seeming difficulties from great and real duties, will never bring anything to pass in religion, for there will always arise some wind, some cloud or other, at every work we are about; heavens, winds and clouds are in God’s hands, are designed to try us, and our Christianity obliges us to endure hardness.

4. Some will say, “We do not see in which way what we expend in charity should ever be made up to us, we do not find ourselves ever the richer; why should we depend upon the general promise of a blessing on the charitable, unless we saw which way to expect the operation of it?”

To this he answers, “But the Lord shall be the ra\er of his servants, and he shall be kind to his elect.” (Ps. viii. 33.) Or thou shalt see; thou mayest be sure he will make good his word of promise, though he does not tell thee how or which way, and though he works in a way by himself, according to the counsels of his unsearchable wisdom; he will work, and none shall hinder; but then he will work, and none shall direct or prescribe to him; the blessing shall work insensibly, but irresistibly; God’s work shall certainly agree with his word, whether we see it or no.”

Note. The ignorance of the work of God is shown in two instances. (1.) We know not what is the way of the Spirit; of the wind, so some; we know not whence it comes, or whither it goes, or when it will turn; yet the seamen lie ready waiting for it, till it turns about in favour of them; so we must do our duty, in expectation of the time appointed for the blessing. Or it may be understood of the human soul; we know that God made us, and gave us these souls, but how they entered into these bodies, are united to them, animate them, and operate upon them, we know not; the soul is a mystery to itself, no marvel then that the work of God is so to us. (2.) We know not how the bones are fashioned in the womb of her that is with child; we cannot describe the manner either of the formation of the body, or of its information with a soul; both, we both, know are the work of God, and we acquiesce in his work, but cannot, in either, trace the process of the operation; we do not know the birth of the child that is conceived, though we know not how it is formed, nor need we doubt the performance of the promise, though we perceive not how things work towards it. And we may well trust God to provide for us that which is convenient, without our anxious disguising cares, and therein to recompense us for our charity, since it was without any knowledge or foretaste of ours, that our bodies were formed in our mother’s womb, secret, and our souls found the way into them; and so the argument is the same, and urged to the same extent, with that of our Saviour, (Matth. vi. 25.) The life, the living soul that God has given us, is more than meat; the body, that God has made us, is more than raiment; let him therefore that has done the greater for us be cheerfully depended upon to do the lesser.

5. Some say, “We have been charitable, have given a great deal to the poor, and never yet saw any return for it; many days are past, and we have not found it again.”

To which he answers, (v. 6.) Yet go you a little speed, and let slip no opportunity. In the morning, sow thy seed upon the objects of charity that offer themselves early, and, in the evening, do not withhold thy hand, under pretence that thou art weary; as thou hast opportunity, do being good, some way or other, all the day long, as the husbandman follows his seadness from morning till night. In the morning of youth, lay out thyself to do good; give out of the little thou hast to begin the world with; and, in the evening of old age, yield not to the common temptation old people are in to be penurious; even then withhold not thy hand, and think not to excise thyself from charitable works by purposing to make a charitable will, but do good to the last, for thou knowest not which work of charity and piety shall prosper, both as to others and as to thyself, this or that, but hast reason to hope that both shall be alike good. Be not weary of well-doing, for in due season, he shall make it to come forth, and that is the best time, you shall reap.”

Gal. vi. 9. This is applicable to spiritual charity, our pious endeavours for the good of the souls of others; let us continue them, for, though we have long laboured in vain, we may at length see the success of them. Let ministers, in the days of their seadness, sow both morning and evening; for who can tell which shall prosper?

7. Truly the light is sweet, and a pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun: 8. But if a man live many years, and rejoice in them all; yet let him remember the days of darkness; for they shall be many. All that cometh is vanity. 9. Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thy heart, and in the sight of thine eyes; but know thou, that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment.

10. Therefore remove sorrow from thy heart, and put away evil from thy flesh; for childhood and youth are vanity.

Here is an admonition both to old people and to young people, to think of dying, and get ready for it. Having, by many excellent precepts, taught us how to live well, the preacher comes now, toward the close of his discourse, to teach us how to die well, and to put us in mind of our latter end.

1. He applies himself to the aged, writes to them as fathers, to awaken them to think of death, v. 7, 8. Here is,

1. A rational concession of the sweetness of life, which old people find by experience; Truly the light is sweet; the light of the sun is so; it is a pleasant thing for the eyes to behold it; light was the first thing made in the formation of the great world, as the eye is one of the first in the formation of the body, the little world; it is pleasant to see the light; the heathen were so charmed with the pleasure of it, that they worshipped the sun; it is pleasant by it to see other things, the many agreeable prospects it puts for life, Job iii. 20, 23. It cannot be denied that life is sweet; it is sweet to bad men, because they have their portion in this life; it is sweet to good men, because they have this life as the time of their preparation for a better life; it is sweet to all men; nature says it is so, and there is no disputing against it; nor can death be desired for its own sake, but dreaded, unless as a period to present evils, or a passage to future good. Life is sweet, and therefore we have need to double a guard upon ourselves, lest we love it too well.

2. A caution to think of death, even in the midst of all happiness. Death is most sweet, and we are most apt to forget death; If a man live many years, yet let him remember the days of darkness are coming. Here is, (1.) A summer's day supposed to be enjoyed—that life may continue long, even many years, and that, by the goodness of God, it may be made comfortable, and a man may rejoice in them all. Those are those that live many years in this world, escape many dangers, receive many mercies, and therefore are secure that they shall want no good; and that no evil shall befall them, and the pitcher which has come so often from the well, safe and sound, shall never come home broken. But who are they that live many years, and rejoice in them all? Alas! none; we have but hours of joy for months of sorrow. However, some rejoice in their years, their many years, more than others; if these two things meet, a prosperous state, and a cheerful spirit, these two indeed may do much towards enabling a man to rejoice in them all. Yet let them remember the states, and the worst cheerful spirit has its damps; jovial sinners have their melancholy qualms, and cheerful saints have their gracious sorrows; so that it is but a supposition, not a case in fact, that a man should live many years, and rejoice in them all. But, (2.) Here is a winter's night proposed to be expected, after this summer's day; yet let this hearty old man remember the days of darkness, for they shall be many. Note, (1.) There are days of darkness coming, as the fruit of our lying in the grave; there the body will lie in the dark, the eyes see not, the sun shines not. The darkness of death is opposed to the light of life, the grave is a land of darkness, Job x. 21. (2.) Those days of darkness will be many; the days of our lying under ground will be more than the days of our living above ground. They are many, but they are not infinite; many as they are, they will be numbered and finished when the heavens are no more. (3.) They are days of darkness coming, from the mouth of the night, so the longest night will have its morning. (4.) It is good for us often to remember those days of darkness, that we may not be lifted up with pride, nor hallowed asleep in carnal security, nor even transported into indecencies by vain mirth. (5.) Notwithstanding the long continuance of life, and the many comforts of it, yet we must remember the days of darkness, because those will certainly come, and they will be with much the less terror, if we have thought of them before.

II. He applies himself to the young, and writes to them as children, to awaken them to think of death; (v. 9, 10.) here we have, 1. An ironical concession to the vanities and pleasures of youth; Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth. Some make this to be the counsel which the atheist and the epicure give to the young man, the poisonous suggestions against which Solomon, in the close of his life, urge them; but it is more emphatical, if we take it, as it is commonly understood, by way of irony, like that of Elijah to the priests of Baal, Cry aloud, for he is a god; or of Micaiah to Ahab, Go to Ramoth-Gilead, and prosper; or of Christ to his disciples, Sleep on now. "Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, live a merry life, follow thy sports, and take thy pleasures; let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, cheer thee with its fancies and foolish hopes; entertain thyself with thy pleasing dreams, walk in the ways of thy heart, do whatever thou hast a mind to do, and stick at nothing that may gratify the sensual appetite; Quicquid liber licet—Make thy will thy law; walk in the ways of thy heart, and let thine heart talk after thine eyes, a rambling heart after a roving eye; what is pleasing to thine own eyes do it, whether it be pleasing in the eyes of God or no." Solomon speaks thus ironically to the young man, that he may thus make him a witness of his own foolishness, and which he would fain have leave to do, in which he places his happiness, and on which he sets his heart. (2.) That he wishes all about him would give him this counsel, would preclude him to such smooth things as these, and cannot break any advice to the contrary, but reckons these his enemies that bid him be sober and serious. (3.) To expose his folly, and the great absurdity of a voluptuous vicious course of life; the very description of his folly, that it is all this, is his folly, and that to live in them impartially, is enough to show how contrary to reason those act that live such a life. The very opening of the cause is enough to determine it without any argument. (4.) To show, that, if men give themselves to such a course of life as this, it is just with God to give them up to it, to abandon them to their own hearts' lusts, that they may walk in their own counsels, Hos. iv. 17.

A powerful check is given to these vanities and pleasures; "Know thou, that for all these things God shall bring thee into judgment, and duly consider that, and then live such a luxurious life, if thou canst, if thou darest." This is a acts:—a corrective to the foregoing concession, and plucks in the reins he had laid on the neck of the young man's lust. "Know then, for a certainty, that, if thou dost take such a liberty as this, it will be thy everlasting ruin, thou hast to do with a God who will not let go unvisited and unpunished. (1.) The judgment is ready to come. (2.) We must every one of us be brought into judgment, however we may now put far from us that evil day. (3.) We shall be reckoned with for all our carnal mirth and sensuous pleasures in that day. (4.) It is good for all, but especially for young people, to know and consider this, that they may not, by the indulgence of their youthful lusts, treasure up unto themselves wrath against the day of wrath, the wrath of the Lamb. (5.) A warning, and an exhortation inferred from all this, v. 10. Let young people lock to themselves, and manage well both their souls and their bodies, their heart and their flesh. (1.) Let them take care that their minds be not lifted up with pride, or disturbed with anger, or any sinful passion; Remove sorrow, or anger, from thy heart; the word signifies any disorder or perturbation of the mind. Young people are apt to be impatient of check and control, to vex and fret at any thing that is humiliating and mortifying to them, and their proud hearts rise against every thing that creases and contradicts them. They are so set upon that which is pleasing to sense, that they cannot bear any thing that is displeasing, but it goes with sorrow to their heart; their pride often discoutnt them, and makes them uneasy. "Put that away, and the love of the world, and lay thine expectations low from the creature, and not from the God who will render unto every man according of sorrow and anger to thee." Some by sorrow here understand that carnal mirth described v. 9. the end of which will be bitterness and sorrow. Let them keep at a distance from every thing which will be sorrow in the reflection. (2.) Let them take care that their bodies be not defiled by intemperance, uncleanness, or any fleshly lusts; "Put away evil from the flesh, and let not the members of thy body be instruments of unrighteousness. The evil of sin will be the evil of punishment, and that which thou art fond of, as good for the flesh, because it gratifies the appetites of it, will prove evil, and hurtful to it, and therefore put it far from thee, the further the better."

The preacher, to enforce his admonition both to old and young, urges, as an effectual argument, that which is the great argument of his discourse, the vanity of all present things, their uncertainty and insufficiency.

1. He reminds old people of this; (v. 8.) All that comes is vanity; yea, though a man live many years, and rejoice in them all. That is come already, and all that is yet to come, how much soever men promise themselves from the concluding scenes, it is all vanity. What will be, will do no more to make men happy than what has been. All that come into the world are vanity; they are altogether so, at their best estate.

2. He reminds young people of this; Childhood and youth are vanity. The dispositions and actions of childhood and youth have in them a great deal of impertinence and iniquity, sinful vanity, which young people have need to watch against, and get cured. The pleasures and advantages of childhood and youth have in them no certainty, satisfaction, or continuance; they are passing away; these flowers will soon wither, and these make us fall; let them therefore knit them into good fruit, which will continue and abound to a good account.

CHAP. XII.

The wise and penitent preacher is here closing his sermon; and he closes it, not only like a good orator, but like a good preacher, with that which was likely to make the best impressions, and which he wished might be powerful and lasting upon his hearers. Here is, 1. An exhortation to young people to begin betimes to be religious, and to put it off to old age, (v. 1.) enforced with arguments taken from the calamities of old age, (v. 1. 5.) and that great change that death will make upon us, v. 7, 8. 11. A repetition of the great truth he had undertakent to prove in this discourse, the vanity of the world, v. 8. 11. III. A confirmation and recommendation of what he had written in this and his other books, as worthy to be duly weighed and considered, v. 9. 12. IV. The whole matter summed up and concluded with a charge to all to be truly religious, in consideration of the judgment to come, v. 13, 14.

1. REMEMBER now thy Creator in the days of thy youth, while the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh, when thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them; 2. While the sun, or the light, or the moon, or the stars, be not darkened; nor the clouds return after the rain: 3. In the day when the keepers of the house shall tremble, and the strong men shall bow themselves, and the grinders cease because they are few, and those that look out of the windows be darkened; 4. And the doors shall be shut in the streets, when the sound of the grinding is low; and he shall rise up at the voice of the bird; and all the daughters of music shall be brought low: 5. Also when they shall be afraid of that which is high, and fears shall be in the way, and the almond tree shall flourish, and the grasshopper shall be a burden, and desire shall fail; because man goeth to his long home, and the mourners go about the streets: 6. Or ever the silver cord be loosed, or the golden bowl be broken, or the pitcher be broken at the fountain, or the wheel be broken at the cistern: 7. Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was; and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it.

Here is,

I. A call to young people to think of God, and mind their duty to him, when they are young; Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth. This is, 1. The royal preacher's application of his sermon concerning the vanity of the world, and every thing in it. "You that are young flatter yourselves with expectations of great things from it, but believe those that have tried, it yields no solid satisfaction to dwell; therefore, that you may not be deceived by this, nor tempted to essay to do it, remember your Creator, and so guard yourselves against the mischiefs that arise from the vanity of the creature." 2. It is the royal physician's antidote against the particular diseases of youth, the love of mirth, and the indulgence of sensual pleasures, the vanity which childhood and youth are subject to; to prevent and cure this, remember thy Creator. Here is, (1.) A great duty pressed upon us, to remember our God as our Creator; not only to remember that God is our Creator, that he made us, and not we ourselves, and is therefore our rightful Lord and Owner, but we must engage ourselves to him with the considerations which his being our Creator lays us under, and pay him the honour and duty which we owe him as our Creator. Remember thy Creator; the word is plural, as it is, Job xxxv. 10. Where is God my Maker? For God said, Let us make man, us, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. (2.) The proper season for this duty, in the days of thy youth; the days of thy choice, so some; thy choice days, thy choosing days. "Begin, in the beginning of thy days, to remember him from whom thou hast thy being, and go on according to that good beginning. Call him to mind when thou art young, and keep him in mind throughout all the days of thy youth, and never forget him. Guard thus against the temptations of youth, and thus improve the advantages of it."

II. A reason to enforce this command; While the evil days come not, and the years, of which thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them. Do it quickly, 1. "Before sickness and death come; do it while thou livest, for it will be too late to do it when death has removed thee from this state of trial and probation to that of recompense and retribution. The days of sickness and death are the days of evil, terrible to nature, evil days indeed to those that have forgotten their Creator; these evil days will come, sooner or later; as yet they come not; for God is long-suffering to us-ward, and gives us space to repent; the continuing of life is but the deferring of death, and, while life is continued and death deferred, it concerns us to prepare, and get the property of death altered, that we may die comfortably."

2. Before old age comes, which, if death prevent not, will come, and they will be years of which we shall say, We have no pleasure in them; when we shall not relish the delights of sense, as Barzillai, (2 Sam. xix. 35.) when we shall be loaded with bodily infirmities, old and blind, or old and lame; when we shall be taken off from our usefulness, and our strength shall be labour and sorrow; when we shall either have parted with our relations, and all our old friends and acquaintance in them, and see them weary of us; when we shall feel ourselves die by inches; these years draw nigh, when all that comes will be vanity, the remaining months all months of vanity, and there will be no pleasure but in the reflection of a good life on earth, and the expectation of a better life in heaven.
These are no ambiguities; the order, and shows, (1.) How many are the calamities of old age, and that, if we should live to be old, our days will be such as we shall have no pleasure in; which is a good reason why we should return to God, and make our peace with him, in the days of our youth, and not till then find it to be old; for it will be no thanks to us to leave the pleasures of sin, when they have left us, nor to return to God, when need forces us; it is the greatest absurdity and ingratitude imaginable, to give the cream and flower of our days to the devil, and reserve the bran and refuse and dregs of them for God; this is offering the torm, and the lame, and the sick, for the sacrifice; and besides, old age being thus clogged with infirmities, it is the greatest folly imaginable to put off that needful work which requires the best of our strength, when our faculties are in their prime, and especially to make the work more difficult by a longer continuance in sin, and laying up treasures of guilt in the conscience, to add to the burdens of age, and make them much heavier. If the calamities of age will be such as here represented, we shall have need of something to support and comfort us then, and nothing will be more effectual to do this than the thoughts of the good works we have done for us, that we began betimes to remember our Creator, and have not since laid aside the remembrance of him.
How can we expect God should help us when we are old, if we will not serve him when we are young? See Ps. lxxi. 17, 18.

The decays and infirmities of old age are here elegantly described in figurative expressions, which have some difficulty in them to us now, who are not acquainted with the common phrases and metaphors used in Solomon's age and language; but the general scope is plain—to show how uncomfortably, generally, the days of old age are.
[1.] Then the sun and the light of it, the moon, and the stars, and the light which they borrow from it, will be darkened; they look dim to old people, in consequence of the decay of their sight; their countenance is clouded, and the beauty and lustre of it are eclipsed; their intellectual powers and the ideas which are in their soul are darkened; their understanding and memory fail them, and their apprehension is not so quick, nor their fancy so lively, as it has been; (light is often put for joy and prosperity) the days of their mirth are over, and they have not pleasure either of the converse of the day or the repose of the night, for both the sun and the moon are darkened to them.
[2.] Then the clouds return after the rain; as when the weather is disposed to wet, so no sooner is one cloud blown over than another succeeds it, so it is with old people, when they are got free from one pain or ailment, they are seized with another, so that their distempers are like a continual dropping in a very rainy day. The end of one trouble is, in this world, but the beginning of another, and deep calls unto deep. Old people are often afflicted with delusions of rheum, like soaking rain, after which still more clouds return, feeling the humour, so that it continues grievous, and thereby the body as it were, melts away.
[3.] Then the keepers of the house tremble; the head, which is as the watch-tower, shakes, and the arms and hands, which are ready for the preservation of the body, shake too, and grow feeble, upon every sudden approach and attack of danger; that vigour of the animal spirits, which used to be exerted for self-defence, falls, and cannot do its office; old people are easily dispirited and discouraged.
[4.] Then the strong men shall bow themselves; the legs and thighs, which used to support the body, and bear its weight, bend, and cannot serve for labour, as they have done, but are soon tired. Old men, that have been in their time strong men, are become weak, and stoop for age, Zech. viii. 4. God takes no pleasure in the legs of a man, (Ps. cxlvii. 10.) for their strength will soon fade; but in the Lord Jehovah there is everlasting strength, he has everlasting arms.
[5.] Then the grinders cease, because they are few; the teeth, with which we grind our meat, and prepare it for concoction, cease to do their part, because they are few; they are rotted and broken, and perhaps have been drawn, because they ached; some old people have lost all their teeth, and others have but few left; and this infirmity is the more considerable, because the meat, not being well chewed, the want of teeth, is not well digested, which has as much an influence as any thing upon the other decays of age.
[6.] Those that look out of the windows are darkened; the eyes wax dim, as Isaac's, (Gen. xxvii. 1.) and Ahijah's, 1 Kings xiv. 4. Moses was a rare instance of one, who, when 120 years old, had good eye-sight, but ordinarily, the sight decays in old people as soon as any thing, and it is a mercy to them that art helps nature with spectacles. We must therefore need to improve our sight well while we have it, because the light of the eyes may be gone before the light of life.
[7.] The doors are shut in the streets; old people keep within doors, and care not for going abroad to entertainments; the lips, the doors of the mouth, are shut in eating, because the teeth are gone, and the sound of the grinding with them is lost, so that they have not command of their meat in their mouths, which they used to have; they cannot digest it in their stomach, and therefore little grist is brought to the mill.
[8.] Old people rise up at the voice of the bird; they have no sound sleep as young people have, but a little thing disturbs them, even the chirping of a bird; they cannot rest, for coughing, and therefore rise up at cock-crowing, as soon as any body is stirring; or they are apt to be jealous, and timorous, and full of care, which breaks their sleep, and makes them wake at every noise. They are wiser to rise up and retire to bed, rise up, and retire, as in a fright, at those voices of birds, of ravens, or screech-owls, which soothsayers omen to.
[9.] With them, all the daughters of music are brought low; they have neither voice nor car, can neither sing themselves, nor take any pleasure, as Solomon had done in the days of his youth, in singing men and singing women, and musical instruments, ch. ii. 8. Old people grow hard of hearing, and unapt to distinguish sounds and voices.
[10.] They are afraid of that which is high, afraid to go to the top of any high place, either because, for want of breath, they cannot reach it, or, their heads being giddy, or, their legs failing them, they dare not venture to it; or they frighten themselves with fancies, that that which is high will fall upon them. Fear is in the way; they can neither ride nor walk with their usual boldness, but are afraid of every thing that lies in their way, lest it throw them down.
[11.] The almond-tree flourisheth; the old man's hair is grown white, so that his head looks like an almond-tree in the blossom. The almond-tree blossoms before any other tree, and therefore fitly shows what haste old age makes, in seizing upon men; it prevents their expectations, and comes faster upon them than they thought of. Gray hairs are here and there upon them, and they perceive it not.
[12.] The grasshopper is a burthen, and desire fails. Old men can bear nothing, the lightest thing sits heavy upon them, both on their bodies and on their minds, a little thing sinks and breaks them; perhaps the grasshopper was some food that was loved upon to be very light of digestion; John Baptist's meat was locusts; but even that lies heavy upon an old man's stomach, and therefore desire is failed, he has no appetite to his meat, neither shall he regard the desire of women, as that king, Dan.
xi. 37. Old men become mindless and listless, and the pleasures of sense are to them tasteless and sick.

It is probable that Solomon wrote this when he was himself old, and could speak feignedly of the infirmities of age, which perhaps grew the faster upon him, for the indulgence he had given himself in sensual pleasures. Some old people bear up better than others under the decays of age, but, more or less, the days of old age are and will be evil days, and of little pleasure. Great care therefore should be taken to pay respect and honour old people that they may have something to balance their grievances, and nothing may be done to add to them.
And all this put together makes up a good reason why we should remember our Creator in the days of our youth, that he may remember us with favour, when these evil days come, and his comforts may delight our souls when the delights of sense are in a manner worn out.

Therefore remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth, because death is certainly before thee, perhaps it is very near thee, and it is a serious ting to die, and thou shouldest feel concerned with the utmost care and diligence to prepare for it.
[1.] In an unchangeable state. Make all then to go to his long home and lead all these infirmities and decays of age are harbingeres of, and advances toward, that awful remove. At death, man goes from this world, and all the employments and enjoyments of it; he is gone for good and all, as to his present state; he is gone home; for here he was a stranger and pilgrim; both soul and body go to the place whence they came, v. 7. He is gone to his rest, to the place where he is to abide. He is gone home, to the house of the dead, and for the world this world is not his. He is gone to his long home; for the days of his lying in the grave will be many. He is gone to his house of eternity; not only to his house whence he shall never return to this world, but to the house where he must be for ever.
This should make us willing to die, that at death we must go home; and why should we not long to go to our Father's house? And this should quicken us to get Ready to die, that we must then go to our long home, to an everlasting habitation.
[2.] Death will be an occasion of sorrow to our friends that love us; when man goes to his long home, the mourners go about the streets, the real mourners, and those, as now with us, distinguished by their habits as they go along the streets; the mourners for ceremony, that were hired to weep for the dead, both to express and to excite the real mourning. When we die, we not only remove to a melancholy house before us, but we leave a melancholy house behind us. Tears are a tribute due to the dead, and this, among other circumstances, makes it a serious thing to die. But in vain do we weep; for he who was before the house of mourning, and see the mourners go about the streets, if it do not help to make us serious and pious mourners in the closet.
[3.] Death will dissolve the frame of nature, and take down the earthly house of this tabernacle, which is elegantly described, v. 6. Then shall the sick. cordon, by which soul and body were wonderuntied, and those old friends be forced to part; then shall the golden bowl, which held the waters of life for us, be broken; then shall the fitcher, with which we used to fetch up water, for the constant support of life, and the repair of its decays, be broken, even at the fountain, so that it can fetch up no more, and the wheel, all these organs that serve for the collecting and distributing of nourishment, shall be broken, and disabled to do their office any more;

the body shall become like a watch when the spring is broken, the motion of all the wheels is stopped and they all stand still; the machine is taken to pieces; the heart beats no more, nor does the blood circulate. Some apply this to the ornaments and utensils of life; rich people must, at death, leave behind them their clothing, and furniture of silver and gold, and poor people their earthen pitchers, and the drawers of water will have their wheel broken.
[4.] Death will resolve us into our first principles,
v. 7. Man is a strange sort of creature, a ray of heaven united to a ced of earth; at death, these are separated, and each goes to the place whence it came.

First, The body, that ced of clay, returns to its own earth, it is made of the earth; Adam's body was so, and we are of the same mould; it is a house of clay, at death it is laid in the earth, and in a little while, it will be resolved into earth, not to be distinguishable from common earth, according to the promise, ( Gen. iii. 19.) Dust thou art, and therefore to dust thou shalt return. Let us not therefore indulge the appetites of the body, nor pamper it, (it will be worms' meat shortly,) nor let sin reign in our mortal bodies, for they are mortal, Rem. vi. 12.

Secondly, The soul, that beam of light, returns to that God, who, when he made man of the dust of the ground, breathed into him the breath of life, to make him a living soul; and shall become like a spirit, which is a part of God, and is the spirit of every man within him. When the fire consumes the wood, the flame ascends, when the ashes return to the earth out of which the wood grew.
The soul does not die with the body; it is redeemed from the power of the grave; (Ps. xlix.
15.) it can subsist without it, and will in a state of separation from it, as the candle burns, and burns brighter, when it is taken out of the dark lantern and exposed of the light. It is used to be said, that the soul is the light of the body; and this is, in a sense, true. It goes to God as a Judge, to give account of itself, and to be lodged either with the spirits in prison, (1 Pet. iii. 19.) or with the spirits in paradise, (Luke xxiv. 43.) according to what was done in the body. This makes death terrible to the wicked, whose souls go to God as an Avenger; and comfortable to the good soul, whose soul go to God as a Father, into whose hands they cheerfully commit them, through a Mediator, cut of whom sinners may justly dread to think of going to God.

8. Vanity of vanities, saith the preacher: all is vanity. 9. And moreover, because the preacher was wise, he still taught the people knowledge; yea, he gave good heed and sought out, and set in order many proverbs. 10. The preacher sought to find out acceptable words; and that which was written was upright, even words of truth. 11. The words of the wise are as goads, and as nails fastened by the masters of assemblies, which are given from one shepherd. 12. And further, by these, my son, be admonished: of making many books there is no end, and much study is a weariness of the flesh. Solomon is here drawing towards a close, and is

loath to part, till he has gained his point, and prevailed with his hearers, with his readers, to seek for that satisfaction in God only, and in their duty to him, which they can never find in the creature.

1. He repeats his text, v. 8. 1. As that which he had fully demonstrated the truth of, and so made good his undertaking in this manner, he had taught his hearers; and both his reasons and his application were to the purpose. 2. As that which he desired to inculcate both upon others and upon himself, to have it ready, and to make use of it, upon all occasions; we see it daily proved, let it therefore be daily improved; Vanity of vanities, all is vanity.

11. He recommends what he had written upon this subject, by divine direction and inspiration, to our serious consideration. The words of this book are faithful, and well worthy our acceptance, for—

1. They are the words of one that was a convert, a penitent, that could speak by dear-bought experience of the vanity of the world, and the folly of expecting great things from it. He was Coheleth, one gathered in from his wanderings, and gathered home to that God from whom he had revolted. Vanity of vanities, saith the penitent. All true penitents are convinced of the vanity of the world, for they find it to be none other than themselves; the burden of life, which they complain of it.

2. They are the words of one that was wise, wiser than any; endowed with extraordinary measures of wisdom; famous for it among his neighbours, who all sought unto him, to hear his wisdom, and therefore a competent judge of this matter; not only wise as a prince, but wise as a preacher—and preachers have need of wisdom to win souls.

3. He was one that made it his business to do good, and to use what means; Because he was wise, and knew he had not his wisdom for himself, any more than he had it from himself; he still taught the people that knowledge which he had found useful to himself, and hoped might be so to them too. It is the interest of princes to have their people well taught in religion, and no disarrangement to them to teach them themselves the good knowledge of the Lord, but their duty to encourage those whose office it is to teach them, and to speak comfortably to them. Christ, as God, is not the only wise, the common people, be despised, no, not by the wisest and greatest, as either unworthy or incapable of good knowledge; even those that are well taught, have need of to be still taught, that they may grow in knowledge.

4. He took a great deal of pains and care to do good, designing to teach the people knowledge; he did not put them off with any thing that came next to hand, because they were inferior people, and he a very wise man; but, considering the worth of the souls he preached to, and the weight of the subject he preached on, he gave good heed to what he read and heard from others, that, having stocked himself well, he might bring out of his treasury things new and old. He gave good heed to what he spake and wrote himself, and was choice and exact in it; all he did was elaborate. (1.) He chose the most profitable way of preaching, by proverbs, or short sentences, which would be memorable among the people, and remain to them a long and laboured period. (2.) He did not content himself with a few parables, or wise sayings, and repeat them again and again, but he furnished himself with many proverbs, a great variety of grave discourses, that he might have something to say on every occasion. (3.) He did not only give them such observations as were obvious and trite, but he sought out such as were surprising and uncommon; he digged into the mines of knowledge, and did not only pick up what lay on the surface. (4.) He did not deliver his heads and observations at random, as they came to mind, but methodised them; and set them in order, that they might appear in more strength and lustre.

5. He put what he had to say in such a dress as he thought would be most pleasing; He sought to find out acceptable words, words of delight; (v. 10.) and in such a style of discourse that good matter might not be spoiled by bad striping, and by the uniformity of the expression. Ministers should study, not for big words, or for fine words, but acceptable words, such as are likely to please men for their good, to edification, 1 Cor. x. 33. They would win souls must contrive how to win upon them with words filly spoken.

6. That which he wrote for our instruction of unquestionable certainty, and what we may rely upon; That which was written was upright and sincere, according to the real sentiments of this, the Prince of men, even words of truth, the exact representation of the thing as it is. These are sure not to miss their way who are guided by these words. What good will acceptable words do us, if they be not upright, and words of truth? Most are for smooth things, that flatter them, rather than right things, that direct them; (Isa. xxx. 10.) but to those that understand themselves, and their own interest, words of truth will ever prove more dear to them.

7. That which he and other holy men wrote, will be of great use and advantage to us, especially being inculcated upon us by the exposition of it, v. 11. Here observe, (1.) A double benefit accruing to us from divine truths, if duly applied and improved; they are profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, and instruction in righteousness. They are of use, [1.] To excite us to our duty; they are as goads to the ox that draws the plough, putting it forward when he is slack, and quickening him, to mend his pace. The truth of God is a goad to the heart, (Acts ii. 37.) and put them upon bethinking themselves, when they trifle and grow remiss, and exerting themselves with more vigour in their work. While our good affections are so apt as they are, to grow flat and cool, we have need of these goads. [2.] To engage us to persevere in our duty; they are as nails to those that are wavering and inconstant, to fix them to that which is good; they are as nails to those that walk beside the ways of the wicked, to keep them from falling; and nails to such as are desultory, and draw aside; means to establish the heart, and confirm good resolutions, that we may set our course to our duty, nor ever be taken off from it, but that what good there is in us may be as a nail fastened in a sure place, Ezra ix. 8. (2.) A double way of communicating divine truths, in order to these benefits. [1.] By the scriptures, as the standing rule, the words of the wise, of the prophets, who are called wise men, Matt. xxiii. 24. These we have in black and white, and may have recourse to them at any time, and make use of them as goads and as nails; by them we may teach ourselves, let them but come with pungency and power to the soul, let the impressions of them be deep and durable, and they will make us wise to salvation. [2.] By the ministry; to make the words of the wise more profitable to us, it is appointed that they should be impressed and fastened by the masters of assemblies. Solemn and grand assemblies for the reception of the divine institution, intended for the honour of God and the edification of his church, and are not only serviceable, but necessary, to those ends. There must be masters of these assemblies, who are Christ's ministers, and, as such, are to preside in them, to be God's mouth to the people, and their's to God. Their business is to fasten the words of the wise, and drive them as nails to the head, in order to which, the word of God is likewise as a hammer, Jer. xxviii. 29.
That which is written, and thus recommended to us, is of divine origin. Though it comes to us through various hands, (many wise men, and many masters of assemblies,) yet it is given by one and the same shepherd, the great Shepherd of Israel, that leads Joseph like a flock, Ps. lxxx. 1. God is that one Shepherd, whose good Spirit edited the scriptures, and assists the masters of the assemblies in opening and applying the scriptures. These words of the wise are the true sayings of God, on which we may rest our souls; from that one Shepherd all ministers must receive what they deliver, and speak according to the light of the written word.

9. The sacred inspired writings, if we will but make use of them, are sufficient to guide us in the way to true happiness, and we need not, in the pursuit of that, to till ourselves with the search of other writings; (v. 12.) And further, nothing now remains but to tell thee that of making many books there is no end; (1.) Of writing many books. If what I have written, serve not to convince thee of the vanity of the world, and the necessity of being religious, neither wouldst thou be convinced, if I should write ever so much. "If the end be not attained in the use of those books of scripture which God has blessed us with, neither should we obtain the end, if we had twice as many more; nay, if we had so many that the whole world could not contain them, (John xxi. 25.) and much study of them would but confound us, and would rather be a weariness to the flesh than any advantage to the soul; we have as much as God saw fit to give us, saw fit for us, and saw us fit for. Much less can it be expected that those who will not by these be admonished, should be wrought upon by other writings. Let men write ever so many books for the conduct of human life, write till they have tired themselves with much study, they cannot give better instructions than those we have from the word of God. Or, (2.) Of buying many books, making ourselves masters of them, and masters of what is in them, by much study; still the desire of learning would be unsatisfied; it will give a man indeed the best entertainment, and the best accomplishment, this world can afford him, but if we be not by these admonished of the vanity of the world and human learning, among other things, and its insufficiency to make us happy without true piety, alas, there is no end of it, nor real benefit by it; it will weary the body, but never give the soul any true satisfaction. The great Mr. Selden subscribed to this, when he owned that in all the books he had read, he never found that on which he could rest his soul, but in the holy scripture, especially Tit. ii. 11, 12. By these therefore let us be admonished."

13. Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter; Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man. 14. For God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil.

The great inquiry which Solomon prosecutes in this book, is, What is that good which the sons of men should do? ch. ii. 3. What is the true way to true happiness, the certain means to attain our great end? He had in vain sought it among those things which most men are eager in pursuit of, but here, at length, he has found it, by the help of that discovery which God anciently made to man, (Job xxviii. 28.) That serious godliness is the only way to true happiness; Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter, the return entered upon the writ of inquiry, the result of this diligent search; you shall have all I have been driving at in two words. He does not say, Do you hear it, but Let us hear it; for preachers must themselves be carriers of that word which they preach to others; must hear it as from God; those are teachers by the head, who teach others, and not themselves, Rom. ii. 21. Every word of God is pure and precious, but some words are worthy of more special remark, as this here; the Masorites begin it with a capital letter, as that Deut. vi. 4. Solomon himself puts a note before it, demanding attention in these words, Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter. Observe here,

1. The summary of religion. Setting aside all matters of doubtful dispute, to be religious, is, to fear God and keep his commandments. (1.) The root of religion is the fear of God reigning in the heart; a reverence of his majesty, a deference to his authority, and a dread of his wrath. Fear God, worship God, give him the honour due to his name, in all the instances of true devotion, inward and outward. See Rev. xiv. 7. (2.) The rule of religion is the law of God revealed in the scriptures. Our first toward God must be taught by his commandments, (Isa. xxxix. 13.) and those we must keep, and carefully observe. Wherever the fear of God is uppermost in the heart, there will be a respect to all his commandments, and care to keep them. In vain do we pretend to fear God, if we do not make conscience of our duty to him.

2. The vast importance of it; This is the whole duty of man; it is all his business, and all his blessedness; our whole duty is summed up in this, and our whole comfort is bound up in this. It is the concern of every man, and ought to be his chief and continual care; it is the common concern of all men, of their whole time. It is nothing to a man whether he be rich or poor, high or low, but it is the main matter, it is all to a man, to fear God, and do as he bids him.

3. A powerful inducement to this, v. 14. We shall see of what vast consequence it is to us, that we be religious, if we consider the account we must every one of us shortly give of ourselves to God; thence he argued against a voluptuous and vicious life, (ch. ix. 9.) and here for a religious life. God shall bring every work into judgment. Note, (1.) There is a judgment to come, in which every man's eternal state will be finally determined. (2.) God himself will be the Judge, God-man will, not only because he has a right to judge, but because he is perfectly fit for it; infinitely wise and just. (3.) Every work will then be brought into judgment, will be inquired into, and called over again. It will be a day to bring to remembrance every thing done in the body. (4.) The great thing to be then judged of concerning every work, is, whether it be good or evil, conformable to the will of God, or a violation of it. (5.) Even secret things, both good and evil, will be brought to light, and brought to account, in the judgment of the great day; (Rom. ii. 16.) there is no good work, no bad work, hid, but shall then be made manifest. (6.) In consideration of the judgment to come, and the strictness of that judgment, it highly concerns us now to be very strict in our walkings with God, that we may give up our account with joy.
EXPOSITION,

WITH

SONG OF SOLOMON.

All scripture, we are sure, is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for the support and advancement of the interests of his kingdom among men, and it is never the less so for there being found in it some things dark and hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned and unstable, wrest to their own destruction. In our belief both of the divine extraction, and of the spiritual exposition, of this book, we are confirmed by the ancient, constant, and concurring testimony, both of the church of the Jews, to whom were committed the oracles of God, and who never made any doubt of the authority of this book, and of the Christian church, which happily succeeds them in that trust and honour.

I. It must be confessed, on the one hand, that if he who rarely reads this book, be asked, as the enmarch was, Understandest thou what thou readest? he will have more reason than he had to say, How can I, except some man shall guide me? The books of scripture-history and prophecy are very like one another, but this Song of Solomon's is very unlike the songs of his father David; there is not the name of God in it, it is never quoted in the New Testament, we find not in it any expressions of natural religion, or pious devotion, no, nor is it introduced by vision, or any of the marks of immediate revelation; it seems as hard as any part of scripture to be made a savour of life unto life, nay, and to those who come to the reading of it with carnal minds, and corrupt affections, it is in danger of being made a savour of death unto death; it is a flower out of which they extract poison; and therefore the Jewish doctors advised their young people not to read it till they were thirty years old, lest by the abuse of that which is most pure and sacred, (horrendum dictu—horrible to say!) the flames of lust should be kindled with fire from heaven, which is intended for the altar only. But,

II. It must be confessed, on the other hand, that, with the help of the many faithful guides we have for the understanding of this book, it appears to be a very bright and powerful ray of heavenly light, admirably fitted to excite pious and devout affections in holy souls, to draw out their desires toward God, to increase their delight in him, and improve their acquaintance and communion with him. It is an allegory, the letter of which kills those who rest in that, and look no further, but the spirit of which gives life, 2 Cor. iii. 6. John vi. 63. It is a parable, which makes divine things more difficult to those who do not love them, but more plain and pleasant to those who do, Matth. xiii. 14, 16. Experienced Christians here find a counterpart of their experiences, and to them it is intelligible, while they neither understand it, nor relish it, who have no part or lot in the matter. It is a song, an Epithalamium, or nuptial song, wherein, by the expressions of love between a bridegroom and his bride, are set forth, and illustrated, the mutual affections that pass between God and a distinguished remnant of mankind. It is a pastoral; the bride and bridegroom, for the more lively representation of humility and innocence, are brought in as a shepherd and his shepherdess. Now, 1. This song might easily be taken in a spiritual sense by the Jewish church, for whose use it was first composed, and was so taken, as appears, by the Chaldee Paraphrase and the most ancient Jewish expositors. God betrothed the people of Israel to himself, he entered into covenant with them, and it was a marriage-covenant. He had given abundant proofs of his love to them, and required of them that they should love him with all their heart and soul. Idolatry was often spoken of as spiritual adultery, and doing upon idols, to prevent which, this song was penned, representing the complacency which God took in Israel, and which Israel ought to take in God, and encouraging them to continue faithful to him, though he might seem sometimes to withdraw and hide himself from them, and to wait for the further manifestation of himself in the promised Messiah. 2. It may more easily be taken in a spiritual sense by the Christian church, because the descensions and communications of divine love appear more rich and free under the gospel than they did under the law, and the communion between heaven and earth more familiar. God sometimes spoke of himself as the Husband of the Jewish church, (Isa. lxx. 4. Hos. xx. 16, 19.) and rejoiced in it as his bride, Isa. lxii. 4, 5. But more frequently is Christ represented as the Bridegroom of his church, (Matt. xxv. 1. Rom. vii. 4. 2 Cor. xi. 2. Eph. v. 32.) and the church as the bride, the Lamb's wife, Rev. xix. 7.—xxi. 2, 9. Pursuant to this metaphor, Christ and the church in general, Christ and particular believers, are here discoursing with abundance of mutual esteem and endearment. The best key to this book is the 45th Psalm, which we find applied to Christ in the New Testament, and therefore this ought to be so too. It requires some pains to find out what may, probably, be the meaning of the Holy Spirit in the several parts of this book: as David's songs are many of them level to the capacity of SOLOMON'S SONG, I.

Chap. I.

In this chapter, after the title of the book, (v. 1.) we have Christ and his church, Christ and a believer, expressing their esteem for each other. 1. The bride, the church, speaks to the Bridegroom, (v. 2. 4.) to the daughters of Jerusalem, (v. 5. 6.) and then to the Bridegroom, v. 7. II. Christ, the Bridegroom, speaks in answer to the complaints and request of his spouse, v. 8. 11. III. The church expresses the great value she has for Christ, and the delights she takes in communion with him, v. 12. 14. IV. Christ commends the church's beauty, v. 15. V. The church replies, chapter iv. 16. 19. Where there is a fire of true love to Christ in the heart, this will be of use to blow it up into a flame.

1. The Song of Songs, which is Solomon's.

We have here the title of this book, showing,

1. The nature of it; it is a song, that it might be the better answer the intention, which is to stir up the affections, and to heat them, which poetry will be very instrumental to do. The subject is pleasing, and therefore fit to be treated of in a song, in singing of which we may make melody with our hearts unto the Lord. It is evangelical; and gospel-times should be times of joy, for gospel-grace puts a new song into our mouths, Ps. xcvi. 1.

2. The dignity of it; it is the song of songs, a most excellent song; not only above any human composition, or above all the other songs which Solomon penned, but even above any other of the scripture-songs, as having more of Christ in it.

3. The penman of it; it is Solomon's; it is not the song of fools, as many of the songs of love are, but the song of the wisest of men; nor can any man give a better proof of his wisdom than to celebrate the love of God to mankind, and to excite his own love to God, and that of others with it. Solomon's songs were a thousand and five; (1 Kings iv. 32.) those that were of other subjects are lost, but this of seraphic love remains, and will, to the end of time. Solomon, like his father, was addicted to poetry, and, which way soever a man's genius lies, he should endeavour to honour God, and edify the church, with it. One of Solomon's names was Je-didiah, beloved of the Lord; (2 Sam. xii. 25.) and none so fit to write of the Lord's love, as he that had himself so great an interest in it; none of all the apostles wrote so much of love, as he that was himself the beloved disciple, and lay in Christ's bosom. Solomon, as a king, had great affairs to mind and manage, which took up much of his thoughts and time, yet he found heart and leisure for this and other religious exercises. Men of business ought to be devout men, and not to think that their business will excuse them from that which is every man's great business—to keep up communion with God. It is not certain when Solomon penned this sacred song; some think that he penned it after he recovered himself by the grace of God from his backslidings, as a further proof of his repentance, and as if, by doing good to many with this song, he would atone for the hurt he had perhaps done with loose, vain, amorous, songs, when he loved many strange wives; now he turned his wit the right way. It is more probable that he penned it in the beginning of his time, while he kept close to God, and kept up his communion with him; and perhaps he put this song, with his father's psalms, into the hands of the chief musician, for the service of the temple, not without a key to it, for the right understanding of it. Some think that it was penned upon occasion of his marriage with Pharaoh's daughter, but that is uncertain; the tower of Lebanon, which is mentioned in this book, (ch. vii. 4.) was not built, as it is supposed, till long after that marriage. We may reasonably think that when in the height of his prosperity he loved the Lord, (1 Kings iii. 3.) he thus served him with joyfulness and gladness of heart in the abundance of all things. It may be rendered, The song of songs, which is concerning Solomon, who, as the son and successor of David, on whom the covenant of royalty was entitled, as the founder of the temple, and as one that excelled in wisdom and wealth, was a type of Christ, in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, and yet is a greater than Solomon; this is therefore a song concerning him. It is here fitly placed after Ecclesiastes; for when by that book we are thoroughly convinced of the vanity of the creature, and its insufficiency to satisfy us, and make a happiness for us, we shall be quickened to seek for happiness in the love of Christ, and that true transcendent pleasure which is to be found only in communion with God through him. The voice in the wilderness, that was to prepare Christ's way, cried, All flesh is grass.

2. Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth; for thy love is better than wine. 3. Because of the savour of thy good ointments, thy name is as ointment poured forth, therefore do the virgins love thee. 4. Draw me, we will run after thee. The King hath brought me into his chambers: we will be glad and rejoice in thee; we will remember thy love more than wine: the upright love thee.

5. I am black, but comely, O ye daughters of Jerusalem; as the tents of Kedar, as the curtains of Solomon. 6. Look not upon me, because I am black, because the sun hath looked upon me: my mother's children were angry with me; they made me the keeper of the vineyards; but mine own vineyard have I not kept.

The spouse, in this dramatic poem, is here first introduced addressing herself to the Bridegroom, and then to the daughters of Jerusalem.

I. To the Bridegroom; not giving him any name or title, but beginning abruptly, Let him kiss me; like Mary Magdalen to the supposed Gardener, (John xx. 15.) "If thou hast borne him hence, meaning Christ, but not naming him; the heart had been his, and let me know now that this is so, then the tokens of his favour." Thus the Old Testament Church desired Christ's manifesting himself in the flesh, to be no longer under the law as a schoolmaster, under a dispensation of bondage and terror, but to receive the communications of divine grace in the gospel, in which God is reconciling the world unto himself, binding up and healing what by the law was torn and smitten; as the mother kisses the child that she has cherished. "Let him no longer send to me, but come himself; no longer speak by angels and prophets, but let me have the words of his own mouth, those gracious words, (Luke iv. 22.) which will be to me as the kisses of his mouth, sure tokens of reconciliation, as Esau's kissing Jacob was." All gospel-duty is summed up in our kissing the Son; (Ps. ii. 12.) so all gospel-grace is summed up in his kissing us, as the father of the prodigal kissed him when he returned a penitent. It is a kiss of repentance. Kiss Thee, the Spirit, says, (Prov. xxvii. 6.) so are the kisses of grace to the wounds of the law. Thus all true believers earnestly desire the manifestations of Christ's love to their souls; they desire no more to make them happy than the assurances of his favour, the lifting up of the light of his countenance upon them, (Ps. iv. 6, 7.) and the knowledge of that love of his which passes knowledge; this is the one thing they desire, Ps. xxvii. 4. They are ready to welcome the manifestations of Christ's love to their souls by his Spirit, and to return to them in the humble professions of love to him, and complacency in him, above all. "The fruit of his lips is praise, Isa. xi. 19. Let him give me ten thousand kisses, whose very fruition makes me desire him more and more, whereas all other pleasures sour and wither by using those of the Spirit become more delightful." So Bishop Reynolds.

(1.) Because of the great esteem she had for his love; Thy love is better than wine. Wine makes glad the heart, revives the drooping spirits, and exhilarates them, but gracious souls take more pleasure in loving Christ, and being loved of him, in the fruits and gifts of his love, and in the pledges and assurances of it, than any man ever took in the most exquisite delights of sense, and it is more reviving to them than ever the richest cordial was to one near death, who was sure of his recovery. If we take the change of the person, (Heb. xi. 13.) who speaks of him as absent, or as if she was afraid to speak to him; but, in the next words, she sees him near at hand, and therefore directs her speech to him, "Thy love, thy loves," (so the word is,) "so earnestly desire, because I highly esteem it." (2.) Because of the diffusive fragrancy of his love, and the fruits of it; (v. 3.) "Because of the savour of thy good ointment, the agreeableness and acceptableness of thy graces and comforts to all that rightly understand and embrace them. Thy name is an ointment poured forth, (v. 4.) and all that whereby thou hast made thyself known; thy very name is precious to all the saints, it is an ointment and perfume which rejoices the heart." The unfolding of Christ's name is as the opening of a box of precious ointment, which the room is filled with the odour of; the preaching of his gospel was the manifesting of the savour of his knowledge in every place, 2 Cor. iv. 6. Then Spirit and the oil of gladness wherewith Christ was anointed, (Heb. i. 9.) and all true believers have that unction, (1 John ii. 27.) so that he is precious to them, and they to him, and to one another. A good name is a precious ointment, but Christ's name is more fragrant than any other. Wisdom, like oil, makes the face to shine; but the Redeemer outshines, in beauty, all others. The name of Christ is not now like ointment scaled up, as it had been long, (Ask not after my name, for it is secret,) but like ointment poured forth; which denotes both the freeness and the fulness of the communications of his grace by the gospel.

(3.) Because of the general affection that all holy souls have to him; Therefore do the virgins love thee. It is Christ's love shed abroad in our hearts, that draws them out in love to him; all that are pure from the corruptions of sin, that preserve the chastity of their own spirits, and are true to the vows they have made to God, that not only suffer their affection to be violated, but cannot bear so much as to be solicited by the world and the flesh, those are the virgins that love Jesus Christ, and follow him whithersoever he goes, Rev. xiv. 4. And because Christ is the Darling of all the pure in heart, let him be ours, and let our desire be toward him and toward the kisses of his mouth.

The Bridegroom's fellowship, 4. Observe here,

(1.) Her petition for divine grace; Draw me. This implies sense of distance from him, desire of union with him; "Draw me to thyself, draw me nearer, draw me home to thee." She had prayed that he would draw nigh to her; (v. 2.) in order to that, she prays that he would draw nigh to him. "Draw me, not only with the moral suspense which there is in the fragrant of the good ointments, not only with the attractions of that name which is an ointment poured forth, but with supernatural grace, with the cords of a man and the bands of love," Hos. xi. 4. Christ has told us that none come to him but such as the Father draws, John vi. 44. We are not only weak, and cannot come of ourselves any further than we are helped, but we are naturally backward and averse to come, and therefore must pray for those influences and operations of the Spirit by which we may be enabled to come to him and be willing, Ps. cxv. 3. "Draw me, else I move not; overpower the world and the flesh that would draw me from thee." We are not driven to Christ, but drawn in such a way as is agreeable to rational creatures.

(2.) Her promise to improve that grace; Draw me, and then we will run after thee. See how the doctrine of special and effectual grace consists with our duty, and is a powerful engagement to, and yet reserves all the glory of all the good that is in us to God only. Observe, [1.] The flowing forth of the soul after Christ, and its ready compliance with him, are the effect of his grace; we could not run after him, if he did not draw us, 2 Cor. iii. 5. Phil. iv. 13. [2.] The grace which God gives us must diligently improve; when Christ by his Spirit draws us, we must with our spirits run after him. As God says, I will, and you shall, (Ezek. xxxvi. 27.) so we must say, 'We will, and we shall.' (Ps. lix. 3.) when with loving-kindness to us he draws us, (Jer. xxxi. 3.) we with loving-kindness to him must run after him, Isa. xl. 31. Observe the difference between the petition and the promise; "Draw me, and then we will run." When Christ pours out his Spirit upon the church in general, which is his bride, all the members of it do then receive enlivening, quickening influences, and are made to run to him with the more cheerfulness, Isa. lv. 3. Or, "Draw me," (says the believing soul,) "and then I will not only follow thee myself as fast as I can, but will bring all mine along with me; We will run after thee, and the virgin that love thee, (v. 3.) and all that I have any interest in, or influence upon, I and my house, (Josh. xxiv. 15.) I and the transgressors, whom I will teach thy ways," Ps. li. 15. Those that put themselves forth, in compliance with divine command, to get their zeal still further increased, are many, 2 Cor. ix. 2. Those that are lively will be active; when Philip was drawn to Christ, he drew Nathanael; and they will be exemplary, and so will win those that would not be won by the word.

(3.) The immediate answer that was given to this prayer; The King has drawn me, has brought me into his chambers. It is not so much an answer fetched by faith from the word of Christ's grace, as an answer fetched by experience from the workings of his grace. If we observe, as we work in the returns of prayer, we may find that sometimes, while we are yet speaking, Christ hears, Isa. lxv. 24. The Bridegroom is a King; so much the more wonderful is his condescension in the invitations and entertainments that he gives us, and so much the greater reason have we to accept of them, and to run after him. God is the King that has made the marriage-covenant with his Son, (Matt. xxvii. 2.) and inings in even the face of his Son, which the most shy and bashful are compelled to come in.

They that are drawn to Christ are brought not only into his courts, into his palaces, (Ps. xlv. 15.) but into his presence-chamber, where his secret is with them, (Ps. xxv. 14.) where he is free with them, (John xiv. 21.) and where they are safe in his pavilion, Ps. xxvii. 5. Isa. xxvii. 5. Those that wait at wisdom's gate, shall be made to come (so the word is) into her chambers, they shall be led into truth and comfort.

(4.) The wonderful complacency which the spouse takes in the honour which the King put upon her. Being brought into the chamber, [1.] "We have what we would have; our desires are crowned with unspeakable delights; all our griefs vanish, and we will be glad and rejoice. If a day in the courts, much more an hour in the chambers, is better than a thousand days, else would they be glad, and have reason to go on their way rejoicing, as the chieftains; (Acts viii. 39.) and that joy will enlarge our heart, and be our strength, Neh. viii. 10. [2.] All our joy shall centre in God; "We will rejoice, not in the ointments, or the chambers, but in thee. It is God only that is our exceeding joy, Ps. xlii. 4. We have no joy but in Christ, and which we are indebted to him for." Gaudium in Domino—Joy in the Lord, was the ancient salutation, and Salus in Domino sempiterna—Eternal salvation in the Lord. [3.] "We will retain the memory of his kindness, and of the promise he has made to us, and never will forget; we will remember thy love more than wine; not only thy love itself, (v. 2.) but the very remembrance of it, shall be more grateful to us than the strongest cordial to the spirits, or the most palatable liquor to the taste. We will remember to give thanks for thy love, and it shall make more durable impressions upon us than anything in this world.

(5.) The communion which a gracious soul has with all the saints in this conversation with Christ. In the chambers to which we are brought, we not only meet with him, but meet with one another; (1 John i. 7.) for the upright love thee; the congregation, the generation, of the upright love thee. Whatever others do, all that are Israelites indeed, and faithful to God, will love Jesus Christ. Whatever differences of apprehension and affection there may be among Christians in other things, this they are all agreed in, Jesus Christ is precious to them. The upright here are the same with the virgins, v. 3. All that remember his love more than wine, will love him with a superlative love. Nor is any love acceptable to Christ but the love of the upright, love in sincerity, Eph. vi. 24.

II. The spouse applies herself to the daughters of Jerusalem, v. 5, 6. The church in general, being in distress, speaks to particular churches to guard them against the danger they were in, of being offended at the church's sufferings, 1 Thess. iv. 3. Or, the believer speaks to those that were professors at large in the church, but not of it; or to weak Christians, babes in Christ, that labour under much ignorance, infirmity, and mistake, not perfectly instructed, and yet willing to be taught, in the things of God. She observed these by-standers look disdainfully upon her, because of her blackness, in respect both of sins and sufferings, upon the account of which she supposed she had little reason to expect the kisses she wished for, (v. 2.) or to expect that they should join with her in her joys, v. 4. She therefore endeavours to remove this offence; she owns she is black; guilt blackens; the heresies, scandals, and offences, that happen in the church, make her black; and the best saints have their failings; sorrow blackens, that seems to be especially meant; the church is often in a low condition, mean, and poor, and in appearance despicable; her beauty sullied, and the grace that is in her with mourning: she is an mourning, mourning weeds, clothed with sackcloth, as the Nazarites that were become blacker than a coal, Lam. iv. 8.

Now, to take off this offence,

1. She asserts her own comeliness notwithstanding; (v. 5.) I am black, but comely; black as the tents of Kedar, in which the shepherds lived, which were very coarse, and never whitened, weather-beaten and covered with scabs. I am, as it were, the curtains of Solomon, the furniture of whose rooms, no doubt, was sumptuous and rich, in proportion to the stateliness of his houses. The church is sometimes black with persecution, but comely in patience, constancy, and consolation, and never the less amiable in the eyes of Christ; black in the account of men, but comely in God's esteem; black in some that are a scandal to her, but comely in others that are not; and when they are black in themselves, they are black in others, and in all others; and I says, I am black in myself, and I am comely in all others; but I am black, and I am comely. The Israelites are black in themselves, but comely in Christ, with the comeliness that he puts upon them; black outwardly, for the world knows them not, but all glorious within, Ps. xlv. 13. St. Paul was weak, and yet strong; (2 Cor. xii. 10.) and so the church is black, and yet comely; a believer is a sinner, and yet a saint; his own righteousness are as filthy rags, but he is clothed with the robe of Christ's righteousness. The Chaldee Paraphrase applies it to the people of Israel's blackness when they made the golden calf, and their commonness when they repented of it.

2. She gives an account how she came to be so black. The blackness was not natural, but contracted, and was owing to the hard usage that had been given her; Look not upon me, so scrupulously, because I am black. We must take heed with what eye we look upon the church, especially when she is in black. Thou shouldest not have looked upon the days of the blackness, the day of his affliction, Obad. 12. Be not offended; for,

(1.) I am black, by reason of my sufferings; The sun has looked upon me. She was fair and comely, whiteness was her proper colour, but she got this blackness by the burden and heat of the day, which she was forced to bear. She was sun-burnt, seared with tribulation and persecution; (Matt. xxiii. 6, 21.) and the greatest beauties, if exposed to the weather, are soon tarnished. Observe how she mitigates her troubles; she does not say, as Jacob, (Gen. xxxi. 40.) In the day the drought consumed me, but The sun has looked upon me; for it becomes not God's suffering people to make the worst of their sufferings. But what was the matter? [1.] She fell under the displeasure of those of her own house; My mother's children were angry with me. She was in perils by false brethren; her foes were those of her own house, (Matt. xvi. 3.) brethren by birth, who are the posterity of her mother, and are admitted to a same sacred corporation; the children of the church her mother, but not of God her Father; they were angry with her. The Samaritans, who claimed kindred to the Jews, were vexed at any thing that tended to the prosperity of Jerusalem, Neh. ii. 10. Note, It is no new thing for the people of God to fall under the anger of their own mother's children. It was thou, a man, mine equal, Ps. lv. 12, 13. This makes the trouble the more heart-breaking; from such it is taken unkindly; and the anger of such is implacable; a brother offended is hard to be won. [2.] They dealt very hardly with her; They made me the keeper of the vineyards. First, They seduced me to sin, drew me into false worships, to serve their gods, which was like dressing their vineyards, keeping the vine of Sodom; and they would not let me keep my own vineyard, serve my own God, and observe those pure worship, which he gave me, in charge, and which I do, and ever will, own for mine. These are the grievances which good people complain most of in a time of persecution, that their consciences are forced, and that those, who rule them with rigour, say to their souls, Bow down, that we may go over, Isa. li. 23. Or, Secondly, They brought me into trouble, imposed that upon me which was toilsome, and burdensome, and very disgraceful. Keeping the vineyards was base, servile, work, and very grievous, Isa. lxi. 5. Her mother's children made her the drudge of the family. Cursed be their anger for it was fierce, and their wrath for it was cruel. The spouse of Christ has met with a great deal of hard usage.

(2.) My sufferings are such as I have deserved; for my own vineyard have I not kept. How unjustly indeed my brethren are in persecuting me, God is here representing; not because I am justly made a slavish keeper of men's vineyards, because I have been a careless keeper of the vineyards God has intrusted me with. Slothful servants of God are justly made to serve their enemies, that they may know his service, and the service of the kings of the countries, 2 Chron. xii. 8. Deut. xxviii. 47, 48. Ezek. xx. 23, 24. "Think not the worse of the ways of God for my sufferings, for I smart for my own folly." Note, When God's people are oppressed and persecuted, it becomes them to acknowledge their own sin to be the producing cause of their troubles, especially that carelessness in keeping their vineyards, so that it has been like the field of the slothful.

7. Tell me, O thou whom my soul loveth, where thou feedest, where thou makest thy flock to rest at noon; for why should I be as one that turneth aside by the flocks of thy companions? 3. If thou know not, O thou fairest among women, go thy way forth by the footsteps of the flock, and feed thy kids beside the shepherds' tents. 9. I have compared thee, O my love, to a company of horses in Pharaoh's chariots. Thy cheeks are comely with rows of jewels, thy neck with chains of gold. 11. We will make thee borders of gold, with studs of silver.

Here is,

I. The humble petition which the spouse presents to her Beloved, the shepherdess to the Shepherd, the church and every believer to Christ, for a more free and intimate communion with him. She turns from the thoughts of the feet of the flock, and the complaint of her sins and of her troubles, and looks up to heaven for relief and succour against both, v. 7. Where observe, 1. The title she gives to Christ, O thou whom my soul loveth. Note, It is the undoubted character of all true believers, that their souls love Jesus Christ, which intimates both the sincerity and the strength of their love; they love him with all their hearts; and they that do so may come to him boldly, and may humbly plead it with him. 2. The opinion she has of him as the good Shepherd of the sheep; she doubts not but he feeds his flock, and makes them rest at noon. Jesus Christ graciously provides both repast and repose for his sheep; they are not starved, but well fed; not scattered upon the mountains, but fed together; fed in green pastures; and, in the hot time of the day, fed by the still waters, and made to lie down under a cool refreshing shade. Is it with God's people a manner of odd and troublous life? Flocks and fowls! Christ has rest for them, he carries them in his arms, Isa. xi. 11. 3. Her request to him that she might be admitted into his society; Tell me where thou feedest. Those that would be told, that would be taught, what they are concerned to know and do, must apply themselves to Jesus Christ, and beg of him to teach them, to tell them. "Tell me where to find thee, where I may have conversation with thee, where thou feedest and tendest thy flock, that there I may have some of thy company." Observe, by the way, We should not, in love to our friends and their company, tempt them, or urge them, to neglect their business, but desire such an enjoyment of them as will consist with it, and, rather, if we can, to join with them in their business, and help to forward it. "Tell me where thou feedest, and there I will sit with thee, walk with thee, feed thy flock with thine, and not hinder thee or myself, bring thy work with me." Note, They whose souls love Jesus Christ, earnestly desire to have communion with him, by his word in which he speaks to us, and by prayer in which we speak to him, and to share in the privileges of his flock; and we may learn from the care he takes of his church to provide convenient food and rest for it, how to take care of our own souls, which are our charge.

4. The plea she uses for the enforcing this request; For why should I be as one that turneth aside by, gives of his spouse. To be given in marriage, in the Hebrew dialect, is to be praised; (Ps. lxviii. 63; margin; so this spouse is here; her husband and her compeer the Solomon, (Prov. xxxi. 28.) he praises her, as is usual in poems, because... 1. He calls her his love; (v. 2.) it is an endeavoring compellation often used in this book; “My friend, my companion, my familiar.” 2. He compares her to a set of strong and stately horses in Pharaoh’s chariots. Egypt was famous for the best horses, Solomon had his from thence, and Pharaoh, no doubt, had the choicest the country afforded for his own chariots. God had furnished him with his own weakness, and the devils had made a prey of by her enemies; “Fear not,” says Christ; “I have made thee like a company of horses, I have put strength into thee as I have done into the horse, (Job xxxix. 19.) so that thou shalt with a gracious boldness mock at fear, and (not be affrighted,) like the lion, Prov. xxviii. 1. “The Lord has made thee as his goodly horse in the day of battle, Zech. x. 9. I have compared thee to my company of horses which triumphed over Pharaoh’s chariots, the holy angels, horses of fire.” Hab. iii. 13. Thou didst walk through the sea with thine horses; and see Is. lxiii. 13. We are weak in ourselves, but if Christ make us as horses, strong and bold, we need not fear what all the powers of darkness can do against us. 3. He admires the beauty and ornaments of her countenance; (v. 10.) Thy cheeks are comely with rows of jewels, the attire of the head, curls of hair, or favours, so some; or knots of ribbands; thy neck also with chains, such as persons of the first rank wear, chains of gold. The ordinances of Christ are the ornaments of the church; the graces, gifts, and comforts of the Spirit, are the adorning of every believing soul, and beautify it; these render it, in the sight of God, of great price. The ornaments of the saints are many, but all orderly disposed in rows and chains, in which there is a mutual connexion with, and dependence upon, each other. The beauty is not from any thing in themselves, from the neck, or from the cheeks, but from the ornaments with which they are set off. It was comeliness which I put upon thee, saith the Lord God; for we were born not only naked, but polluted, Ezek. xvi. 14.

IV. His gracious purpose to add her ornaments; for God has given true grace, he will give more grace; to him that has shall be given. Is the church crowned with the crown of grace, as the horses in Pharaoh’s chariots? Is she crowned with the exercise of grace, as with rows of jewels, and chains of gold? She shall be yet further beautified; (v. 11.) We will make thee borders of gold, inlaid, or enamelled, with stud of silver. Whatever is wanting, shall be made up, till the church and every true believer come to be perfect in beauty; see Ezek. xvi. 14. This is here undertaken to be done by the churches, but Ezekiel gives the number of the three persons in the Head; We will do it; that is, God, by his Spirit, will make man; so let us new-make him, and perfect his beauty.” The same that is the Author, will be the Finisher, of the good work; and it cannot miscarry.

12. While the King sitteth at his table, my spikenard sendeth forth the smell thereof. 13. A bundle of myrrh is my well-beloved unto me; he shall lie all night betwixt my breasts. 14. My beloved is unto me as a cluster of camphire in the vineyards of En-gedi. 15. Behold, thou art fair, my love; behold, thou art fair, thou host doves’ eyes. 16. Behold, thou art fair, my beloved, yea, pleasant: also our bed is green. 17.
The beams of our house are cedar, and our rafters of fir.

Here the conference is carried on between Christ and his spouse, and endearments are mutually exchanged.

1. Believers take a great complacency in Christ, and in communion with him. To you that believe, he hath promised, above any thing in this world, 1 Pet. ii. 7. Observe,

1. The humble reverence believers have for Christ as their Sovereign, v. 12. He is a King, in respect both of dignity and dominion; he wears the crown of honour, he bears the sceptre of power, both which are the unspeakable satisfaction of all his people. This King has his royal table spread in the gospel, in which is made for all nations a feast of fat things, Isa. xxv. 6. Wisdom has furnished her table, Prov. ix. 1. He sits at this table to see his guests, (Matth. xxii. 11.) to see that nothing wanting that is fit for them; he sups with them, and they with him; (Rev. iii. 20.) he has fellowship with them, and rejoices in them; he sits at his table to bid them welcome, and carve for them, as Christ brake the five loaves, and gave to his disciples, that they might distribute to the multitude; he sits there to receive petitions, as Ahasuerus admitted himself at the banquet. He has promised to be present with his people in his ordinances always. Then believers do him all the honour they can, and study how to express their esteem of him, and gratitude to him, as Mary did when she anointed his head with the ointment of spikenard that was very costly, one pound of it worth three hundred pence, and so fragrant, that the house was filled with the pleasing odour of it; (John xii. 3.) which story seems as if it were designed to this passage, for Christ has a sitting at table. When good Christians, in any religious duty, especially in the ordinance of the Lord's supper, where the King is pleased, as it were, to sit with us at his own table, have their graces exercised, their hearts broken by repentance, healed by faith, and inflamed with holy love and desire towards Christ, and with joyful expectations of the glory to be revealed, then the spikenard scents forth the King thereof; Christ is pleased to receive the self-honoured guest, and to accept of it as an instance of respect to him, as it was in the wise men of the East, who paid their homage to the new-born King of the Jews, by presenting to him frankincense and myrrh. The graces of God's Spirit in the hearts of believers are exceeding precious in themselves, and pleasing to Christ; and his presence in ordinances draws them out into act and exercise. If he withdraw, graces wither and languish, as plants in the absence of the sun; if he approach, the face of the soul is renewed, as of the earth in the spring; and then it is time to bestir ourselves, that we may not lose the glee, nor lose the game; for nothing is done acceptably, but what graces do, Heb. xii. 28.

2. The strong affection they have for Christ as their Beloved, their well-beloved, v. 13. Christ is not only beloved by all believing souls, but is their well-beloved, their heart's love, their soul's delight; he is their Captain, and they their hearts, which no rival can be admitted to, the innermost and uppermost place. Observe,

1. How Christ is accounted of by all believers; He is a bundle of myrrh, and a cluster of camphire, something, we may be sure, may every thing, that is pleasant and delightful. The doctrine of his gospel, and the comforts of his Spirit, are very refreshing to them, and they rest in him, and enjoy him, and all the delights of sense are comparable to the spiritual pleasure they have in meditating on Christ, and enjoying him. There is a complicated sweetness in Christ, and an abundance of it; there is a bundle of myrrh, and a cluster of camphire; we are not straitened in him in whom there is all fulness. The word translated camphire, is copher, the same word that signifies aloes, or frankincense; Christ is a Cluster of merit and righteousness to all believers, a golden treasure the doors of which they never enter; he is the frankincense for their sins. Observe what stress the spouse lays upon the application; he is unto me, and again, unto me all that is sweet; what ever he is to others, he is so to me; he loved me, and gave himself for me; he is my Lord, and my God.

(2.) How he is accepted; He shall lie all night between my breasts, near my heart. Christ lays the beloved disciples in his bosom; and thus they lay their beloved Saviour in their bosoms? why should not they embrace him with both arms, and hold him fast, with a resolution never to let him go? Christ must dwell in the heart, (Eph. iii. 17.) and, in order to that, the adulteries must be put from between the breasts; (Hos. ii. 2.) no pretender must have his place in the soul. He shall be as a bundle of myrrh or perfume bag, between my breasts, always sweet to me; or his effigies in miniature, his love-tokens, shall be my delight, and leading to the custom of those that are dear to each other. He shall not only be laid there for awhile, but shall lie there, shall abide there.

II. Jesus Christ has a great complacency in his church, and in every true believer; they are amiable in his eyes; (v. 15.) Behold, thou art fair, my love; and again, Behold, thou art fair. He says this, not to make her proud, (humility is one principal ingredient in spiritual beauty,) but, 1. To show that there is a real beauty in believers who are such as they are, and are thereby beautified; they are truly fair. 2. That he takes great delight in that good work, which his grace has wrought on the souls of believers; so that, though they have their infirmities, whatever they think of themselves, and the world thinks of them, he thinks them fair. He calls them friends; the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible, is in the sight of God of great price, 1 Pet. iii. 4. 3. To comfort them, if they should consider that beauty of own blackness, let them be told again and again that they are fair. 4. To engage all who are sanctified to be very thankful for that grace which has made them fair, who by nature were deformed, and changed the Ethiopian's skin. One instance of the beauty of the spouse is here mentioned, that she has doves' eyes, as ch. iv. 1. Those are fair, in Christ's account, who have not the piercing eye of the eagle, but the pure and chaste eye of the dove; not like the hawk, who, when he seeks upward, still has his eye upon the prey on earth; but a humble modest eye, such an eye as discovers a simplicity and godly sincerity, and a dove-like innocency. Eyes enlightened and guided by the Holy Spirit, that blessed Dove; weeping eyes; I did mourn as a dove, Ezek. vii. 16.

III. The church expresses her value for Christ, and returns esteem for esteem; (v. 16.) Behold, thou art fair unto my eyes, my Heart; thou art fair unto me another. Israel saith of God, Who is like thee? (Exod. xv. 11.) And God saith of Israel, Who is like thee? (Deut. xxxiii. 29.) Lord, saith the church, "Dost thou call me fair? No; if we speak of strength, thou art strong; (Job ix. 19.) so, if of beauty, thou art fair; I am fair no otherwise than as have thine image stamped upon me; thou art the great Original, I am but a faint and imperfect copy. (1 John i. 27.) If I be thin, thou thinkest me— the shadow of thee, (John i. 16.—iii. 34.) Thou art fair in these, and (which is more) pleasant to all that are thine. Many are fair enough to look at, and yet the sorriness of their temper renders them unpleasant; but thou art fair, yea, pleasant." Christ is pleasant, as he is ours, in covenant with us, in relation to us. Thou art pleasant now, when the King sits at his table. Christ is always precious to believers, but in a special manner pleasant, when they are admitted into communion with him, when they hear his voice, and see his face, and taste his love. It is good to be here.

Having expressed her esteem of her husband's person, she next, like a loving spouse, that is transported with joy for having disposed of herself so well, applauds the accommodations he had for her entertainment; his bed, his house, his rafters, or galleries, (v. 16.) which may fitly be applied to these holy ordinances in which believers have fellowship with Jesus Christ, receive the tokens of his love, and return their pious and devout affections to him, increase their acquaintance with him, and improve their advantages by him. Now, 1. These she calls ours, Christ and believers have a joint interest in them. As husband and wife are heirs together, (1 Pet. iii. 7.) so believers are joint heirs with Christ, Rom. viii. 17. They are his institutions, and their privileges; in them Christ and believers meet. She does not call them mine, for a believer will own nothing as his, but what Christ shall have an interest in; nor thine, for Christ has said, All that I have is thine, Luke xvi. 31. All is ours, if we are Christ's. They are all, that is, for love of Christ. What is his, is ours. We claim to all that is his. 2. These are the best of the kind. Does the colour of the bed, and the furniture belonging to it, help to set it off? Our bed is green, a colour which, in a pastoral, is preferred before any other, because it is the colour of the fields and groves, where the shepherd's business and delight are. It is a refreshing colour, good for the eyes, and it denotes fruitfulness. I am like a green olive-tree, Ps. lii. 8. We are married to Christ, that we should bring forth unto God, Rom. vii. 4. The beams of our house are cedar; (v. 17.) which, probably, refers to the temple Solomon had lately built for communion between God and Israel, which was of cedar, a strong sort of wood, sweet, durable, and which will never rot, typifying the firmness and continuance of the church, the gospel-temple; the galleries for walking are of fir, or cypress, some sort of wood that was pleasing both to the sight and smell, intimating the delight which the saints take in walking with Christ, and conversing with him. Every thing in the covenant of grace, (on which footing all their treaties are carried on,) is very firm, very fine, and very fragrant.

CHAP. II.

In this chapter, I. Christ speaks both concerning himself, and concerning his church, v. 1, 2. II. The church speaks to him, and asks him what it must do, and how it may be helped. She had in communion with Christ, v. 3, 4. 2. Entertaining herself with the present tokens of his favour, and taking care that nothing happen to intercept them, v. 5. 3. Triumphing in his approbation toward her, v. 8, 9. 4. Repeating the gracious calls he had given her to go along with him a walking, invited by the pleasures of the returning spring, (v. 10, 13.) out of her obscurity, (v. 14.) and the charge he had given to the servants to destroy hurtful and overbearing ways, (v. 15.) 5. Rejoicing in her interests in him, v. 16. 6. Longing for his arrival, v. 17. They whose hearts are filled with love to Christ, and hope of heaven, know best what these things mean.

1. AM the rose of Sharon, and the lily of the valleys. 2. As the lily among the thorns, so is my love among the daughters.

See here, 1. What Christ is pleased to compare himself to; and he condescends very much in the comparison: he that is the Son of the Highest, the bright and morning Star, calls and owns himself the Rose of Sharon, and the Lily of the valleys, to express his presence with his people in this world, the easiness of their access to him, and the beauty and sweetness which they find in him; and to teach them to adorn themselves with him, as shepherds and shepherdesses, when they appeared gay, were decked with roses and lilies, garlands and chaplets of flowers. The rose, for beauty and fragrancy, is the chief of flowers, and our Saviour prefers the clothing of the lily before that of Solomon in all his glory. Christ is the Rose of Sharon, where, probably, the best roses grew, and in most plenty; the Rose of the field, so some; denoting that the gospel salvation is a common salvation; it lies open to all; whoever will may come, and gather the rose-buds of privileges and comforts that grow in the covenant of grace; he is not a Rose locked up in a garden, but all may come and receive benefit by him, and comfort in him. He is a Lily for whiteness, a Lily of the valleys for sweetness, for those which we call so are a strong perfume. He is a Lily of the valleys, or low places, in his humiliation, exposed to injury; humble souls see most beauty in him; whatever he is to others, to them that are in the valleys he is a Lily. He is the Rose, the Lily; there is none besides; whatever excellency is in Christ, it is in him singularly, and in the highest degree. I will set thee as a lily among the myrtles, (v. 2.) (1.) She is as a lily; he himself is the Lily, (v. 1.) she is as the lily; the beauty of believers consists in their conformity and resemblance to Jesus Christ; they are his love, and so they are lilies, for these are made like Christ in whose hearts his love is shed abroad. (2.) As a lily among thorns; as a lily compared with thorns; the church of Christ as far exceeds all other societies, as a bed of roses excels a bush of thorns, as a lily compared with thorns. The wicked, the daughters of this world, such as have no love to Christ, are as thorns, worthless and useless, good for nothing but to stop a gap; may, they are noxious and hurtful, they came in with sin, and are a fruit of the curse; they choke good seed, and hinder good fruit, and their end is to be burned. God's people are as lilies among them, scratched and torn, shaded and obscured, by them, they are dear to Christ, and yet exposed to hardships and trials; and yet they must expect it, for they are planted among thorns, (Ezek. ii. 6.) but they are nevertheless dear to him, he does not overlook or undervalue any of his lilies for their being among thorns. When they are among thorns, they must still be as lilies, must maintain their innocence and purity, and, though they are among thorns, must not be turned into thorns, must not render railing for railing, and if they thus preserve their character, they shall still be owned as conformable to Christ. Grace in the soul is a lily among thorns, corruptions are thorns in the flesh, (2 Cor. xii. 7.) as are Canaanites to God's Israel; (Josh. xxxvii. 13.) but the lily that is now among thorns, shall shortly be transplanted out of this wilderness into that paradise where there is no prickling brier or grieving thorn, Ezek. xxviii. 24.

3. As the apple-tree among the trees of the wood, so is my beloved among the sons. I sat down under his shadow with great delight, and his fruit was sweet to my taste.

4. He brought me to the banqueting-house, and his banner over me was love. 5. Stay me with flagons, comfort me with apples; for I am sick of love. 6. His left hand is under my head, and his right hand doth embrace me. 7. I charge you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, by the roes, and by the hinds of the field, that ye stir not up, nor awake my love, till he please.

Here.

1. The spouse commends her Beloved, and prefers him before all others; As the apple-tree among the trees of the wood, which perhaps does not grow so high, nor spread so wide, as some other trees, yet is useful and serviceable to man, yielding pleasant and profitable fruit, while the other trees are of little use, no, not the cedars themselves, till they are cut down, so is my Beloved among the sons, so far does he excel them all, all the sons of God, the angels; that honour was put upon him, which was never designed for them; (Heb. i. 4.) all the sons of God are created much more than all, than the choicest of them, Ps. xlv. 2. Name what creature you will, and you will find Christ has the pre-eminence above them all. The world is a barren tree to a soul, Christ is a fruitful one.

II. She remembers the abundant comfort she has had in communion with him; she sat down by him with great delight, as shepherds sometimes repose their flocks, sometimes converse with one another, under a tree. A double advantage she found in sitting down so near the Lord Jesus. 1. A refreshing shade; I sat down under his shadow, to be sheltered by him from the scorching heat of the sun, to be cooled, and so to take some rest. Christ is to believers as the shadow of a great tree, may, of a great rock in a weary land, Isa. xxxiii. 2—xxv. 4. When a poor soul is parched with convictions of sin, and the terror of the law, (Ps. xxxiii. 4.) when fatigued with the troubles of this world, as Elijah when he sat down under the juniper tree, (1 Kings xix. 4.) they find that in Christ, in his name, his graces, his comforts, and his undertaking for poor sinners, which revives them, and keeps them from fainting; they that are weary and heavy laden in Christ may find rest. It is not enough to pass by this shadow, but we must sit down under it; here I dwell, for I have desired it; and we shall find it not like Jonah's gourd, that soon withered, and left him in a heat, both inward and outward, but like the tree of life, the leaves whereof were not only for shelter, but for the healing of the nations. We must sit down under this shadow with delight, must put an entire confidence in the protection of it, (as Judges ix. 15.) and take an entire complacency in the refreshment of it. But that is not all. 2. Here is pleasing, nourishing, food; this tree drops its fruits to those that sit down under its shadow, and they are welcome to them, and will find them sweet unto their taste, whatever they are to others; believers have tasted that the Lord Jesus is gracious, (1 Pet. ii. 3.) his fruits are all the precious privileges of the new covenant, purchased by his blood, and communicated by his Spirit; promises are sweet to a believer, yea, and precepts too; I delight in the law of God after the inward man. Partake are sweet, and peace of conscience sweet, as assurances of God's love to the souls of the Holy Ghost; the hopes of eternal life, and the present earnest and foretastes of it, are sweet, all sweet to those that have their spiritual senses exercised. If our mouths be put out of taste for the pleasures of sin, divine consolations will be sweet to our taste, sweeter than honey and the honeycomb.

III. She owns herself obliged to Jesus Christ for all, as far as she had in communion with him; (ver. 4.) "I sat down under the apple-tree, glad to be there, but he admitted me, nay, he pressed me, to a more intimate communion with him; Come in, thou blessed of the Lord, why standest thou without? He brought me to the house of wine, the place where he entertains his special friends; from lower to higher measures and degrees of comfort; from the fruit of the apple-tree to the more generous fruit of the vine. To him that values the divine joys he has, more shall be given. One of the rabbins, by the banqueting-house, understands the temple, or the house of God; the congregation where the interpretation of the Law was given; the place where God, by his Spirit, may apply it to Christian assemblies, where the gospel is preached, and gospel-ordinances are administered, particularly the Lord's supper, that banquet of wine, especially to the inside of those ordinances, communions with God in them. Observe, 1. How she was introduced; "He brought me in, wroght in me an inclination to draw nigh to God, helped me over my discouagements, took me by the hand, guided and led me; He gave me an access to God as a Father, Eph. ii. 18. We had never come into the banqueting-house, and never been acquainted with spiritual pleasures, if Christ had not brought us, by opening for us a new and living way, and opening in us a new and living fountain. 2. How she was entertained; His banner over me was love; he brought me in with a banner displayed over my head, not as one he triumphed over, but as one he triumphed in, and whom he always caused to triumph in him; (Ps. ii. 8.) when the gospel is compared to a banner, or ensign, (Isa. xi. 12.) and that which is represented in this banner, written in it in letters of gold, letters of blood, is love, love; and this is the entertainment in the banqueting-house. Christ is the Captain of our salvation, and he enlists all his soldiers under the banner of love; in that they centre, to that they must continually have an eye, and be animated by it; the love of Christ must constrain them to fight manfully. When the city was taken, the conqueror set up his standard in it; "He has conquered me with his love, overcome me with kindness, and that is the banner over me." This she speaks of as what she had formerly had experience of, and she remembers it with delight. Eaten bread must not be forgotten, but remembered with thankfulness to that God who has fed us with manna in this wilderness.

IV. She professes her strong affection and most profound dependence on Jesus Christ; His love, as love, overcome, overpowering, it. David explains this, when he says, (Ps. cxxix. 20.) My soul breaks for the longing that it has unto thy judgments, and, (v. 18.) My soul faints for thy salvation; languishing with care to make it sure, and fear of coming short of it. The spouse was now absent perhaps from her Beloved, waiting for his return, and cannot bear the grief and distance of delay. O how much better is it with the soul when it is sick of love to Christ, than when it is surfeited with the love of this world! She cries out for cordial; "O stay me with flagons, or ointments, or flowers, any thing that is reviving; comfort me with apples, with the fruits of that Apple-tree, Christ, (ver. 3.) with the merit and mediation of Christ, and the sense of his love to my soul." Note, They that are sick of love to Christ, shall not want spiritual supports, while they are yet waiting for spiritual comforts.

V. She experiences the power and tenderness of divine grace, relieving her in her present faintings, ver. 6. Though he seemed to have withdrawn, yet he was even then a very present Help. 1. To sustain the love-sick soul, and to keep it from fainting away; "His left hand is under my head, to bear it up, nay, as a pillow to lay it easy." David experienced God's hand upholding him then when his soul was following hard after God, (Ps. ixi. 18.) 8.) and Job, in a state of desertion, yet found that God put strength into him, Job xxviii. 6. All his saints are in his hand, which tenderly holds their aching heads. 2. To encourage the love-sick soul to continue waiting till he returns; “For, in the mean time, his right hand embraces me, and thereby gives me an unquestionable assurance of his love.” Believers will call their strength and comfort to the supporting left hand, and embracing right hand, of the Lord Jesus.

VI. Finding her beloved thus nigh unto her, she is in great care that her communion with him be not interrupted; (v. 7.) I charge you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem. Jerusalem, the mother of us all, charges all her daughters, the church charges all her members, the believing soul charges all its powers and faculties, the spouse charges herself, and still about her, not to stir up, or awake, her love until he please, now that he is asleep in her arms, as she was borne up in his, v. 6. She gives them this charge by the rose and the hinds of the field, by every thing that is amiable in their eyes, and dear to them, as the loving hind, and the pleasant roe; “My love is to me dearer than those can be to you, and will be disturbed, like them, with a very little noise.”

Note, 1. Those that experience the sweetness of communion with Christ, and the sensible manifestations of his love, cannot but desire the continuance of these blessed views, these blessed visits. Peter would make tabernacles upon the holy mount, Matth. xvii. 4. 2. Yet Christ will, when he pleases, withdraw those extraordinary communications of himself, for he is a free Agent, and the Spirit, as the wind blows where and when it listeth, and in his pleasure it becomes us to acquiesce. But, 3. Our care must be, that we do nothing to provoke him to withdraw, and to hide his face; that we carefully watch over our own hearts, and suppress every thought that may grieve his good Spirit. Let those that have comfort, be afraid of sinning it away.

3. The voice of my beloved! behold, he cometh leaping upon the mountains, skipping upon the hills. 9. My beloved is like a roe or a young hart: behold, he standeth behind our wall, he looketh forth at the windows, showing himself through the lattice. 10. My beloved spake, and said unto me, Rise up, my love, my fair one, and come away. 11. For, lo, the winter is past, the rain is over and gone; 12. The flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land. 13. The fig-tree putteth forth her green figs, and the vines with the tender grape give a good smell. Arise, my love, my fair one, and come away.

The church is here pleasing herself exceedingly with the thoughts of her further communion with Christ, after she is recovered from her fainting fit.

1. She rejoices in his approach, v. 8. (1.) She hears him speak; “It is the voice of my Beloved calling to me to tell me he is coming.” Like one of his own sheep, she knows his voice before she sees him, and can easily distinguish it from the voice of a stranger. (John vi. 46.)

2. The virgins’ and all the maidens of the court stand ready, and, like a faithful friend of the Bridegroom, she rejoices greatly for cause of the Bridegroom’s voice, John iii. 29. With what an air of triumph and exultation does she cry out, “It is the voice of my Beloved, it can be the voice of no other, for none beside can speak to the heart, and make that burn.” (2.) She sees him come, sees the goings of our God, our King, Ps. lxviii. 24. Behold, he comes. This may very well be applied to the prospect which the Old Testament saints had of Christ’s coming in the flesh. Abraham saw his day at a distance, and was glad. The nearer the time came, the clearer discoveries were made of it; and they that waited for the coming of Christ, lived by faith, till they saw his day, and triumphed in the sight. Behold, he comes; for they had heard him say, (Ps. xl. 7.) Lo, I come; to which their faith here affixes its seal. Behold, he comes, as he has promised. [1.] He comes cheerfully and with great alacrity; he comes leaping and skipping like a roe, and like a young hart, (v. 9.) as one pleased with his own undertaking, and that had his heart upon it, and his delights with the sons of men. When he comes to be baptized with the baptism of blood, how was he straitened till it was accomplished! Luke xii. 50. [2.] He comes, slighting and surmounting all the difficulties that lay in his way; he comes leaping over the mountains, skipping over the hills, so some read it; making nothing of the discouragements he was to break through; the curse of the law, the death of the cross, must be undergone, all the powers of darkness must be grappled with; but, before the resolution of his grace, these great mountains become like a valley. Whatever opposition is given at any time to the deliverance of God’s church, Christ will break through it, will get over it. [3.] He comes speedily, like a roe, or a young hart; they thought the time long, (every day a year,) but really he hastened; as now, so then, surely he comes quickly; he that shall come, will come, and will not tarry. When he comes for the deliverance of his people, he flies upon a cloud, and never stays beyond his time, which is the best time. We may apply it to particular believers, who find, that, even when Christ has withdrawn sensible comforts, and seems to forsake, yet it is but for a small moment, and he will soon return, with everlasting loving-kindness.

2. She pleases herself with the glimpses she has of him, and the glances she has of his favour; He stands behind our wall, I know he is there, for sometimes he speaks to me through the windows, looks at it, and displays himself through the lattice. Such was the state of the Old Testament church while it was in expectation of the coming of the Messiah; the ceremonial wall is called a wall of partition, (Eph. ii. 14.) a vail; (2 Cor. iii. 13.) but Christ stood behind that wall, they had him near them, they had him with them, though they could not see him clearly; he that was the substance was not far from the shadows, Col. ii. 17. They saw him looking through the windows of the ceremonial institutions, and smiling through those lattices; in their sacrifices and purifications Christ discovered himself to them, and gave them intimations and earnest of his grace both to engage and to encourage their longings for his coming. Such is our present state in comparison with what it will be at Christ’s second coming; we now see him through a glass darkly, the body is a wall between us and him, through the windows of which we now and then get a sight of him, but not face to face, as we hope to see him shortly. In the sacraments Christ is near us, but it is behind the wall of external signs, through those lattices he manifests himself to us; but we shall shortly see him as he is. Some understand this of the state of a believer when he is under a cloud; Christ is out of sight and yet not far off. (Job xxviii. 12.) Others (Job xxvi. 24.) and compare Job xxviii. 13. She calls the wall that intervenes between her and her Beloved, our wall, because it is sin, and no thing else, that separates between us and God, and that is a wall of our own erecting; (Isa. lix. 1.) behind that he stands, as waiting to be a-cou
SOLOMON'S SONG, II.

7. that observe the time of their coming, and the time of their singing, and so shame us who know not the judgment of the Lord, understand not the times, nor do that which is beautiful in its season, do not sing in singing time.

10. This fig tree puts forth its green figs, by which we know that summer is nigh, (Matt. xxiv. 32.) when the green figs will be ripe figs, and fit for use, and the vines with the tender grape give a good smell: the earth produces not only flowers, (v. 12.) but fruits; and the smell of the fruits which are profitable, is to be preferred far before that of the flowers, which are only for show and pleasure. Serpents, they say, are driven away by the smell of vines; and who is the old serpent, and who the true vine, we will see hereafter.

Now this description of the returning spring, as a reason for coming away with Christ, is applicable, First, To the introducing of the gospel in the room of the Old Testament dispensation, during which it had been winter-time with the church. Christ's gospel warms which was cold, and makes that fruitful which was before dead and barren; when it comes to any place, it puts a beauty and glory upon that place, (2 Cor. ii. 7, 8.) and gives ministers occasion for joy. Spring-time is a pleasant time, and so is gospel-time. Apostle laureatetur ut omnia solv—Behold what joy the dawning age inspires! said Virgil, from the Sibyls, perhaps with more reference to the setting up of the Messiah's kingdom at that time than he himself thought of. See Ps. cxvi. 11. Arise then, and improve this spring-time; come away from the world and the flesh, come into fellowship with Christ, 1 Cor. i. 9.

Secondly, To the delivering of the church from the power of the enemy, or the persecuting enemies, and the restoring of liberty and peace to the elect, of winter suffering and restraint. When the storms of trouble are over and gone, when the voice of the turtle, the joyful sound of the gospel of Christ, is again heard, and ordinances are enjoyed with freedom, then arise and come away to improve the happy juncture. Walk in the light of the Lord, sing in the ways of the Lord: when the churches had rest, then were they edified, Acts ix. 31.

Thirdly, To the conversion of sinners from a state of nature to a state of grace; that blessed change is like the return of the spring, a universal change, and a very comfortable one; it is a new creation, it is being born again. The soul that was hard, and cold, and frozen, and unprofitable, like the earth in the winter, becomes fruitful, like the earth in spring; and, by degrees, like it, brings its fruits to perfection. This blessed change is owing purely to the approaches and influences of the Sun of righteousness, who calls to us from heaven to arise, and come away, out of summer, gather in summer.

Fourthly, To the consolations of the saints after a state of inward dejection and despondency. A child of God, under doubts and fears, is like the earth in winter, its nights long, its days dark, good affections chilled, nothing done, nothing got, the hand scaled up. But comfort will return, the birds shall sing again, and the flowers appear; arise, therefore, poor drooping soul, and come away with thy beloved. Arise and shake thyself from the dust, Isa. iii. 2. Arise, shine, for thy light is come, (Isa. xxv. 1.) walk in that light, Isa. ii. 5.

Fifthly, To the resurrection of the body at the last day, and the glory to be revealed. The bones that lie in the grave, as the roots of plants in the ground during the winter, shall then flourish as an herb, Isa. xxvi. 14.—xxvii. 19. That shall be an eternal farewell to winter, and a joyful entrance upon an everlasting spring.

14. O my dove, that art in the clefts of The rock, in the secret places of the stairs, let me see thy countenance, let me hear thy voice; for sweet is thy voice, and thy countenance is comely. 15. Take us the foxes, the little foxes, that spoil the vines: for our vines have tender grapes. 16. My beloved is mine, and I am his: He feedeth among the lilies. 17. Until the day break, and the shadows flee away: turn, my beloved, and be thou like a roe, or a young hart, upon the mountains of Bether.

Here is, 1. The encouraging invitation which Christ gives to the church, and every believing soul, to come into communion with him, v. 14. (1.) His love is now his dove: David had called the church God's turtle-dove, (Ps. lxxxvii. 19.) and so she is here called; a dove for beauty, her wings covered with silver, (Ps. lxxviii. 13.) for innocence and innocensiveness; a gracious spirit is a dove-like spirit, harmless, loving quietness, and cleanliness, and faithful to Christ, as the turtle to her mate. The Spirit descended like a dove on Christ, and so he does on all Christians, making them of a meek and quiet spirit. She is Christ's dove, for he owns her; and delights in her; she can find no rest but in him, and she loves him, and he loves her, and so when she returns, (2.) This dove is in the clefts of the rock, and in the secret places of the stairs. This speaks, either, [1.] Her praise; Christ is the Rock, to whom she flies for shelter, and in whom alone she can think herself safe, and find herself easy, as a dove, in the hole of a rock, when struck at by the birds of prey, Jer. xlvi. 28. Moses was hid in a cleft of the rock, that he might behold something of God's glory, which otherwise he could not have borne the brightness of. She retires into the secret places of the stairs, where she may be alone, undisturbed, and may the better commune with her own heart. Good Christians will find time to be private. Christ often withdrew to a mountain himself alone, to pray. [2.] Her blame; she creeps into the clefts of the rock, and the secret places, for fear and shame; any where to hide her head, being heartless and discouraged, and shunning even the sight of her Beloved, being conscious to herself of her own unfitness and unholiness to come into his presence, and speak to him, she drew back, and was like a silly dove without heart, Hos. vii. 11. (3.) Christ graciously calls her out of her retirements; Come, let me see thy countenance, let me hear thy voice; she was mourning like a dove, (Isa. xxxviii. 14.) bemoaning herself like the doves of the valleys, where they are near the clefts of the impending rocks, mourning for her iniquities, (Ezek. xii. 16.) and refusing to be comforted. But Christ calls her to lift up her face without spot; being purged from an evil conscience, (Job. xi. 13.—xxvi. 26.) to come boldly to the throne of grace, having a great High Priest there, (Heb. iv. 16.) to tell what her petition is, and what her request; Let me hear thy voice, hear what thou hast to say; what would ye that I should do unto you? Speak freely, speak up, and fear not a slight or reproof. (4.) For her encouragement, he tells her, Do not think evil of his thoughts, or whatever she thought of herself; Sweet is thy voice; thy praying voice, though thou canst but chatter like a crane or a swallow, (Isa. xxxviii. 14.) it is music in God's ears; he has assured us, that the prayer of the upright is his delight; he smelled a sweet savour from Noah's sacrifice, and the spiritual sacrifices are no less acceptable, 1 Pet. ii. 5. This does not so much commend our services, as God's gracious condescension in making the best of them, and the efficacy of the much incense which is offered with the prayers of saints, Rev. viii. 3. "That countenance of thine, which thou art ashamed of, is comely, though now mournful, much more will it be so when it becomes cheerful." Then the voice of prayer is sweet and acceptable to God, when the countenance, the conversation in which we show ourselves before men, is holy, and so comely and acceptable to our profession; those that are sanctified have the breeze commended to God.

2. The charge which Christ gives to his servants, to oppose and suppress that which is a terror to his church, and drives her, like a poor frightened dove into the clefts of the rock, and which is an obstruction and prejudice to the interests of his kit glem in this world, and in the heart; (v. 15.) Take us the foxes, (take them for us, for it is good service both to Christ and the church,) the little foxes, that creep in insensibly; for, though they are little, they are great mischief; they spoil the vines, that must by no means be suffered to do at any time, especially now when our vines have tender grapes, that must be preserved, or the vintage will fail. Believers are as vines, weak, but useful, plants, their fruits are as tender grapes at first, which must have time to come to maturity. This charge, to take the foxes, is, (1.) A charge to particular believers to molest their own corruptions, their sinful desires, which can be suppressed with little pain, the little foxes, that destroy their graces and comforts, quash good motions, crush good beginnings, and prevent their coming to perfection. Seize the little foxes, the first risings of sin, the little ones of Babylon, (Ps. cxlviii. 9.) those sins that seem little, for they often prove very dangerous. Whatever we find a hindrance to us in that which is good, we must put away. (2.) A charge to all in their places to oppose and prevent the spreading of all such opinions and practices as tend to corrupt men's judgment, debauch their consciences, perplex their minds, and discourage their inclinations to virtue and piety; persecutors are foxes, (Luke xiii. 32.) false prophets are foxes, Ezek. xiii. 4. Those that sow the tares of heresy or schism, and, like Diotrephes, trouble the peace of the church, and obstruct the progress of the gospel, they are the foxes, the little foxes, which must not be knocked off the tree, (Ch. xi. 16.) not to destroy men's lives, but taken, that they may be tamed, or else restrained from doing mischief.

3. The believing profession which the church makes of her relation to Christ, and the satisfaction she takes in her interest in him, and communion with him, v. 16. He had called her to rise, and come away with him, to let him see her face, and hear her voice; now this is her answer to that call, in which, though at present in the dark, and at a distance, (1.) She comforts herself with the thoughts of the mutual interest and relation that were between her and her beloved; My beloved to me, and I to him, so the original reads it very emphatically; the conscience of the language speaks the largeness of her affection; "What he is to me, and I to him, may better be conceived than expressed." Nete, 1. It is the unspeakable privilege of all true believers, that Christ is theirs; My beloved is mine; (taken from her, as her own, and also by the Spirit, "but possession and tenure," I receive from his fullness:) believers are partakers of Christ, they have not only an interest in him, but the enjoyment of him, are taken not only into covenant, but into communion, with him. All the benefits of his glorious undertaking, as Mediator, are made over to them. He is that to which, the world neither is, nor can be, all that which they need and desire, and which will make a complete happiness for them. All he is, theirs, and all he has, is he has done, and all he is doing; all he has promised in the gospel, all he has prepared in heaven, all is yours. 2. It is the undoubted character of all true believers, that they are Christ’s, and then, and then only, he is theirs: they have given their own selves to him, (2 Cor. viii. 5.) they receive his doctrine and obey his law, they bear his image, and espouse his interest; they belong to Christ. If we be his, he is wholly, his only, his for ever, we may take the comfort of his being ours. (2.) She comforts herself with the thoughts of the communications of his grace to his people; He feeds among the lilies. When she wants the tokens of his favour to her in particular, she rejoices in the assurance of his presence with all believers in general, who are as lilies in his eye; he feeds among them, he takes as much pleasure in them, and their assemblies, as a man does in his table or in his garden, for he walks in the midst of the golden candlesticks, he delights to converse with them, and to do them good.

4. The church’s hope and expectation of Christ’s coming, and her prayer grounded thereon. (1.) She doubts not but that the day will break, and the shadows will flee away. The gospel-day will dawn, and the shadows of the ceremonial law will flee away; this was the comfort of the Old Testament church, that after the long night of that dark dispensation, the day-spring from on high would at length visit them, to give light to them that sit in darkness, and of them that live in the shadow of death; and therefore the night vanishes, so do the shadows of the day when the substance comes. The day of comfort will come after a night of desertion. Or it may refer to the second coming of Christ, and the eternal happiness of the saints; the shadows of our present state will flee away, our darkness and doubts, our griefs and all our grievances, and a glorious day shall dawn, a morning when the uprightness shall have done away a day that shall have no night after it.

(2.) She regards the presence of her beloved, in the mean time, to support and comfort her; “Turn, my beloved, turn to me, come and visit me, come and relieve me, be with me always to the end of the age. In the day of my extremity, make haste to help me, make no long tarrying. Come over even the mountains of division; interposing time and days, with some gracious anticipations of that light and love.”

(3.) She begs that he would not only turn to her for the present, but hasten his coming to fetch her to himself; “Even so, come, Lord Jesus, come quickly. Though there be mountains in the way, thou canst, like a roe, or a young hart, step over them with ease, O show thyself to me, or take me up to thee.”

CHAP. III.

In this chapter, I. The church gives an account of a sore trial wherewith she was exercised through the withdrawing of her beloved from her, the pains she was at before she recovered the comfortable sense of his favour again, and the resolution she took when she did recover it, not to lose it again, as she had done through her own carelessness, v. 1–5. II. The daughters of Jerusalem admire the excellencies of the church, v. 6. III. The church admires Jesus Christ under the person of Solomon, his bed, and his looks towards it, (v. 7, 8.) his chalmer, v. 9, 10.

She calls upon the daughters of Zion, who were admiring her, to admire him rather, especially as he appeared on his coronation-day, and the day of his nuptials, v. 11.

1. By night on my bed I sought him whom my soul loveth: I sought him, but I found him not. 2. I will rise now, and go about the city; in the streets, and in the broad ways, I will seek him whom my soul loveth: I sought him, but I found him not. 3. The watchmen that go about the city found me: to whom I said, Saw ye him whom my soul loveth? 4. It was but a little that I passed from him, but I found him whom my soul loveth: I held him, and would not let him go, until I had brought him into my mother’s house, and into the chamber of her that conceived me. 5. I charge you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, by the roes, and by the hinds of the field, that ye stir not up, nor awake my love, till I please.

God was not wont to say to the seed of Jacob, Seek ye me, in vain; and yet here we have the spouse for a great while seeking her beloved in vain, but finding him at last, to her unspeakable satisfaction. It was hard to the Old Testament church to find Christ in the ceremonial law, and the types and figures which were used in the old order. He was long was the consolation of Israel looked for before it came; the watchmen of that church gave little assistance to those who inquired after him; but at length Simeon had him in his arms, whom his soul loved. It is applicable to the case of particular believers, who often walk in darkness a great while, but at even time it shall be light, and they that seek Christ to the end shall find him at length. Observe,

I. How the spouse sought him in vain upon her bed, (v. 1.) when she was up and looking about her, grace in act and exercise, though her beloved was withdrawn, yet she could not see him at a distance, (ch. ii. 8.) but now it was otherwise. She still continued her affection to him, still it was he whom her soul loved, that bond of the covenant still continued firm; “Though he slay me, I will trust in him; though he leave me, I will love him. When I have him not in my arms, I have him in my heart.” But she wanted the communion she used to have with him; as David, when he thirsted for God, for the living God. She sought him, but, (1.) It was by night on her bed, it was late and lazy seeking. Her understanding was clouded, it was by night, in the dark; her affections were chilled, it was on her bed, half asleep. The wise virgins slumbered in the absence of the Bridegroom. It was a dark time with the believer; she saw not his signs, and yet she sought them. They whose souls love Jesus Christ will continue to seek him, even in the silence and solitude: their reins instruct them to do so, even in the night season. (2.) She failed in her endeavour. Sometimes lie is found of them that seek him not, (Isa. lxv. 1.) but here he is not found of one that sought him; either for the punishment of her corruptions, her slothfulness and security, (we miss of comfort, because we do not seek it aright;) or for the exercise of graces, her faith and patience, to try whether she will continue seeking; the west wind of God, he was emboldened; (Ps. lxxviii. 2, 3.) and yet she is not driven off by the disappointment from the use of further means; she resolves, “I will rise now, I will not lie here if I cannot find my Beloved here, nor be content if he be withdrawn. I will rise now without delay, and seek him imme Disappointments in and prefer city, How must a Enough be Mary gospel-church. not streets, such Christ that delight faith. when ordinances, him found good time. He found him, good as Christ hid evidence of the city, whom Jesus. Those means; whom and night, to make known and him; I held him, held him fast, as the women, when they met with Christ after his resurrection, held him by the feet, and worshipped him, Matth. xxviii. 9. "I would not let him go. Not only, I would never do any thing to provoke him to depart, but I would by faith and prayer prevail with him to stay, and by the exercise of grace preserve inward peace. Those that know how hard comfort is come by, and how dear it is bought, will be afraid of forfeiting it, and playing it away, and will think nothing too much to do to keep it safe. Non minor est virtus quam quaeve farteri tuere—As much is implied in securing our acquisitions as in making them. Those that have laid hold on wisdom must retain her, Prov. iii. 18. Those that hold Christ fast, in the arms of faith and love, shall not let him go, he will abide with them.

6. How desirous she was to make others acquainted with him, she brought him to my mother's house, that all my relations, all who are dear to me, might have the benefit of communion with him." When Zaccheus found Christ, or rather was found of him, salvation came to his house, Luke xix. 9. Whenever we find Christ, we must take him home with us to our houses, especially to our hearts. The church is our mother, and we should be concerned for her interests, that she may have Christ present with her, and be earnest in prayer for his presence with his people and ministers always. They that enjoy the tokens of Christ's favour to their own souls, should desire that the church, and all religious assemblies in their public capacity, might likewise enjoy the tokens of his favour.

7. What care she was in that no disturbance might be given him; (v. 5.) she repeats the charge she had before given (ch. ii. 7.) to the daughters of Jerusalem, not to stir up, or awake, her Love, when he had sought to be hid among her sisters; she gives them a strict charge to keep all quiet, and in good order, to be very observant of him, careful to please him, and afraid of offending him. The charge given to the church in the wilderness concerning the angel of the covenant, who was among them, explains this; (Exod. xxviii. 21.) Beware of him, and obey his voice, provoke him not. See that none of you stir out of your places, lest you disturb him, but with quietness work, and mind your own business; make no noise, let all clamour and bitterness be put far from you, for that grieves the Holy Spirit of God, Eph. iv. 30, 31. Some make this to be Christ's charge to the daughters of Jerusalem, not to disturb or disquiet his church, nor trouble the minds of the disciples; for Christ is very tender of the peace of his church, and all the members of it, even the little ones; and these that trouble them shall bear their judgment, Gal. v. 10.

6. Who is this that cometh out of the wilderness like pillars of smoke, perfumed with myrrh and frankincense, with all powders of the merchant? These are the words of the daughters of Jerusalem, to whom the charge was given, v. 5. They had looked shyly upon the bride, because she was black; (ch. i. 6.) but now they admire her, and speak of her with great respect; Who is this? How beautiful she looks! Who would have expected such a curious and magnificent person to come out of the wilderness? As when Christ rode in triumph into Jerusalem, they said, Who is this? And of the accession of strangers to the church, she herself says, with wonder, (Isa. lxxix. 21) Who has begotten these?

1. This is applicable to the Jewish church, when, after forty years' wandering in the wilderness, they came out of it, to take a glorious possession of the Land of promise; and this may very well be illustrated by what Balaam said of them at that time, when they ascended out of the wilderness like pillars of smoke, and he stood admiring them, From the toh of the rocks I see him. How goodly are thy tent, O Jacob! Numb. xxviii. 9.—xxix. 3.

2. It is applicable to any public deliverance of the church of God, as particularly out of Babylon, the Old Testament, and the New Testament, Babylon; then the church is like pillars of smoke, ascending upward in devout affections, the incense of praise, from which, as from Noah's sacrifice, God smells a sweet savour; then she is amiable in the eyes of her friends, and her enemies too cannot but have a veneration for her, and worship at her feet, knowing that God has loved her, Rev. iii. 9. Sometimes the fear of the Jews was upon their neighbours, when they saw that God was with them of a truth, Exod. iv. 18.

3. It is applicable to the recovery of a gracious soul out of a state of desertion and despondency. (1.) She ascends out of the wilderness, the dry and barren land, where there is no way, where there is no water, where travellers are still in want, and ever at a loss; here a poor soul may long be left to wander, but shall come up, at last, under the conduct of the Comforter. (2.) She comes up like pillars of smoke, like a cloud of incense ascending from the altar, or the smoke of the burnt-offerings. This intimates a fire of pious and devout affections in the soul, whence this smoke arises, and the mounting of the soul heaven-ward in this smoke, (as Judges xiii. 20.) the heart lifted up to God in the heavens, as the sparks fly upward. Christ's return to the soul gives life to its devotion, and its communion with God is most reviving, when it ascends out of a wilderness. (3.) She is perfumed with myrrh and frankincense; she is replenished with the graces of God, which are as sweet spices, or as the holy incense, which, being now kindled by his gracious returns, sends forth a very fragrant smell; her devotions be now peculiarly lively, she is not only acceptable to God, but amiable in the eyes of others also, who are ready to cry out with admiration, Who is this? What a monument of mercy is this! The graces and comforts with which she is perfumed, are called the fountains of the merchant, for they are so fathom-deep, and deep-seated, by our Lord Jesus, that he hid the Merchant, with all the store of his goods, a long time, and was at vast expense, no less than that of his own blood, to purchase them for us. They are not the products of our own soil, nor the growth of our own country; no, they are imported from the heavenly Canaan, the better country.

7. Behold his bed, which is Solomon's; three-score valiant men are about it, of the valiant of Israel. 8. They all hold swords, being expert in war; every man hath his sword upon his thigh, because of fear in the night. 9. King Solomon made himself a chariot of the wood of Lebanon. 10. He made the pillars thereof of silver, the base thereof of gold, the covering of it of purple; the midst thereof being paved with love, for the daughters of Jerusalem. 11. Go forth O ye daughters of Zion, and behold King Solomon with the crown wherewith his mother crowned him in the day of his espousals, and in the day of the gladness of his heart.

The daughters of Jerusalem stood admiring the spouse, and commending her, but she overlooks their praises, is not puffed up with them, but turns to the more greater glory to Christ. She would not lock off her to him who recommends him to their esteem, and sets herself to applaud him. Here he is three times called Solomon, and we have that name but three times besides in all this song, ch. i. 5.—viii. 11, 12. It is Christ that is here meant, who is greater than Solomon, and of whom Solomon was an illustrious type for his wisdom and wealth, and especially his building of the temple.

Three things she admires him for; The magnificence of his bed (7.) Behold his bed, even Solomon's, very rich and fine; for such the curtains of Solomon were. His bed, which is above Solomon's, so some read it. Christ's bed, though he had not where to lay his head, is better than Solomon's best bed; the church is his bed, for he has said of it, This is my rest for ever, here will I dwell. The hearts of believers are his bed, for he lies all night between their breasts, Eph. iii. 17. Heaven is his bed, the rest into which he entered, when he was delivered from all his toils. Or, it may be meant of the sweet repose and satisfaction which gracious souls enjoy in communion with him; it is called his bed, because, though we are admitted to it, and therefore it is called our bed, (ch. i. 16.) yet it is his peace that is our rest, John xiv. 27. I will give you rest, Matt. xi. 28. It is Solomon's bed, whose name signifies peace, because in his days Judah and Israel dwell safely under their vines and fig-trees.

That which she admires his bed for, is, the guard that surrounded it; they that rest in Christ not only dwell at ease, (many do so who yet are in the greatest danger,) but they dwell in safety; their holy serenity is under the protection of a holy security; this bed had three-score valiant men about it, as yemen of the guard, or the band of gentle-men-pensioners, they are of the valiant of Israel, and a great many bold and brave men David's reign had produced; the life-guard-men are well-armed; they all hold swords, and know how to hold them, they are expert in war, well skilled in all the arts of it; they are posted about the bed at a convenient distance; they are in a posture of defence, every man with his sword upon his thigh, and his hand upon his sword, ready to draw upon the first alarm, and this, because of fear in the night, because of the danger feared; for the lives of princes, even the wisest and best, as they are more precious, so they are more exposed, and require to be more guarded, than the lives of commoners. Or, because of the fear of it, and the apprehension which the spouse may have of danger, these guards are set for her satisfaction, that she may be quiet from the fear of evil, which believers themselves are subject to, especially in the night, when they are under a cloud as to their spiritual state, or in any outward trouble more than ordinary. Christ himself was under the special protection of his Father in his whole undertakings, and the shadow of his hand was hid with him, (Isa. lxxxix. 2.) he had legions of angels at his command. The church is well guarded, more are with her than are against her; lest any hurt this vineyard, God himself keeps it night and day; (Isa. xxvii. 2, 3.) particularly believers, when they expose themselves in Christ, and with him, though it may be night-time with them, and they may have their fears in the night, are yet safe, as safe as Solomon himself in the midst of his guards; the angels have a charge concerning them, ministers are appointed to watch for their souls, and they ought to be valiant men, expert in the spiritual warfare, holding the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God, and having that girt upon their thigh, always ready to them for the silencing of the fears of God's people; but the attributes engaged for the safety of believers, are kept as in a strong hold by his power, (1 Pet. i. 5.) are safe in his name, (Prov. xviii. 10.) his peace protects those in whom it rules, (Phil. iv. 7.) and the effect of righteousness in them is quietness and assurance, Isa. xxxii. 17. Our danger is from the rulers of the darkness of this world, but we are safe in the armour of light.

II. The splendour of his chariot, v. 9, 10. As Christ and believers rest in safety under a sufficient guard, so when they appear publicly, as kings in their coaches of state, they appear in great magnificence. This chariot was of Solomon's own contriving and making, the materials very rich, silver, and gold, and cedar, and purple: he made it for himself, and yet made it for the daughters of Jerusalem, to oblige them. Some by this chariot, or coach, understand, (the place is no where else referred to in scripture,) understood the human nature of Christ, in which the divine nature rode as in a chariot; it was a divine workmanship; A body hast thou prepared me; the structure was very fine, but that which was at the bottom of it, was, love, pure love to the children of men. Others make it to represent the everlasting gospel, in which, as in an open chariot, Christ shows himself, and, as in a chariot of war, rides forth triumphantly, conquering, and to conquer, (Rev. x. 1.) and they are silver, for the words of the Lord are pure silver, (Ps. xii. 6.) they, are better than thousands of gold and silver; it is hung with purple, a princely colour, all the adornments of it are dyed in the precious blood of Christ, and that gives them this colour; but that which completes the glory of it, is love, it is paved with love, it is lined with love, not love of strangers, as Solomon's was in the days of Rehoboam, but love of those that are his, an everlasting love, a holy love. Silver is better than cedar, gold than silver, but love is better than gold, better than all, and it is put last, for nothing can be better than that. The gospel is all love.

Mr. Durham applies it to the covenant of redemption, the way of our salvation, as it is contrived in the eternal counsel of God, and manifested to us in the scripture. This is that work of Christ himself, wherein the glory of his grace and love to sinners most eminently appears, and which makes him amiable and admirable in the eyes of believers, in this covenant, love is conveyed to them, and they are carried in it to the perfection of love, and, as it were, ride in triumph. It is admirably framed and contrived, both for the glory of Christ, and for the comfort of believers; it is well-ordered in all things, and sure; (2 Sam. xxviii. 5.) it has pillars that cannot be shaken; it is made of the wood of Lebanon, which can never rot; the basis of it, is the everlasting covenant; the most lasting metal; the blood of the covenant, that rich purple, is the cover of this chariot, by which believers are sheltered from the wind and storms of divine wrath, and the troubles of this world; but the midst of it, and that which is all in all, is love, that love of Christ which passes knowledge, and the dimensions of which are immeasurable.

III. The lustre of his royal person, when he appears in his greatest pomp, v. 11. Here observe, 1. The call that is given to the daughters of Zion, to acquaint themselves with the glories of king Solomon; Go forth, and behold him. The multitude of the spectators adds to the beauty of a splendid cavalcade; Christ, in his gospel, manifests himself; let each of us add to the number of those that give honour to him, by giving themselves the satisfaction of looking upon him. Who should pay respects to Zion's King, but Zion's daughters? They have reason to rejoice greatly when he comes, Zech. ix. 1. Behold him, then; look with pleasure upon Christ in his glory; look upon him with an eye of faith, with the eye of the soul, the eye of faith, sight seeing, behold, and admire him, behold, and love him, upon him, and know him again. (2.) Go forth, and behold him, go off from the world, as those that see no beauty and excellency in it, in comparison with what is to be seen in the Lord Jesus. Go out of yourselves, and let the sight of his transcendent beauty put you out of conceit with yourselves. Go forth to the place where he is to be seen, to the work through which his purveyors Zaczheim.

2. The direction that is given them to take special notice of that which they would not see every day, and that was, his crown, either the crown of gold adorned with jewels, which he wore on his coronation-day; (Solomon's mother, Bath-sheba, though she did not procure that for him, yet, by her seasonable interposals, she helped to secure it to him when Adonijah was catching at it;) or the garland, or crown of flowers and green tied with ribbons, which was his in the other world, and which, above the levity of his nuptials. Perhaps Solomon's coronation-day was his marriage-day, the day of his espousals, when the garland his mother crowned him with was added to the crown his people crowned him with. Applying this to Christ, it speaks, (1.) The many honours put upon him, and the power and dominion he is intrusted with; Go forth, and see king Jesus, with the crown wherewith his Father crowned him, (Rev. xix. 16.) when he was well pleased; when he set him as king upon his holy hill of Zion; when he advanced him to his own right hand, and invested him with a sovereign authority, both in heaven and in earth, and put all things under his feet. (2.) The disheour put upon him by his persecutors. Some apply it to the crown of thorns, with which his mother, the Jewish church, crowned him on the day of his death, which was the day of his espousals, when he declared him his beloved Son, in which he was well pleased; when he set him as king upon his holy hill of Zion; when he advanced him to his own right hand, and invested him with a sovereign authority, both in heaven and in earth, and put all things under his feet. (3.) It seems especially to mean the honour done him by his church, as his mother, and by all true believers, in whose hearts he is formed, and of whom he has said, These are my mother, and sister, and brother, Matt. xii. 50. They give him the glory of his unworthiness; to him is glory in the church, Eph. iii. 21. When believers accept of him as theirs, and join themselves to him in an everlasting covenant, (1.) It is his coronation-day in their souls; before conversion they were crowning themselves, but then they begin to crown Christ, and continue to do so from that day forward; they appoint him their Head, they bring every thought into obedience to him; they set up his throne in their hearts, and cast their creaturely things from them. (2.) It is his espousals, in which he betrothes them to him for ever in loving-kindness and in mercies, joins them to himself in faith and love, and gives himself to them in the promises and all he has, to be theirs. Thou shalt not be for another, so will I also be for thee; (Hos. iii. 5.) and to him they are presented as chaste virgins. (5.) It is the day of the gladness of his heart, he declares him the honours that his people do him, pleased with the migration of his interest among them. Does Satan fall before them? In that
1. Behold, thou art fair, my love; behold, thou art fair: thou hast doves’ eyes within thy locks: thy hair is as a flock of goats that appear from mount Gilead.

2. Thy teeth are like a flock of sheep that are even shorn, which came up from the washing, whereof every one bear twins, and none is barren among them. 3. Thy lips are like a thread of scarlet, and thy speech is comely: thy temples are like a piece of pomegranate within thy locks. 4. Thy neck is like the tower of David, built up for an armory, wherein there hang a thousand bucklers, all shields of mighty men. 5. Thy two breasts are like two young roes that are twins, which feed among the lilies.

6. Until the day break, and the shadows flee away, I will get thee to the mountains of prey, and to the hill of frankincense. 7. Thou art all fair, my love; there is no spot in thee.

Here is,

1. A large and particular account of the beauties of the church, and of gracious souls on whom the image of God is renewed, consisting in the beauty of holiness. In general, he that is a competent judge of beauty, whose art is not, or is according to art, and what all must subscribe to, he has said, Behold, thou art fair. She had commended him, and called all about her to take notice of his graces; hereby she recommends himself to him, gains his favour, and, in return for her respects, he calls to all about him to take notice of her graces. Those that honour Christ, he will honour, 1 Sam. ii. 30. He does not flatter her, nor design hereby either to make her proud of herself, or to court her praises of him; but, 1. It is the plentifulness of error in her present dejections; whatever others thought of her, she was amiable in his eyes. 2. It is to teach her what to value herself upon, not any external advantages, (which would add nothing to her, and the want of which would deprive her of nothing that was really excellent,) but upon the concelliness of grace which he had put upon her. 3. It is to invite others to think well of her too, and to join themselves to her in her love to him, and their art loved of me, and therefore thou art fair; all the beauty of the saints is derived from him, and they shine by reflecting his light; it is the beauty of the Lord our God that is upon us, Ps. xc. 17. She was espoused to him, and that made her beautiful. Uxor fulget radius marit—The spouse shines in her husband’s rays. It is repeated; Thou art fair, and again, Thou art fair; not only the certainty of it, but the pleasure he took in speaking of it.

As to the representation here made of the beauty of the church, the images are certainly very bright, the shades strong, and the comparisons bold; not proper indeed to represent any external beauty, for they were not designed to do so, but the beauty of holiness, the new man, the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible. Seven particulars are specified, a number of perfections, for the church is nurtured with manifold graces by the seven spirits that are before the throne, Rev. i. 4. 1. Her eyes; a good eye contributes much to a beauty: Thou hast doves’ eyes, clear and chaste, and often cast up toward heaven. It is not the eagle’s eye, that can face the sun, but the dove’s eye, a humble, modest, mournful, eye, that is the praise of those whom Christ loves. Ministers are the church’s eyes; (Isa. iii. 6.) Thou seest women shall see eye to eye; they must be like doves’ eyes; harmless and inoffensive, (Ezek. x. 16.) having their conversation in the world, in simplicity and godly sincerity. Wisdom and knowledge are the eyes of the new man; they must be clear, but not haughty, not exercised in things too high for us. When our aims and intentions are sincere and honest, then we have doves’ eyes; when we look not unto idolas, (Ezek. xviii. 6.) but have our eyes ever toward the Lord, Ps. xxv. 15. The doves’ eyes are within the locks, which are as a shade upon them, so that, [1.] They cannot find us long; we are here in this world, we know but in part; a hair hangs in our eyes, we cannot order our speech by reason of darkness; death will shortly cut these locks, and then we shall see all things clearly. [2.] They cannot be fully seen, but as the stars through the thin clouds. Some make it to intimate the bashfulness of her looks; she suffers not her eyes to wander, but limits them within her locks.

2. Her hair; it is compared to a flock of goats, which looked white, and were composed of the hills of the mountains, like a fine head of hair; and the sight was the more pleasant to the spectator, because the goats have not only gravity from their beards, but they are comely in going; (Prov. xxx. 29.) but it was most pleasant of all to the owner, much of whose riches consisted in his flocks. Christ puts a value upon that in the church, and in believers, which others make no more account of than of their hair; he told his disciples that the very hairs of their head are numbered, (Matt. x. 29.) and our Saviour speaks of it as if it were a matter of great condescension in God to set them before his eyes.

3. Her hands are compared to the flocks, (Matth. x. 30.) and that not a hair of their head should perish, Luke xxii. 18. Some by the hair here understand the outward conversation of a believer, which ought to be comely, and decent, and agreeable to the holiness of the heart. The apostle opposes good works, such as become the professors of godliness, to the plaiting of the hair, 1 Tim. ii. 9, 10. Mary Magdalene’s hair was beautiful when she wiped the feet of Christ with it. 4. Her hair is compared to the flocks, (Matth. x. 30.) and that not a hair of their head should perish, Luke xxii. 18. Some by the hair here understand the outward conversation of a believer, which ought to be comely, and decent, and agreeable to the holiness of the heart. The apostle opposes good works, such as become the professors of godliness, to the plaiting of the hair, 1 Tim. ii. 9, 10. Mary Magdalene’s hair was beautiful when she wiped the feet of Christ with it. 5. Her hands are compared to the flocks, (Matth. x. 30.) and that not a hair of their head should perish, Luke xxii. 18. Some by the hair here understand the outward conversation of a believer, which ought to be comely, and decent, and agreeable to the holiness of the heart. The apostle opposes good works, such as become the professors of godliness, to the plaiting of the hair, 1 Tim. ii. 9, 10. Mary Magdalene’s hair was beautiful when she wiped the feet of Christ with it.
(4.) Her lips; these are compared to a thread of scarlet; (v. 3.) red lips are comely, and a sign of health, as the paleness of the lips is a sign of faintness and weakness; her lips were of the colour of scarlet, but thin lips, like a thread of scarlet; the next words explain it; Thy speech is comely, always with grace, good, and to the use of edifying, which adds much to the beauty of a Christian. When we praise God with our lips, and with the mouth make confession of him to salvation, then they are as a thread of scarlet. All our good works and good words must be washed in the blood of Christ, dyed like the scarlet thread, and then, and not till then, they are acceptable to God. The Chaldee applies it to the chief priest, and his prayers for Israel on the day of atonement.

(5.) Her temples, or cheeks, which are here compared to a piece of honeysuckle; this may refer to the context, as in the following verse, yet it is a metaphor. There is no such flower as honeysuckle. This word is a corruption of the Chaldee word mcmch, meaning her cheeks, which is compared to a blush in the face. Humility and modesty, blushing to lift up our faces before God, blushing at the remembrance of sin, and in a sense of our unworthiness of the honour put upon us, will beautify us very much in the eyes of Christ. The blushes of Christ’s bride are within her locks, which intimates (says Mr. Durham) that she blushing when no other sees, and for which none sees but God and conscience; also that she seems like many other modest graces of her beauty, but modesty surpasses that too; yet the evidences of all these, in a tender walk, appear, and are, comely. (6.) Her neck; this is here compared to the tower of David; (v. 4.) this is generally applied to the grace of faith, by which we are united to Christ, as the body is united to the head by the neck; this is like the tower of David, furnishing us with weapons of war, especially bucklers and shields, as the soldiers are supplied with them out of that tower; faith is our shield, (Eph. vi. 16.) they have that it never want a buckler, for God will compass them with his favour as with a shield. When this neck is like a tower, straight, and stately, and strong, a Christian goes on his way, and works with courage and magnanimity, and does not hang a drooping head, as he does when faith fails. Some make the shields of the mighty men, that are here said to hang up in the temple, to be the action of faith, the value of David’s worthies; their shields were preserved, to keep in remembrance them and their heroic acts, intimating, that it is a great encouragement to the saints to hold up their heads, to see what great things the saints in all ages have accomplished and won by faith. In Heb. xi. we have the shields of the mighty men hung up, the exploits of believers, and the trophies of their victories.

(7.) Her breasts; these are like two young roes that are twins, v. 5. The church’s breasts are both for ornament, (Ezek. xvi. 7.) and for use, they are the breasts of her consolation, (Isa. lxvi. 11.) as she is said to suck the breasts of kings, Isa. lx. 16. Some apply these to the two Testaments; others to the two sacraments, the seals of the covenant of grace; others to the ministers, who are to be spiritual nurses to the children of God, and to give out to them the sincere milk of the word, that they may grow thereby; and, in order to that, are themselves to feed among the little Christ feeds, (ch. ii. 16.) that they may be to the babes of the church as full breasts. Or, the breasts of a believer are his love to Christ, which he is pleased with, as a tender husband is with the affection of his wife, who is therefore said to be to him as the loving hind, and the pleasant roe, because her breasts satisfy him at all times, Prov. v. 19. This includes also his edifying others, and communing with them, which adds much to a Christian’s beauty.

II. The Bridegroom’s resolution hereupon to receive to the mountain of myrrh, (v. 6.) and there to make his residence. This mountain of myrrh is supposed to signify the mount Moriah, on which the temple was built, where incense was daily burnt to the honour of God; Christ was so pleased with the beauty of his church, that he chose this to be his rest for ever, here he will dwell till the day break and the shadows flee away. Christ’s parting promise to his disciples, as he rejoices to stay in the city, as Lo, I am with you always, even to the end of the world. Where the ordinances of God are duly administered, there Christ will be, and there we must meet him at the door of the tabernacle of the meeting. Some make these to be the words of the spouse, either modestly ashamed of the praises given her, and willing to get out of the hearing of them, or desirous to be constant to the holy hill, not doubting but there to find suitable and salutary relief in all her straits, and there to cast anchor, and wish for the day which, at the time appointed, would break, and the shadows flee away. The holy hill (as some observe) is here called a mountain of myrrh, which is bitter, and a hill of frankincense, which is sweet, for there we have occasion both to mourn and rejoice; repentance is a bitter sweet, but in heaven it will be all frankincense, and no myrrh. Prayer is compared to the mountain, and Christ will meet his praying people, and will bless them.

III. His repeated commendation of the beauty of his spouse; (v. 7.) Thou art all fair, my love. He had said, (v. 1.) Thou art fair; but here he goes further, and, in review of the particulars, as of those of the creation, he pronounces all very good; “Thou art all fair, my love, thou art all over beautiful, and there is nothing amiss in thee, and thus hast all beauties in thee; thou art sanctified and chosen, (2 Cor. v. 17.) there is not only a new face and a new name, but a new man, a new nature; there is no spot in thee, as far as thou art renewed.” The spiritual sacrifices must be without blemish; there is no spot but such as is often the spot of God’s children, none of the leopard’s spots. The church, when Christ shall present it to himself a glorious church will be altogether without spot or wrinkle, Eph. v. 27.

3. Come with me from Lebanon, my spouse, with me from Lebanon: look from the top of Amana, from the top of Shenir and Hermon, from the lions’ dens, from the mountains of the leopards. 9. Thou hast ravished my heart, my sister, my spouse; thou hast ravished my heart with one of thine eyes, with one chain of thy neck. 10. How fair is thy love, my sister, my spouse! how much better is thy love than wine! and the smell of thine ointments than all spices! 11. Thy lips, O my spouse, drop as the honeycomb; honey and milk are under thy tongue; and the smell of thy garments is like the smell of Lebanon. 12. A garden enclosed is my sister, my spouse; a spring shut up, a fountain sealed. 13. Thy plants are an orchard of pomegranates, with pleasant fruits; camphire, with spike erad; 14. Spikenard and saffron; calamus and cinnamon, with all trees of frankincense; myrrh and aloes, with all the chief spices.

These are still the words of Christ to his church, expressing his great esteem of her and affection to.
her, the opinion he had of her beauty and excellency, the desire he had of, and the delight he had in, her converse and society. And so ought men to love their wives as Christ loves the church, and takes pleasure in it as if it were spotless and had no fault, which he cannot be displeased with infirmity.

Now, observe here,

I. The end-earing names and titles by which he calls her, to express his love to her, to assure her of it, and to engage and excite her love to him. Twice here he calls her My spouse, (v. 8, 11.) and three times My sister, my spouse, v. 9, 10, 12. Mention was made (ch. iii. 11.) of the day of his espousals, and, after that, she is called his spouse, not his wife only, but his spouse, the same in all things, but especially as to the covenant of grace, which, between Christ and his church, between Christ and every true believer. Christ calls his church his spouse, and his calling her so makes her so, "I have betrothed thee unto me for ever; and as the bridegroom rejoices over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee." He is not ashamed to own the relation, but, as becomes a kind and tender husband, he speaks affectionately to her, and calls her his spouse, which can never but strongly engage her to be faithful to him. Nay, braver and more correct, among men is sufficient to set forth Christ's love to his church, and, to show that all this must be understood spiritually, he owns her in two relations, which, among men, are incompatible, My sister, my spouse. Abraham's saying of Sarah, "She is my sister, was interpreted as a denying her to be his wife; but Christ's church is to him both a sister and a spouse, Matth. xii. 50. a sister and mother. His calling her sister, is grounded upon his taking our nature upon him in his incarnation, and his making us partakers of his nature in our sanctification. He clothed himself with a body, (Heb. ii. 14.) and he clothes believers with his Spirit, (1 Cor. vi. 17.) and so they become his sisters. They are children of God his Father, (2 Cor. vi. 18.) and so they become his sisters; he that sanctifies, and they that are sanctified, are all of one, (Heb. ii. 11.) and he owns them, and loves them, as his sisters.

II. The gracious call he gives her to come along with him as a faithful bride, that must forget her own people and her father's house, and leave all to cleave to him. Ubi tu Caius, ibi ego Caius—Where thou Caius art, I Caius will be. Come with me from Lebanon, v. 8. It is, 1. A precept; so we take it, like that, (ch. i. 10, 13.) Rise up, and come away. All that are by faith come to Christ, must come with Christ, in holy obedience to him, and compliance with him. Being joined to him, we must walk with him. This is his command to us daily, "Come with me, my spouse; come with me to God as a Father, come with me onward, heavenward, come forward with me, come up with me; come with me from Lebanon, from the top of Amman, from the lions' dens." These mountains are to be considered, (1.) As seemingly delightful places; Lebanon is called that goodly mountain, Deut. xxxii. 55. We read of the city of Lebanon, (Isa. vii. 4.) and its sweet smell, Hos. xiv. 6. We read of the pleasant dew of Hermion, (Ps. cxxxii. 3.) and the joy of Hermion; (Ps. lxxix. 12.) and we may suppose the other mountains here mentioned to be pleasant ones; and so this is Christ's call to his spouse to come off from the world, all its products, all its pleasures, to sit loose to all the delights of sense; all those must do so that would come with Christ; they must take the affronts of all present things; you, though they be placed at the upper end of the world, on the top of Amman, and the top of Shenir, though they enjoy the highest satisfactions the creature can propose to give, yet they must come away from them all, and live above the tops of the highest hills on earth, that they may have their conversation in heaven. Come from those mountains, to go along with Christ to the holy mountain, the mountain of myrrh, v. 6. Even while we have our residence on these mountains, yet we must look beyond from them, look beyond them to the hills. No; our helps come from the Lord, Ps. cxxi. 1, 2. We must look beyond them, to the things that are not seen, (as these high hills are,) that are eternal. From the tops of Shenir and Hermion, which were on the other side Jordan, as from Pisgah, they could see the land of Canaan; from this world we must look forward to the better country.

(2.) They are to be considered as really dangerous; such as are considered as the tops of the mountains, but, though there are in them lions' dens; they are mountains of the leopards, mountains of prey, though they seem glorious and excellent, Ps. lxxvi. 4. Satan, that roaring lion, is the prince of this world, in the things of it he lies in wait to devour; on the tops of these mountains there are many dangerous temptations to those who take up their residence in them; and therefore come with me from them; let us not set our hearts upon the things of this world, and think the things of this world worth the taking. Come out from the temples of idolaters, and the societies of wicked people; so some understand it; Come out from among them, and be ye separate. Come from under the dominion of your own lusts, which are as lions and leopards, fierce upon us, and making us fierce.

2. It may be taken as a promise; Thou shalt come with me from Lebanon, from the lions' dens; that is, (1.) "Many shall be brought home to me, as living members of the church, from every point, from Lebanon in the north, Amman in the west, Hermion in the east, Shenir in the south, from all parts, to sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Matth. viii. 11. See Isa. xlix. 11, 12. Some come from the tops of these mountains, some of the great men of this world, shall give themselves to Christ. (2.) The church shall be delivered from her persecutors, in due time; though now she dwells among lions, Ps. lxxxv. 4.) Christ will take her with himself from among their dens.

III. The great delight Christ takes in his church, and in all believers. He delights in them,

1. As in an agreeable bride, adorned for her husband, (Rev. xvi. 2.) who greatly desires her beauty, Ps. lxxiv. 11. No expressions of love can be more passionate than these here, in which Christ manifests his affection to his church; and yet that great proof of his love, his dying for it, that he might present it to himself a glorious church, goes beyond them all. A spouse, so dearly bought and paid for, could not but be dearly loved; such a price being given for her, a high value must needs be put upon her accordingly; and both together may well set us a wondering at the height and depth, and length and breadth, of the love of Christ, which passes knowledge, that love in which he gave himself for us, and gives himself to us. Observe,

1) How he is affected towards his spouse; Thou hast ravished my heart; the word is used only here, Thou hast hearted me, or, Thou hast unhearted me. New words are coined to express the inexpressibleness of Christ's surprising love to his church; and the strength of that love is set forth by that which is a weakness in men, who are so much in love with one object, as to be heartless to everything else. This may refer to that love which Christ had to the church before the worlds were, when his delights were with the sons of men, (Prov. viii. 31.) that first love, which brought him from heaven to earth, to seek and save them at such vast expense, yet including the complacency he takes in them when he brought them to himself. Note, Christ's
The honey is upon his church; so it has appeared all along; his treasure is in it, is his peculiar treasure, (Exod. xix. 3.) and therefore there his heart is also. "Never was love like unto the love of Christ, which made him even mindless of himself, when he emptied himself of his glory, and freely gave all shame and pain, for our sakes. The wound of love towards us, which he had from eternity in himself, made him neglect all the wounds and reproaches of the cross;" so Bishop Reynolds here. Thus let us love him.

(2.) What it is that affects him with delight.

[1.] The regard she has to him; Thou hast raised my heart with one of thine eyes, says Prov. v. 9., i.e. with one glance of thine eyes. Christ is with delight fully pleased with those that look unto him as their Saviour, and through the eye of faith dart their affections to him above any rival whatsoever, and whose eyes are ever towards him; he is soon aware of the first look of a soul towards him, and meets it with his favours.

[2.] The ornaments she has from him, that is, the providence she yields to him, for that is the chain of her heart which enriches her soul, which are connected as links in a chain; the exercise of these graces in a conversation which adorns both herself and the doctrine of Jesus Christ, which she professes to believe, as a gold chain is an ornament to persons of quality, and an entire submission to the commanding power of his law, and the constraining power of his love; having shaken off the bands of our neck, by which we were tied to this world, (Isa. lii. 2.) and the yoke of transgression, wound band with the cords of love, as chains of gold, to Jesus Christ, and our necks are brought under his sweet and easy yoke, to draw in it; this recommends us to Jesus Christ, for this is that true wisdom which, in his account, is an ornament of grace unto the head, and chains about the neck, Prov. i. 9.

[3.] The affection she has for him; How fair is thy love! how beautiful is it! Not only thy love itself, but all the fruits and products of it, its working in the heart, its works in the life. How well does it become a believer thus to love Christ, and what a pleasure does Christ take in it! Nothing recommends us to Christ so as this does. How much better is thy love than wine! Than all the wine that was poured out to the Lord in the drink-offerings; hence the fruit of the vine is said to cheer God and man, Judges ix. 13. She had said of Christ's love, It is better than wine; (ch. i. 2.) and now Christ says so of her's; there is nothing lost by praising Christ, nor will he be behindhand with his friends in kindness.

[4.] The ointments, the odours, wherewith she is perfumed, the gifts and graces of the Spirit, her good works, which are an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God, Phil. iv. 18. The smell of thine ointment is better than all spices, such as the queen of Sheba presented to Solomon, camel-loads of them, (1 Kings x. 2.) or, rather, in all the spices that were used in compounding the holy incense which was burned daily on the golden altar; love and obedience to God are more pleasing to Christ than sacrifice or incense. The smell of her garb too, the visible professions she makes of religion, and relation to Christ, before men, and wherein she appears to the world, this is very grateful to Christ, as the smell of Lebanon. Christ having put upon his spouse the white robes of his righteousness, (Rev. lii. 8.) and the righteousness of saints, (Rev. v. 12.) and this perfumed with holy joy and comfort, he is well-pleased with it.

[5.] Her words, both in her devotions to God, and her discourses with men; (v. 11.) Thy lips, O my spouse, drop as the honey-comb, drop that which is very sweet, and drop it freely and plentifully. If what God speaks to us be sweeter to us than the honey and the honey-comb, (Ps. xix. 10.) what we say to him in prayer and praise shall also be pleasing to him; Sweet is thy voice. And if, out of a good treasure, (ch. ii. 13.) you bring forth good things, if you speak be always with grace, if our lips have knowledge aright, if they disperse knowledge, they then, in Christ's account, even drop as the honey-comb, cut-drop it. Honey and milk (the two staple commodities of Canaan) are under thy tongue; that is, in thy heart; not only reserved there for thy own use as a sweet morsel for thyself, but ready there for the use of others. In the word of God there is milk and honey, (ch. ix. 6.) and all moment, milk for babes, honey for those that are grown. Christ is well pleased with those that are full of his word.

2. As in a pleasant garden. And well may a very great delight be compared to the delight taken in a garden, when the happiness of Adam in innocence was represented by the putting of him in a garden, a garden of pleasure. This comparison is pursued, v. 12-14. The church is fitly compared to a garden, to a garden which, as usual, had a fountain in it; where Solomon had made it, he made him pools of water, (Eccle. ii. 5, 6.) not only for curiosity and diversion, in water-works, but for use, to water the gardens; Eden was well watered, Gen. ii. 10.-xiii. 10. Observe,

(1.) The peculiarity of this garden; it is a garden enclosed, a paradise separated from the common earth; it is appropriated to God, he has set it apart for himself. Israel is God's portion, the lot of his inheritance, (Deut. xxxiii. 9.) it is enclosed for secrecy; the saints are God's hidden ones, there are the ways they know them not; Christ walks in his garden unseen. It is enclosed for safety; a hedge of protection is made about it, which all the powers of darkness cannot either find or make a gap in. God's vineyard is fenced; (Isa. v. 2.) there is a wall about it, a wall of fire. It has a spring in it, and a fountain, but it is a spring shut up, and a fountain sealed, which sends its streams abroad, (Prov. v. 16.) but it is shut up; the fountain of a loving heart; surely, by any lisp of a loving hand must be muffled or polluted. Their pleasures of believers are as gardens enclosed; grace in them is as a spring shut up there in the hidden man of the heart, where the water that Christ gives is a well of living water, John iv. 14.-vii. 38. The Old Testament church was a garden enclosed by the partition wall of the ceremonial law; the Bible was then a spring shut up and a fountain sealed, it was confined to one nation; but now the wall of separation is removed, the gospel preached to every nation, and in Jesus Christ there is neither Greek nor Jew.

(2.) The products of this garden; it is as the garden of Eden, where the Lord God made to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight, and good for food, Gen. ii. 9. Thy plants, or plantations, are an orchard of honeymatres with pleasant fruits, (v. 9.) It is not like the vineyard of the man void of understanding, that was all grass over with thorns and nettles; but here are fruits, pleasant fruits, all trees of frankincense, and all the chief spices, v. 14. Here is great plenty of fruits, and great variety, nothing wanting which might either beautify, or enrich, this garden, might make it either delightful or serviceable to its great Lord; every thing here is the best of the kind; their chief spices were much more valuable, because much more durable, than the choicest of our flowers. Solomon was a great master in botany as well as other parts of natural philosophy; he treated largely of trees, (1 Kings iv. 33.) and perhaps had reference to some specific qualities of the fruits here specified.
which made them very fit for the purpose for which he alludes to them; but we must be content to observe, in general, that saints in the church, and graces in the soul, are very truly compared to these fruits and spices; for, [1.] They are planted, and do not grow of themselves; the trees of righteousness are the planting of the Lord, (Isa. xi. 3.) grace springs from an incorruptible seed. [2.] They are precious and of high value; hence we read of the precious sons of Zion and their precious faith, they are plants of renown. [3.] They are pleasant, and of a sweet savour to God and man, and, as such, they are sent to the church; [4.] They are profitable and of great use; saints are the blessings of this earth, and their graces are their riches with which they trade as the merchants of the east with their spices. [5.] They are permanent, and will be preserved to good purpose, when flowers are withered and good for nothing. Grace, reduced into glory, will last for ever.

15. A fountain of gardens, a well of living waters, and streams from Lebanon. 16. Awake, O north wind; and come, thou south; blow upon my garden, that the spices thereof may flow out. Let my beloved come into his garden, and eat his pleasant fruits.

These seem to be the words of the spouse, the church, in answer to the commendations which Christ, the Bridegroom, had given of her as a pleasant-fruitful garden. Is she a garden?

1. She owns her dependence upon Christ himself to make this garden fruitful; to him she has an eye, (v. 15.) as the Fountain of gardens, not only the Founder of them, by whom they are planted, and to whom they owe their being, but the Fountain of them, by whom they are watered, and to whom they owe their continuance and well-being, and without whose constant supplies, they would soon become like the dry and barren wilderness; to him she gives all the glory of her fruitfulness, as being nothing without him; O Fountain of gardens, Fountain of all good, of all grace, do thou fail me.

Does a believer say to the church, All my springs are in thee, in thee, O Zion? (Ps. lxxxvii. 7.) The church transmits the praise to Christ, and says to him, All my springs are in thee; thou art the Weld of living waters, (Jer. ii. 12.) out of which flow the streams of Lebanon, the river Jordan, which had its rise at the foot of mount Lebanon, and the waters of the sanctuary, which issued out from under the threshold of the house, Ezek. xlvii. 1. They that are gardens to Christ, must acknowledge him a Fountain to them, from whose fulness they receive, and to whom it is owing that their souls are as a watered garden, Jer. xxxii. 12. The city of God on earth is made glad with the rivers of waters, and the rivers of Lebanon, the river Jordan, and the new Jerusalem has its pure river of water of life proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb, Rev. xxii. 1.2.

2. She implores the influences of the blessed Spirit to make this garden fragrant; (v. 16.) Awake, O north wind, and come, thou south. This is a prayer, (1.) For the church in general, and in that there may be a plentiful effusion of the Spirit upon it, in order to its flourishing and steps to God; [2.] When the Spirit is poured out, these flow forth, and then the wilderness becomes a fruitful field, Isa. xxxiv. 15. This prayer was answered in the pouring out of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost, (Acts ii. 1.) ushered in by a mighty wind; then the apostles, who were bound up before, flowed forth, and were a sweet savour to God, 2 Cor. ii. 15. (2.) For particular believers. Note, [1.] Sanctified souls are as gardens, gardens of the Lord, en closed for him. [2.] Graces in the soul are as spices that burn, to bring forth sweet savours, strong and useful. [3.] It is very desirable that the spices of grace should flow forth both in pious and devout affections, and in holy, gracious actions, that with them we may honour God, adorn our profession, and do that which will be grateful to good men. [4.] The blessed Spirit, in his operations upon the soul, is as the north and the south wind, which blows where it listeth, and from several points, John iii. 8. [5.] That is the fountain of life: and when he comes, and the south wind of comforts; but all, like an old man, brought out of God's treasuries, and fulfilling his word. [5.] The flowing forth of the spices of grace depends upon the gales of the Spirit; he stirs up good affections, and works in us both to will and to do that which is good; it is he that makes manifest the savour of his knowledge by us. [6.] We ought therefore to wait upon the Spirit of grace for his quickening influences, to pray for them, and to lay our souls under them. God has promised to give us his Spirit, but he will for this be inquired of.

3. She invites Christ to the best entertainment the garden affords; Let my beloved then come into his garden, and eat his pleasant fruits; let him have the honour of all the products of the garden, it is fit he should, and let me have the comfort of his acceptance of them, for that is the best account they can be made to turn to. Observe, (1.) She calls it his garden; for these are his, that he has possessed them, and brought them out of God's treasuries, and not till then. The fruits of the garden are his pleasant fruits, for he planted them, watered them, and gave the increase. What can we pretend to merit at Christ's hands, when we can invite him to nothing but what is his own already? (2.) She begs he would visit it, and accept of what it produced. The believer can take little pleasure in his garden, unless Christ, the Beloved of his soul, come to him, nor have any joy of the fruits of it, unless they redound some way or other to the glory of Christ, and he will think all he has, well bestowed upon him.

CHAP. V.

In this chapter, we have, I. Christ's gracious acceptance of the invitation which his church had given him, and the kind visit which he made to her, v. 1. II. The account which the spouse gives of her own folly, in putting a slight upon her Beloved, and the distress she was in by reason of his withdrawals, v. 2-. 5. III. The inquiry of the daughters of Jerusalem concerning the amiable perfections of her Beloved, (v. 9.) and her particular answer to that inquiry, v. 10.-16. Unto you that believe he is thus precious.

1. I AM come into my garden, my sister, my spouse: I have gathered my myrrh with my spice; I have eaten my honeycomb with my honey; I have drunk my wine with my milk: eat, O friends; drink, yea, drink abundantly, O beloved.

These words are Christ's answer to the church's prayer in the close of the foregoing chapter, Let my Beloved come into his garden, and let us know it. See how ready God is to hear prayer; how ready Christ is to accept the invitations that his people give him, though we are backward to hear his calls, and accept his invitations. He is free in conceding to us, while we are shy of ascending to him. Observe how the return answered the request, and outdid it.

1. She called him her Beloved, (and really he was so,) and therefore invited him, because she loved him; in return to this, he called her his sister and spouse, as several times before, ch. iv. Those that make Christ their best Beloved, shall be owned by him in the nearest and dearest relations.

2. She called the garden his, and the pleasant fruits of it his, and he acknowledges them to be so; It is my garden, it is my spice. When God was displeased with Israel, he turned them off to Moses. They are thy people; (Exod. xxxvi. 7.) and he called the appointed feasts of the Lord their appointed feasts; (Isa. i. 14.) but, now that they are in his favour, he owns them for his garden; though of small account, yet it is mine. They that in sincerity give up themselves and all they have, and do, to Jesus Christ, he will do them the honour to stamp them, and what they have, and do, for him, with his own mark, and say, It is mine.

3. He was come into his garden, and he says, I am come, Isa. viii. 9. Thou shalt cry, and he shall say, Here I am. When Solomon prayed that God would come, and take possession of the house he had built for him, he did come, his glory filled the house, (2 Chron. vii. 2.) and (v. 16.) he let him know that he had chosen and sanctified this house, that his name might be there for ever. They that throw open the door of their souls to Jesus Christ, shall find him in every place where he records his name, he will meet his people, and bless them, Exod. xx. 24.

4. She desired him to eat his pleasant fruits, to accept of the sacrifices offered in his temple, which were as the fruits of his garden, and he does so, but finds they were not ready for eating, therefore he does himself gather them; as the fruits are his, so is the preparation of them; he finds the heart unready for his entertainment, but does himself draw out the wine, he has, and places them in the garden planted there. What little good there is in us, would be shed and lost if he did not gather it, and preserve it to himself.

5. She only desired him to eat the fruits of the garden, but he brought along with him something more, honey, and wine, and milk, which yield substantial nourishment, and which were the products of Canaan, Immanuel's land. Christ delights himself with the sweetness of his people; he has found in his bosom a banquet of wine; it is but plain fare, and what is natural, honey and milk, but, being kindly designed, it is kindly accepted; imperfections are overlooked, the honey-comb is eaten with the honey, and the weakness of the flesh passed by, and pardoned, because the spirit is willing. When Christ appeared to his disciples after his resurrection, he did eat with them a piece of honey-comb, (Luke xxiv. 42, 43.) in which this scripture was fulfilled. He did not drink the wine only, which is liquor for men, for great men, but the milk too, which is liquor for children, little children, for he was to be the holy child Jesus, that had need of milk.

6. She only invited him to come himself, but he, bringing his own entertainment along with him, brings his friends too, and invites them to share in the provisions. The more the merrier, we say, and here, where there was so much plenty, there was not the worse fare. When our Lord Jesus fed five thousand at once, they did all eat, and were filled. Christ invites all his friends to the wine and milk which he himself drinks of, (Isa. lv. 1.) to the feast of fat things, and wines on the lees, Isa. xxv. 6.

The great work of man's redemption, and the riches of the covenant of grace, are a feast to the Lord Jesus, and they ought to be so to us. The invitation is very free, and hearty, and loving; Eat, O friends. If Christ comes to sup with us, it is we that sup with him, Rev. iii. 20. Eat, O friends. Those only that are Christ's friends are welcome to his table; his enemies, that will not have him to reign over them, have no part or lot in the matter. Drink, yea, drink abundantly. Christ, in his gospel, has made plentiful provision for poor souls; he fills the hungry with good things; but there is enough for each, we are not straitened in him or in his grace; let us not therefore be straitened in our own bosoms. Often thy mouth wide, and Christ will fill it. Be not drunk with wine, be filled with the Spirit, Eph. v. 18. Those that entertain Christ must bid his friends welcome with him; Jesus and his disciples were called together to the marriage, (John ii. 2.) and Christ will have all his friends to rejoice with him in the day of his gladness, and his proposals to his church, and, in token of that, to feast with him. In spiritual and heavenly joys there is no danger of exceeding; there we may drink abundantly, drink of the river of God's pleasures, (Ps. xxxvi. 8.) and be abundantly satisfied, Ps. lxiv. 4.

2. I sleep, but my heart wakeeth: it is the voice of my beloved that knocketh, saying, Open to me, my sister, my love, my dove, my undefiled: for my head is filled with dew, and my locks with the drops of the night.

3. I have put off my coat; how shall I put it on? I have washed my feet; how shall I defile them? 4. My beloved put in his hand by the hole of the door, and my bowels were moved for him.

5. I rose up to open to my beloved; and my hands dropped with myrrh, and my fingers with sweet-smelling myrrh, upon the handles of the lock.

6. I opened to my beloved; but my beloved had withdrawn himself; and was gone: my soul failed when he spake; I sought him, but I could not find him; I called him, but he gave me no answer. 7. The watchmen that went about the city found me, they smote me, they wounded me; the keepers of the walls took away my vail from me.

8. I charge you, O daughters of Jerusalem, if ye find my beloved, that ye tell him, that I am sick of love.

In this song of loves and joys, we have here a very melancholy scene; the spouse here speaks, not to her Beloved, (as before, for he is withdrawn,) but of him, and it is a sad story she tells of her own folly and ill conduct toward him, notwithstanding his kindness, and of the just rebukes she felt under for it; perhaps it may refer to Solomon's own apostasy from God, and the sad effects of that apostasy, after God had come into his garden, had taken possession of the temple he had built, and he had feasted with God upon the sacrifices; (ch. 2.) however, it is applicable to the too common case both of churches and particular believers, who by their carelessness and slackness provoke Christ to withdraw from them. Observe,

1. The indisposition that the spouse was under, and the listlessness that had seized her; (v. 2.) I sleep, but my heart wakes. Here is, 1. Corruption appearing in the actions of it; I sleep; the wise virgins slumbered. She was on her bed, (ch. ii. 1.) but now she sleeps. Spiritual distempers, if not striven against at first, are apt to grow upon us, and to get ground. She slept; pious affections cooled, she neglected her duty, and grew remiss in it, she indulged herself in her ease, was secure and off her watch. This is sometimes the bad effect of more than ordinary enlargements, a good cause. St. Paul himself was in danger of being puffed up with abundant revelations, and of saying, Soul, take thine ease, which made a thorn in the flesh necessary for him, to keep him from sleeping. Christ's disciples, when he was come into his garden, the garden of his agony, were heavy with sleep, and would have slept with him. True Christians are not always alike lively and vigorous in religion. 2. Grace remaining, notwithstanding, in the habit of it; "My heart wakes, my own conscience reproaches me for it, and ceases not to rouse me out of my sluggishness. The spirit is willing, and, after the inner man, I delight in the law of God, and with my mind I serve that. I am, for the present, overpowered by temptation, but all does not go one way in me. I sleep, but it is not a dead sleep, I strive against it; probably I stand sleep, I cannot be easy under this indisposition." Note. (1.) We ought to take notice of our own spiritual slumberers and distempers, and to reflect upon it with sorrow and shame that we have fallen asleep, when Christ has been nigh us in his garden. (2.) When we are lamenting what is amiss in us, we must not overlook the good that is wrought in us, and preserved alive. "My heart wakes in Christ, who is dear to me as my own heart, and is my Life; when I sleep, he neither slumbers nor sleeps." II. The call that Christ gave to her, when she was under this indisposition; It is the voice of my Beloved; she knew it to be so, and was soon aware of it, which was a sign that her heart was awake. Like the child Samuel, she heard at the first call, but did not, like him, mistake the person; she knew it to be the voice of Christ. He knocks, to awaken us to come and let him in; knocks by his word and Spirit, knocks by afflictions and by our own consciences; though, this is not distressing to me, as it is referred to, (Rev. iii. 20.) Behold, I stand at the door, and knock. He calls sinners into covenant with him, and wails into communion with him. Those whom he loves he will not let alone in their carelessness, but will find some way or other to awaken them, to rebuke and chasten them. When we are unmindful of Christ, he thinks of us, and provides that our faith fail not. Peter denied Christ, but the Lord turned, and looked upon him, and so brought him to himself again. Observe how moving the call is, Open to me, my sister, my love. 1. He snes for entrance, who may demand it; and knocks, who could easily knock the door down. 2. He gives her all the kind and most endearing titles imaginable, My sister, my love, my dove, my unfeigned; he not only gives her no hard names, nor upbriahs her with unkindness in not sitting up for him, but, on the contrary, studies how to express his tender affection to her still; blessing-kindness he will not utter imperfectly. Those who turn and turn again to Christ, he looks upon as his sisters, his loves, his doves, and all that is dear; and, being clothed with his righteousness, they are unfiended. This consideration should induce ours to open to him. Christ's love to us should engage ours to him, even in the most self-denying instances. Open to me. Can we deny entrance to such a friend, to such a guest? Shall we not converse more with one that is infinitely worthy of our acquaintance, and respect, and love, and esteem, than we only can be grudgers by it? 3. He pleads distress, and begs to be admitted sub forma fustis—under the character of a poor traveller, that wants a lodging; "My head is wet with the dew, with the cold drops of the night; consider what hardships I have undergone to merit thee, which surely may merit from thee so small a kindness as this." When Christ was crowned with thorns, which, no doubt, fetched blood from his blessed head, then was his head wet with the dew; "Consider what a grief it is to me to be thus unlively kind, as much as it would be to a tender husband to be kept out of doors by his wife in a rainy stormy night."

Do we thus requite him for his love? The slights which can be put on Jesus Christ are to him as a continual drafting on a very rotten dye.

III. The excuse she made to put off her compliance with this call; (v. 3.) I have put off my coat, how shall I put it on again? She is half asleep, she knows the voice of her Beloved, she knows his knock, but cannot find in her heart to open to him; she was undressed, and would not be at the pains to dress her again; she had washed her feet, and would not have occasion to wash them again. She could not send another to open the door, (it must be her own act and deed to let Christ into our hearts,) and yet she was loath to go herself; she did not say, I will not open, but How shall I? Note, Frivolous excuses are the language of prevailing slothfulness in religion; Christ calls to us to open to him, but we pretend we have no mind, or we have no strength, or we have no time, and therefore think we may be excused, as the sluggard that will not plough by reason of cold. And those who ought to watch for the Lord's coming, with their lamps girt, if they ought themselves, and put out of their way they will find it difficult to recover their former resolution, and to put it on again; it is best therefore to keep tight. Making excuses, (Luke xiv. 18.) is interpreted making light of Christ; (Matt. xxii. 5.) and so is it. Those put a great contempt upon Christ that cannot find in their hearts to bear a cold blast for him, or get out of a warm bed.

IV. The powerful influences of divine grace, by which she was made willing to rise, and open to her Beloved. If we could not prevail with her by our way of persuasion, he put in his hand by the hole of the door, to unbolt it, as one weary of waiting. v. 4. This intimates a work of the Spirit upon her soul, by which she was of unwilling made willing, Ps. cx. 3. The conversion of Lydia is represented by the opening of her heart, (Acts xvi. 14.) and Christ is said to open his disciples' understandings, Luke xxiv. 45. He that formed the spirit of man knows all the avenues to it, and which way to come in. It is not only possible for God to find all the ways in which to put in his hand for the conquering of prejudices, and the introducing of his own doctrine and law. He has the key of David, (Rev. iii. 7.) with which he opens the door of the heart in such a way as is suited to it, as the key is fitted to the wards of the lock; in such a way as not to put a force upon its nature, but only upon its ill nature.

V. Her compliance with these methods of divine grace at last; My bowels were moved for him. The bowels were moved for a good work, on a very rainy day. Her affections; My bowels were moved for him, as those of the two disciples were, when Christ made their heart to burn within them. She was moved with compassion to her Beloved, because his head was wet with the dew. Note, Tenderness of spirit, and a heart of flesh, prepare the soul for the reception of Christ into it; and therefore his love to us is represented in such a way as is most affecting. Did Christ redeem us in his pity? Let us in pity receive him, and, in the strength that are his, when at any time they are in distress.

This good work, wrought upon her affections, raised her up, and made her ashamed of her dulness and slothfulness; (v. 5.) I rose up to open to my Beloved; his grace inclining her to do it, and con quer the opposition of unbelief. It was her own act, and yet he wrought it in her. And now her hand dropped with myrrh upon the handles of the lock.

Either. 1. She found it there when she applied her hand to the lock, to short it back; he that put in his hand by the hole of the door, left it there as an evidence that he had been there. When Christ has wrought powerfully upon a soul, he leaves a blessed sweetness in it, which is very delightful to it; with this he oiled the lock, to make it go easy. Note, When we apply ourselves to our duty, in the lively exercises of faith, under the influence of divine grace, we shall find it will go on much more readily and sweetly than we expected.
If we will but rise up, to open to Christ, we shall find the difficulty we apprehended in it, strangely overcome, and shall say with Daniel, now let my Lord speak, for thou hast strengthened me, Dan.
x. 19. Or, 2. She brought it thither. Her bowsels being moved for her Beloved, who had stood so long in the cold and wet, when she came to open to him, she presumed to point his head, and so to refresh and comfort him, and perhaps to prevent his catch-ning cold; she was in such haste to meet him, that she would not stay to make the usual preparation, but dipped her hand in her box of ointment, that she might readily anoint his head, at his first coming in.
Those that open the doors of their hearts to Christ, those everlasting doors, must meet him with the lively exercises of faith, and other graces, and with the acts of compassion they beget.

VI. Her sad disappointment, when she did open to her Beloved. And here is the most melancholy part of the story; I opened to my Beloved, as I intended, but alas! my Beloved had withdrawn himself, and was gone; my Beloved was gone, was gone, so the word is. She did not open to him at his first knock, and now she came too late, when afterward she would have inherited this blessing.
Christ will be sought while he may be found; if we slip our time, we lose our passage. Note, 1. Christ justly rebukes our delays with his denials, and suspects the communications of comfort from those that are remiss and drowsy in their duty. 2.
Christ’s departures are matter of great grief and lamination to believers. The royal psalmist never complains of any thing with such sorrowful accents as God’s hiding his face from him, and casting him off. The same is here, as if he were out of heart with her hands, crying, He is gone, he is gone; and that which cuts her to the heart, is, that she may thank herself, she provoked him to withdraw. If Christ departs, it is because he takes something unkindly.

Now observe what she does, in this case, and what befell her.

(1.) He she calls him her Beloved, being resolvedly cloudy and dark sover the day be, she will not quit her relation to him, and interest in him.
It is a weakness, upon every apprehension either of our own failings, or of God’s withdrawals, to conclude hardly as to our spiritual state. Every desertion is despair. I will say, Lord, I believe, though I must say, Lord, help my unbelief. Though he leave me, I love him, he is mine.

(2.) She now remembers the words he said to her, when he went in white clothes and expressions made upon her, reproaching herself for her folly in not complying sooner with her convictions. “My soul failed when he spake; his words melted me when he said, My head is wet with the dew; and yet, wretch that I was! I lay still, and made excuses, and did not open to him.” The smothering and stifling of our convictions is a thing that will be very bitter in the reflection, when God opens our eyes. Sometimes the word has its effect immediately on the heart, but it melts it afterward, upon second thoughts. My soul now melted because of his words which he had spoken before.

(3.) She did not go to bed, but went in pursuit of him; I sought him, I called him. She might have saved herself this labour, if she would but have bestirred herself, when he first called; but we cut ourselves out a great deal of work, and create ourselves a great deal of trouble, by our own slothfulness and carelessness in improving our opportunities. Yet it is her praise, that, when her Beloved is withdrawn, she continues seeking him; her desires are more ardent, and her importunities after him more solicitous, by his withdrawals.
She calls him by prayer, calls after him, and begs of him to return; and she not only prays, but uses means, she seeks him in the ways wherein she used to find him.

(4.) Yet still she missed of him; I could not find him, he gave me no answer. She had no evidence of his favour, no sensible comfort, but was at-time weary in all her works, and her importunities for love toward her. Note, There are those who have a true love for Christ, and yet have not immediate answers to their prayers for his smiles; but he gives them an equivalent, if he strengthens them with strength in their souls, to continue seeking him, Ps.
cxxxviii. 3. St. Paul could not prevail for the removing of the thorn in the flesh, but was answered with grace sufficient for him.

(5.) She was ill treated by the watchmen; They found me, they smote me, they wounded me, v. 7.
They took her for a low woman, (because she went about the streets at that time of night, when they were walking their rounds,) and beat her accordingly. Disconsolate saints are taken for sinners, and are censured and reproached as such. Thus Hannah, when she was praying in the bitterness of her soul, was wounded and smitten by Eli, one of the prime watchmen, when he said to her, How long wilt thou be drunken? So counting her a daughter of Belial. 1 Sam. i. 14, 15. It is no new thing for those that are of the loyal loving subjects of Zion’s King, to be misrepresented by the watchmen of Zion, as enemies, or scandals, to his kingdom; they could not abuse and persecute them but by putting them into an ill name. Some apply it to those ministers who, though watchmen by office, yet misapply the word to awakenned consciences, and thus wound and hurt them. But observe, these grievances, add affliction to the afflicted, and make the hearts of the righteous sad, whom God would not have made sad, (Ezek. xiii. 22.) discouraging those who ought to be encouraged, and talking to the grief of those whom God has wounded, Ps. lxi.
26. Those watchmen were bad enough, that could not, or would not, assist the spouse in her inquiries after her Beloved; (ch. iii. 3.) but there were much worse things that hindered her with their severe and uncharitable censures, smote her, and wounded her with their reproaches, and, though they were the keepers of the wall of Jerusalem, as if they had been the breakers of it, took away her vail from her, rudely and barbarously, as if it had been only a pretence of modesty, but a cover of the contrary. They whose outward appearances are all good, and yet are inviudiously condemned, and run the same, for hypocrites, have reason to complain, as the spouse here, of the taking away of their vail from them.

(6.) When she was disabled by the abuses the watchmen gave her, to prosecute her inquiry her-sclf, she gave charge to those about her, to assist her in the inquiry; (v. 8.) I charge you, O daughters of Jerusalem, all my friends and acquaintance, if you find my Beloved, it may be you may meet with him before I shall, what shall ye tell him?
So some read it; “Speak a good word for me, tell him that I am sick of love." Observe here, [1.] What her condition was, she loved Jesus Christ to that degree, that his absence made her sick, extremely sick, she could not bear it, and she was in pain for his return, as a woman in travail, as Ahab for Naboth's vineyard, which he so passionately coveted. This is a sickness which is a sign of a healthful constitution of soul, and will certainly end well, a sickness that will be not unto death, but life. It is better to be sick of love to Christ than at ease in love to the world. [2.] What course she took in this condition; she did not sink into despair, and conclude she should die of her disease, but she sent after her Beloved; she asked the advice of her neighbours, and begged their prayers for her, that they would intercede with him on her behalf; "Tell him, though I was careless, and foolish, and slothful, and rose not up so soon as I should have done, yet I love him; he knows all things, he knows that I do; represent me to him as sincere, though in many instances coming short of my duty; nay, represent me to him as an object of his pity, that he may have compassion on me, and help me." She does not bid them tell him how the watchmen had abused her; how unrighteoussoever they were in it, she acknowledges that the Lord is righteous, and therefore bears it patiently; but, "Tell him that I am wounded with love to him." Gracious souls are more sensible of Christ's withdrawings than of any other trouble whatsoever.

غانل وانس, تونلغانل وانس—
The lover languished, but not his love.

9. What is thy beloved more than another beloved, O thou fairest among women? what is thy beloved more than another beloved, that thou dost so charge us? 10. My beloved is white and ruddy, the chiefest among ten thousand. 11. His head is as the most fine gold; his locks are bushy, and black as a raven: 12. His eyes are as the eyes of doves by the rivers of waters, washed with milk, and filthy set: 13. His cheeks are as a bed of spices, as sweet flowers; his lips like lilies, dropping sweet-smelling myrrh: 14. His hands are as gold rings set with the beryl; his belly is as bright ivory overlaid with sapphires: 15. His legs are as pillars of marble set upon sockets of fine gold; his countenance is as Lebanon, excellent as the cedars: 16. His mouth is most sweet; yea, he is altogether lovely. This is my beloved, and this is my friend, O daughters of Jerusalem.

Here is,

1. The question which the daughters of Jerusalem put to the spouse concerning her Beloved, in answer to the charge she had given them, v. 9. Observe

1. The respectful title they give to the spouse, O thou fairest among women. Our Lord Jesus makes his spouse truly amiable, not only in his eyes, but in the eyes of all the daughters of Jerusalem. The church is the most excellent society in the world; the communion of saints the best communion, and the beauty of the sanctuary a transcendent beauty; the saints are the most excellent people; holiness is the symmetry of the soul; it is its agreement with itself; it manifests itself to all that are competent judges of it; even those that have little acquaintance with Christ, as those daughters of Jerusalem here, cannot but see an amiable beauty in those that bear his image, which we should love, wherever we see it, though in different dresses.

2. Their inquiry concerning her Beloved. "What is thy Beloved more than another beloved? If thou wilt have us to find him for thee, give us his marks, that we may know him, when we see him." (1.) Some take it for a flighty question, blaming her for making such ado about him; "Why shouldst thou be so passionate in inquiring after thy Beloved, no matter how others do? Why shouldst thou be so set upon him more than others that yet have a kindness for him?" These that are zealous in religion are men wondered at by such as are indifferent to it. The many careless ones laugh at the few that are solicitous and serious, "What is there in him, that is so very charming, more than in another person? If he be gone, than, who art the fairest among women, wilt soon have another with an equal flame of love; Cænus hearts see nothing excellent or extraordinary in the Lord Jesus, give his person or offices, in his doctrine or in his favours; as if there were no more in the knowledge of Christ, and in communion with him, than in the knowledge of the world, and in its conversation.

(2.) Others rather take it for a serious question, and suppose that they who put it, intended, [1.] To comfort the spouse, who, they knew, would recover new spirits, if she did but talk awhile of her Beloved; she would please her better, or would give a more powerful diversion to her grief, than to be put upon the pleasing task of describing the beauties of her Beloved. [2.] To inform themselves; they had heard, in general, that he was excellent and glorious, but they desired to know more particularly. They wondered what moved the spouse to charge them concerning her Beloved, with so much vehemence and concern, and therefore concluded there must be something more in him than in another beloved, which they are willing to be continued off. Then there begin to be some hopes of people, when they begin to inquire concerning Christ and his transcendent perfections. And sometimes the extraordinary zeal of one, in inquiring after Christ, may be a means to provoke many; (2 Cor. ix. 2.) as the apostle, by the faith of the Gentiles, would stir up the Jews to a holy emulation. Rom. xi. 14. Soch.

II. The account which the spouse gives of her Beloved, in answer to this question. We should always be ready to instruct and assist those that are inquiring after Christ. Experienced Christians, who are well acquainted with Christ themselves, should do all they can to make others acquainted with him. 1. She assures them, in general, that he is one of incomparable perfections, and unparalleled worth; (v. 10.) "Do not you know my Beloved? Can the daughters of Jerusalem be ignorant of him that is Jerusalem's Crown, and crowned Head? Let me tell you then." (1.) That he has every thing in him that is lovely and amiable; My beloved is white and ruddy, the colours that make up a complete beauty. This points not at any extraordinary beauty of his body, when he should be incarnate. It was never said of the child Jesus, as of the child Moses when he was born, that he was exceeding fair; (Acts vii. 20.) but his divine glory, and the concurrence of every thing in him as Mediator, to make him truly lovely in the eyes of those that are enlightened to discern spiritual things. In him we may behold the beauty of the Lord, he was the holy child Jesus, that was his fairness. If we look upon him as made to us Wisdom, Righteousness, Sanctification, and Re- demption, he appears, in all, very amiable. His love to us renders him very lovely; he is . . .
the spotless innocence of his life, ruddy in the bloody sufferings he went through at his death; white in his glory, as God; (when he was transfigured, his raiment was white as the lights;) ruddy in his assuming the nature of man, Adam—red earth; white in his tenderness toward his people, ruddy in his terrible appearances against his and their enemies. His is the glory of God's mercy.

(2.) That he has that loveliness in him which is not to be found in any other; He is the chiefest among ten thousand; a nonesuch for beauty, fairer than the children of men, than any of them, than all of them; there is none like him, nor any to be compared with him; everything else is to be accounted loss and dung, in comparison of him, Phil. iii. 8. He is higher than the kings of the earth, (Ps. lxxxix. 27.) and he has obtained another excellent name, so that any of the principalities and powers of the upper or lower world, Phil. ii. 9. Heb. i. 4. He is a Standard-bearer among ten thousand; so the word is, the tallest and comliest of the company. He is himself lifted up as an Ensign, (Isi. xi. 10.) to whom we must be gathered, and must always have an eye. And there is all the reason in the world that he should have the innermost and uppermost place in our souls, who is the fairest of ten thousands, and has in him vanity and things beautiful for us.

2. She gives a particular detail of his accomplishments, conceals not his power or comely proportion; every thing in Christ is amiable. Ten instances she gives of his beauty, which we need not be nice in the application of, lest the wringing of them bring forth blood, and prove the wresting of them. The design, in general, is, to show that he is every way qualified for his undertaking, and has all that in him which may recommend him to our esteem, love, and confidence. Christ's appearance to John, (Rev. i. 13, &c.) may be compared with the description which the spouse gives of him here, the scope of both being to represent him transcendentally glorious, that is, both great and gracious, made lovely in the eyes of believers, and making them happy in himself.

(1.) His head is as the most fine gold; The head of Christ's God, (Col. ii. 19.) and it is promised to the saints, that the Almighty shall be their Gold, (Job xxii. 25.) their D'fence, their Treasure; much more was he so to Christ, in whom dwells all the fulness of the Godhead bodily, Col. ii. 9. Christ's head bespeaks his sovereign dominion over all, and his vital influence upon his church and all its members; this is as gold, gold; the former word signifies shining gold, the latter strong solid gold; Christ's sovereignty is both beautiful and powerful. Nehemiah's monarchy is compared to a head of gold, (Dan. ii. 38.) because it excelled all the other monarchies, and so does Christ's government.

(2.) His locks are bushy and black; not black as the tents of Kedar, whose blackness was their deformity, to which therefore the church compares herself, (ch. i. 5.) but black as a raven, whose blackness is his beauty. Sometimes Christ's hair is represented as white, (Rev. i. 14.) denoting his eternity, that he is the Ancient of days; but here as black and bushy, bespeaking him ever young, and that there is in him no decay, nothing that waxeth old. Every thing that belongs to Christ is amiable in the eyes of a believer, even his hair is so; it was pity that it should be wet, as it was, with the dew, and these locks with the drops of the night, while he waited to be gracious, v. 2.

(3.) His eyes are as the eyes of doves, fair and clear, as crystal, as the crystal of the river of waters, which doves delight in, and in which, as in a glass, they see themselves; they are washed, to make them clean, washed with milk, to make them white, and fitly set, neither starting out nor sunk in. Christ is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, for they are dove's eyes, Hab. i. 13. All believers speak with pleasure of the omniscience of Christ, as the spouse here of his eyes; for though it be terrible to his enemies as a flame of fire, (Rev. i. 14.) yet it is amiable and comfortable to his friends, his dove's eyes, as it is a witness for him in heaven. These are all things, thou knowest that I love thee. Blessed and holy are they that walk always as under the eye of Christ.

(4.) His cheeks (the risings of the face) are as a bed of spices, raised in the gardens, which are the beauty and wealth of them, and as sweet flowers, or towers of sweetness. There is that in Christ's countenance which is amiable in the eyes of all the saints, in the least of them, and not a part of the face, but all of the face. The half disclosures Christ makes of himself to the soul are reviving and refreshing, fragrant above the richest flowers and perfumes.

(5.) His lips are like lilies, not white like lilies, but sweet and pleasant; such are the words of his lips to all that are sanctified, sweeter than honey, and the honey-combs; such the kisses of his lips, all the communications of his love to his people. He stood there in his life-time, and he they that heard him wondered at the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth.

His lips are as lilies, dropping sweet-smelling myrrh.

Never any lilies in nature dropped myrrh, but nothing in nature can fully set forth the beauty and excellency of Christ, and therefore, to do it by comparison, there must be a composition of images.

(6.) His hands are as gold rings set with the beryl, a noted precious stone, v. 14. Great men had their hands adorned with gold rings on their fingers, set with precious stones; but, in her eye, his hands themselves were as gold rings; all the instances of his power, the works of his hands, all the performances of his providence and grace, are all rich, and pure, and precious gold, as the precious onyx and the sapphire; all fitted to the purpose for which they were designed, as gold rings to the finger; and all beautiful and very becoming, as rings set with beryl. His hands, which are stretched forth, both to receive his people, and to give to them, are thus rich and comely.

(7.) His bowels are as bright as ivory, for so it should be rendered, rather than his belly, for it is the same word that was used for bowels, (v. 4.) and is often ascribed to God, (as Isa. lxix. 13. Jer. xxxii. 20.) and so it denotes his tender compassion and affection for his spouse, and the love he has to her even in her desolate and deserted state. This love is like bright ivory finely polished, and richly overlaid with sapphires. The love itself is strong and firm, and the instances and circumstances of it are bright and sparkling, and add much to the inestimable value of it.

(8.) His legs are as pillars of marble, so strong, so stately, and no disgrace, no, not to the sockets of fine gold, upon which they are set, v. 15. This bespeaks his stability and steadfastness; where he sets his foot he will fix it; he is able to bear all the weight of the government that is upon his shoulders, and his legs will never fail under him; this sets forth the stateliness and magnificence of the goings of our God, our King, in his sanctuary, (Ps. lxviii. 24.) and the steadiness and evenness of all his dispensations toward his people. The ways of the Lord are equal, they are all mercy for people; these are the pillars of marble, more lasting than the stately pillars of Lebanon.

(9.) His countenance (his port and mien) is as Lebanon, that stately hill; his aspect beautiful and charming, like the prospect of that pleasant forest or park, excellent as the cedars, which, in height and strength, excel other trees, and are of excellent use.
Christ is a goodly Person; the more we look upon him the more beauty we shall see in him.

(10.) His mouth is most sweet, it is sweetness itself, it is sweetness; so the word is; it is pure essence, na; it is the quintessence of all delights, v. 16. The words of his mouth are all sweet to a believer, sweet as milk to babes, to whom it is agreeable; and therefore all her desire is towards him, (Ps. xxx. 10.) to whom it is delicious. The kisses of his mouth, all the tokens of his love, have a transcendent sweetness in them, and are most delightful to them who have their spiritual senses exercised. To you that believe he is precious.

3. She concludes with a full assurance both of faith and hope, and so gets the mastery of her trouble.

(1.) There is a full assurance of faith concerning the complete beauty of the Lord Jesus; "He is altogether lovely. Why should I stand to mention particulars, when throughout there is nothing amiss?" She is sensible she does him wrong in the particular descriptions of him, and comes far short of the dignity and merit of the subject, and therefore she breaks off with this general encomium; He is truly lovely, he is wholly so; there is nothing in him but what is amiable, and nothing amiable but what is in him; he is all desires, he has all in him that one can desire, and therefore all her desire is towards him, and she seeks him thus carefully, and cannot rest contented in the want of him. Who cannot but love him so lovely?

(2.) Here is a full assurance of hope concerning her own interest in him; "This is my Beloved, and this is my Friend; and therefore wonder not that I thus long after him." See with what a holy boldness she claims relation to him, and then with what a holy triumph she proclaims it. It is propriety that sweetens excellence. To a suffering Christian, and not to see him as ours, would be rather a torture than a happiness; but to see one that is thus lovely, and to see him as ours, is a complete satisfaction. Here is a true believer,

[1.] Giving an entire consent to Christ; "He is mine; my Lord, and my God;" (John xx. 28.) mine, according to the tenor of the gospel-covenant; mine in all relations; bestowed upon me, to be all that to me that my poor soul stands in need of.

[2.] Taking an entire companionship in Christ. It is spoken of here with an air of triumph; "This is he whom I have chosen, and to whom I have given up myself; none but Christ, none but Christ; this is he on whom my heart is, for he is my Best-beloved; this is he in whom I trust, and from whom I expect all good, for this is my Friend." Note, Those that make Christ their Beloved, shall have him their Friend; he has been, and will be, a special Friend to all believers. He loves those that love him; and those that have him their Friend have reason to glory in him, and speak of him with delight. "Let others be governed by the love of the world, and seek their happiness in its friendship and favours, This is my Beloved, and this is my Friend. Others may do as they please, but this is my soul's Choice, my soul's Rest, my Life, my Joy, my All; this is he whom I desire to live and die with."}

CHAP. VI.

In this chapter, I. The daughters of Jerusalem, moved with the description which the church had given of Christ, inquire after him. II. Her love interests them where they may meet with him, v. 2-5. III. Christ is now found of those that sought him, and very highly applauds the beauty of his spouse, as one extremely smitten with it, (v. 4, 7.) preferring her before all others, (v. 8, 9.) recommending her to the love and esteem of all her neighbours, (v. 10.) and, lastly, acknowledging the impressions which her beauty had made upon him, and the great delight he took in her; x. 11.-13.

1. WHITHER is thy beloved gone, O thou fairest among women? Whither is thy beloved turned aside, that we may seek him with thee? 2. My beloved is gone down into his garden, to the beds of spices, to feed in the gardens, and to gather lilies.

Here is,

I. The inquiry which the daughters of Jerusalem made concerning Christ, v. 1. They still continue their high thoughts of the church, and call her, as before, the fairest among women; for true sanctity is true beauty. And now they raise their thoughts higher concerning Christ, Whither is thy Beloved gone? that we may seek him with thee. This would be but an indelicate, unacceptable, compliment, if the song were not to be understood spiritually; for love is jealous of a rival, would monopolize the Beloved, and cares not that others should join in seeking him; but they that truly love Christ are desirous that others should love him too, and be joined to him; nay, the greatest instance of duty and respect that the church's children can show to their mother, is, to join with her in seeking Christ.

The daughters of Jerusalem had asked, (ch. v. 8.) Whither is thy Beloved? Are there any other belov Sebastains, wondering that the spouse should be so passionately in love with him, are now of another mind, and are themselves in love with him; for, 1. The spouse had described him, and showed them his excellencies and perfections; and therefore, though they have not seen him, yet, believing, they love him. They that undervalue Christ, do so because they do not know him; when God, by his word and Spirit, discovers him to the soul, with that ray of light that openeth the eyes of the blind, he shall be kindled. 2. She had expressed her own love to him; her rest in that love, and had triumphed in it; This is my Beloved; and that flame in her breast scattered sparks into theirs. As sinful lusts, when they break out, defile many, so the pious zeal of some may provoke many, 2 Cor. ix. 2.

The spouse had besought their help in seeking her Beloved; (ch. v. 8.) but now they beg hers, they perceive that now the cloud she had been before, which had defiled the skies, was blown up, and, while she was describing her Beloved to them, she herself retrieved her comfort in him. Dropping Christians would find benefit themselves by talking of Christ, as well as do good to others.

Now here, (1.) They inquire concerning him, Whither is thy Beloved gone? Which way must we steer our course, in pursuit of him? Note, Those that are made acquainted with the excellencies of Christ, and the comfort of an interest in him, cannot but be inquisitive after him, and desirous to know where they may meet with him. (2.) They offer their service to the spouse to accompany her in quest of him; We will seek him with thee. Those that would find Christ must seek him, seek him early, seek him diligently; and it is best seeking Christ in concert, to join with those that are seeking him. We must seek for communion with Christ, in communion with saints. We know whither our Beloved is gone; he is gone to heaven to his Father, and our Father, he took care to send us notice of it, that we might know how to direct to him, John xx. 17. We must by faith see him there, and by prayer seek him there; with boldness, enter into the holiest, and herein must join with the generation of them that seek him, (Ps. cvii. 6.) even with all that in every place call upon him, 1 Cor. i. 2. We must pray with, and for, others.
II. The answer which the spouse gave to this inquiry, v. 2, 3. Now she complains not any more as she had done, (ch. v. 6.) "He is gone, he is gone," that she knew not where to find him, or doubted she had lost him for ever; no,

1. Now she knows very well where he is; (v. 2.) "My Beloved is not to be found in the streets of the city, she saw him not at the watchmen's places; if he go not in the vineyard, and if I look for him there, I have in vain looked for him;" (as his parents sought him among their kindred and acquaintance, and found him not;) "but he is gone down to his garden, a place of privacy and retirement." The more we withdraw from the hurry of the world, the more likely we are to have acquaintance with Christ, who took his disciples into a garden, there to be witnesses of the agonies of his love. Christ's church is a garden enclosed, and therein the Lord, the comeliness of the world; it is his garden, which he has planted, as he did the garden of Eden, which he takes care of, and delights in: though he is gone up to paradise above, yet he comes down to his garden on earth: it lies low, but he condescends to visit it, and wonderful condescension it is. Will God in very deed dwell with man upon the earth? Those that would find Christ, may expect to meet with him in his garden, the church, for there he resides; (v. 4.) or, (as Mr. Tindal) (Exod. 33. 17.) they must attend upon him in the ordinances which he has instituted, the word, sacraments, and prayer, wherein he will be with us always, even to the end of the world.

The spouse here refers to what Christ had said, (ch. v. 1.) I am come into my garden; it is as if she had said, "What a fool was I to fret and toil myself in seeking him where he was not, when he himself had told me where he was! Words of direction and comfort are often out of the way, when we have occasion to use them, till the blessed Spirit brings them to our remembrance, and then we wonder how we overlooked them. Christ has told us that he would come into his garden, thither therefore we must go to seek him.

The beds, and lesser gardens, in this greater, are the particular churches, the synagogues of God in the land; (Ps. lxxiv. 8.) the spices and lilies are particular believers, the planting of the Lord, and pleasure with him, and common with him; and when he calls down his church, it is, (1.) To feed among the gardens, to feed his flock, which he feeds not, as other shepherds, in the open fields, but in his garden; so well are they provided for! Ps. xxiii. 2. He comes to feed his friends, and entertain them; there you may not only find him, but find his table richly furnished, and a hearty welcome to it. He comes to feed himself, to please himself with the products of his own grace in his people; for the Lord takes pleasure in those that fear him. He has many gardens, many particular churches of different sizes and shapes; but, while they are his, he feeds them all, manifests himself among them, and is well pleased with them. (2.) To gather lilies, wherewith he is pleased to entertain and adorn himself; he picks the lilies one by one, and gathers them to himself; and there will be a general harvest of them at the great day, when he will send forth his angels, to gather all his lilies, that he may be for ever glorified and admired in them.

2. She is very confident of her own interests in him; (v. 3.) "I am my Beloved's and my Beloved is mine; the relation is mutual, and the knot is tied, which cannot be loosed, for he feeds among the lilies, and my communion with him is a certain token of my interest in him." She had said this before; (ch. ii. 16.) but, (1.) Here she repeats it, as that which she resolved to abide by, and which she took an unspeakable pleasure and satisfaction in; she liked her choice too well to change. Our communion with God is very much maintained and kept up by the frequent renewing of our covenant with him, and rejoicing in it. (2.) She had occasion to repeat it, for she had acted unkindly to her Beloved, and, for her so doing, he had justly withdrawn himself from her, and therefore there was occasion to take fresh hold of the covenant, which continues firm between Christ and believers, notwithstanding their failings and his. Ps. lxxxix. 30-33. "I have been careless and wanting in my duty, and yet I am my Beloved's;" for every transgression in the covenant does not throw us out of covenant. "He has justly hid his face from me and denied me his comforts, and yet my Beloved is mine;" for rebukes and chastenings are not only consistent with, but they flow from, covenant love. (3.) When we want a full assurance of Christ's love, we must live in faith, as our God and Redeemer; "Thou wilt not the sensible consolation I used to have, yet I will cleave to this, Christ is mine, and I am his." (4.) Though she said the same, before, yet now she inverts the order, and asserts his interest in her first; "I am my Beloved's, entirely devoted and dedicated to him; and then her interest in him and in his grace; "My Beloved is mine, and I am happy, truly happy, in him." If our own hearts are true, but without the faithfulness of God, there is no room left to question his being ours; for the covenant never breaks on his side. (5.) It is now her comfort, as it was then, that he feeds among the lilies, that he takes delight in his people, and converses freely with them, as we do with those with whom we feed; and therefore, though, at present, he be withdrawn, I shall meet with him again; I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance, and my God.

4. Thou art beautiful, O my love, as Tirzah; comely as Jerusalem, terrible as an army with banners. 5. Turn away thine eyes from me, for they have overcome me: thy hair is as a flock of goats that appear from Gilead. 6. Thy teeth are as a flock of sheep, which go up from the washing, whereof every one beareth twins, and there is not one barren among them. 7. As a piece of pomegranate are thy temples within thy locks. 8. There are threescore queens, and fourscore concubines, and virgins without number. 9. My dove, my undefiled, is but one: she is the only one of her mother, she is the choice one of her that bare her: the daughters saw her, and blessed her; yea, the queens and the concubines, and they praised her. 10. Who is she that looketh forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners?

Now we must suppose Christ graciously returned to his spouse, from whom he had withdrawn himself, returned to converse with her, for he speaks to her, and makes her to hear joy and gladness; returned to favour her, having forgiven and forgotten all her unkindnesses, for he speaks very tenderly and respectfully to her.

I. He pronounces her truly amiable; (v. 4.) Thou art beautiful, O my love, as Tirzah, a city in the tribe of Manasseh, the common meeting place; her name signifies pleasant, the situation, no doubt, being very happy, and the buildings fine and uniform. Thou art comely as Jerusalem, a city compact together, (Ps. cxxii. 5.) and which Solomon had built and beautified, the joy of the whole earth; it was an honor to the world, (whether they thought so or no,) that there was such a city in it. It was the holy city, and that was the greatest beauty of it; and fitly is the church compared to it, for it was founded and typified by it. This is the Jerusalem that is above, (Gal. iv. 26.) the heavenly Jerusalem; (Heb. xii. 22.) in it God has his sanctuary, and is, in a special manner, present; thence he has the tribute of praise issuing; it is his rest for ever, and therefore it is comely as Jerusalem, and, being so, is terrible as an army with banners.

Church-censures, duly administered, strike an awe upon men's consciences; the word (the weapon of God to destroy the devil) is in this age fitly attended. (2 Cor. v. 20.) and even an unbeliever is convinced and judged by the solemnity of holy ordinances, 1 Cor. xiv. 24, 25. The saints by faith overcame the world; (1 John v. 4.) nay, like Jacob, they have power with God, and prevail, Gen. xxxiii. 28. II. He owns himself in love with her, v. 5. Though, for a small moment, and in a little wrath, he had hid his face from her, yet now he gathers her with very opening instances of everlasting loving-kindness, Is. lix. 8, &c.; so some read it; " Turn the eyes of faith and love toward me; for they have lifted me up; look unto me, and be comforted." When we are calling to God to turn the eye of his favour towards us, he is calling to us to turn the eye of our obedience towards him. We read it as a strong expression of love, " Turn away thine eyes from me, for I cannot bear the brightness of them; they have quite overcome me, and I am prevailed with to overlook all that is past," as God said to Israel, " Let me alone, or I must yield," Exod. xxxii. 10. Christ is pleased to borrow these expressions of a passionate lover, only to express the tenderness of a compassionate Redeemer, and the delight he takes in his redeemed, and in the workings of his own grace in them.

III. He repeats, almost word for word, part of the description he had given of her beauty; (ch. 4. 1--5.) her hair, her teeth, her tresses; (v. 3--7.) not because he could not have described it in other words, and by other similitudes, but to show that he had still the same esteem for her, since her unkindness to him, and his withdrawals from her, that he had before; lest she should think, that, though he would not quite cast her off, yet he would think the worse of her while he knew her, he says the same of her now, that he had done, for those to whom much is forgiven, will love the more, and, consequently, will be the more below. Christ has said, I love those that love me. He is pleased with his people, notwithstanding their weaknesses, when they sincerely repent of them, and return to their duty, and commends them as if they were already arrived at perfection.

IV. He prefers her before all her competitors, and sees all the beauties and perfections of others must be wanting in her; (v. 8, 9.) " There are, it may be, three women, as Esthers, have by their beauty attained to the royal state and dignity, and fourscore concubines, whom kings have preferred before their own queens, as more charming, and those attended by their maids of honor, virgins without number, who, when there is a ball at court, appear in great splendour, with beauty that dazzles the eyes of the spectators; but my dove, my undefiled, is one, a holy one." 1. She is the beauty of the world, and view the societies of men who reckon themselves wise and happy, kings, courts, senators, counsels, or whatever incorporations you may think valuable, they are none of them to be compared with the church of Christ; their honours and beauties are nothing to her. Who is like unto thee, O Israel? Deut. xxxiii. 29. iv. 6, 7.

There are particular persons, as virgines without number, who are famed for their accomplishments, the beauties of their address, language, and performance. Love is one of holiness is beyond all other beauty; " My dove, my undefiled, is one, has that one beauty, that she is a dove, an undefiled dove, and mine, and that makes her excels the queens and virgins, though they were ever so many." 2. She includes them all; " Other kings have many queens, and concubines, and virgins, with whose conversation they entertain themselves, but my dove, my undefiled, is to me instead of all; in that one I have more than they have in all theirs." " Though many are called, some are virgins, some of great dignity, others of less, some of longer standing, and many particular believers, of different gifts and attainments, some more eminent, others less so, yet they all constitute but one catholic church, are all but parts of that whole, and that is my dove, my undefiled." Christ is the Centre of the church's unity; all the children of God, that are scattered abroad, are gathered by him, (John xii. 32.) and meet in him, (Eph. i. 10.) and are all one body.

V. He shows how much she was esteemed, not by him only, but by all that had acquaintance with her, and stood in relation to her. It would add to her praise to say, 1. That she was her mother's darling; she had that in her, from a child, which recommended her to the particular affection of her parents; as Solomon himself is said to have been tender, and an only one in the sight of his mother, (Prov. vii. 4.) so was she the only one of her mother, as dear as if she had been an only one; and if there were many more, yet she was the choice one of her that bare her; more excellent than all the societies of men this world ever produced. All the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them, are nothing, in Christ's account, compared with the church, which is made up of the excellent ones of the earth, the precious sons of Zion, comparable to fine gold, and more excellent than their neighbours. 2. That she was admired by all her acquaintance, not only the daughters, who were her juniors, but even the queen and the concubines, who might have reason to be jealous of her as a rival; they all blessed her, and wished well to her, praised her, and spake well of her; the daughters of Jerusalem called her the fairest among women; all agreed to give her the pre-eminence for beauty, and every sheath bowed to her. Nete. (1.) Those that have any sense of things, can but be convinced in their consciences, (whatever they say,) that godly people are excellent people: many will give them their good word, and more, their good will. (2.) Jesus Christ takes notice what people think and speak of his church, and is well pleased with them that honour such as the Lord, and takes it ill of those that despise them, particularly when they are under a cloud, that offend any of his little ones. He has said, in that sermon that was given of her, and makes it his own; (v. 10.) Who is she that looks forth as the morning? This is applicable both to the church in the world, and to grace in the heart.

1. They are amiable as the light, the most beautiful of all visible things; Christians are, or should be, the lights of the world. The patriarchal church looked forth as the morning, when the promise of Messiah was first made; God had appointed the spring from on high visited this dark world. The Jewish church was fair as the moon; the ceremonial law was an imperfection light, it shone by reflection, it was changeas the moon, did not make day, nor was the Sun of righteousness yet risen; but the Christian church is clear as the sun, exhibits a great light to them that sit in darkness. Or, we may apply it to the kingdom of grace, the gospel-kingdom. (1.) In its rise, it looks forth as the morning after a dark night; it is discovering, (Job xxxviii. 12, 13.) and very accordingly, it looks forth pleasantly, with calmness and concern; but it is small in its beginnings, and scarcely perceptible at first. (2.) It is, at the best, in this world, but fair as the moon, which shines with a borrowed light, which has her changes and eclipses, and her spots too, and, when at the full, does but rule by night. But, (3.) When it is perfected in the kingdom of glory, then it will be clear as the sun, the church clothed with the sun, with Christ the Sun of righteousness, Rev. xii. 1. They forsook God when he gave forth his strength; (Judg. v. 31. Matt. xiii. 43.) they shall shine in inexpressible glory, and that which is perfect will then come; there shall be no darkness, no spots, Isa. xxx. 26.

2. The beauty of the church and of believers, is not only amiable, but awful as an army with banners. The church, in this world, is as an army, as the camp of Israel in the wilderness; its state is militant; it is in the midst of enemies, and is engaged in a constant conflict with them. But there are soldiers in this army. It has its banners; the gospel of Christ is an ensign, (Isa. xi. 12.) the love of Christ, ch. ii. 4. It is marshalled, and kept in order and under discipline; it is terrible to its enemies, as Israel in the wilderness was, Exod. xv. 14. When Balaam saw Israel encamped according to their tribes, by their standards, with colours displayed, he said, How greatly are thy tents, O Jacob, Numb. xxiv. 5. When the church preserves her purity, she secures her honour and victory; when she is fair as the moon, and clear as the sun, she is truly great and formidable.

11. I went down into the garden of nuts, to see the fruits of the valley, and to see whether the vine flourished, and the pomegranates budded. 12. Or ever I was aware, my soul made me like the chariots of Amminadib. 13. Return, return, O Shulamite; return, return, that we may look upon thee. What will ye see in the Shulamite? As it were the company of two armies.

Christ being now returned to his spouse, and the breach being entirely made up, and the falling out of these lovers being the renewing of love, Christ here gives an account both of the distance and of the reconciliation.

1. That when he was withdrawn from his church as his spouse, and did not comfort her, yet even then he had his eye upon it as his garden, which he took care of; (v. 11.) "I went down into the garden of nuts, or myrtles, to see the fruits of the valley; I caused a man to go by my garden, to see it as it was." When he was out of sight, he was no farther off than the garden, hid among the trees of the garden, in a low and dark valley; but then he was observing how the vine flourished, that he might do all that to it which was necessary to promote its flourishing, and might delight himself in it as a man does in a fruitful garden. He went to see whether the pomegranates budded. Christ observes the beauty of his beloved, and then he be as the grinace in the soul, and the early buds of devout affections and inclinations there; and is well pleased with them, as we are with the blossoms of the spring.

2. That yet he could not long content himself with this, but suddenly felt a powerful, irresistible inclination in his own bosom to return to his church, as his spouse, being moved with her lamentations after him, and her languishing desire towards him; (v. 12.) "Or ever I was aware, my soul made me like the chariots of Amminadib. I could not any longer keep at a distance, my repinings were kindled together, and I presently resolved to fly back to the arms of my love, my dove." Thus Joseph made himself strange to his brethren, for awhile, to chaste them for their former unkindnesses, and make trial of their present temper, till he could no longer refrain himself, but, or ever he was aware, burst out into tears, and said, I am Joseph, Gen. xlv. 1. And perhaps it was (Prov. xxii. 29.) that though she said in her haste I am cut off from before thine eyes, yet, at the same time, he heard the voice of her supplications, and be came like the chariots of Amminadib, which were noted for their beauty and swiftness. My soul put me in the chariots of my willing people; so some read it; "the chariots of their faith and hope, and love, their desires, and prayers, and expectations, which they sent after me, to fetch me back, as chariots of fire, with how much desire they are to embrace me, as willing people, and ought to be, a willing people. (2.) If they continue seeking Christ, and longing after him, even when he seems to withdraw from them, he will graciously return to them in due time, perhaps sooner than they think, and with a pleasing surprise. No chariots sent for Christ shall return empty. (3.) All Christ's gracious returns to his people take rise from himself. It is not they, it is his own soul, that puts him into the chariots of his people; for he is gracious because he will be gracious, and loves his Israel because he would love them; not for their sakes, be it known to them.

3. That he, being returned to her, kindly courted her return to him, notwithstanding the discouragements she laboured under. Let her not despair of obtaining as much comfort as ever she had before this distance happened, but take the comfort of the return of her Beloved, v. 13. Here, (1.) The church is called the Shulamite, referring either to Solomon, the bridegroom in type, by whose name she is called, in token of her relation to him, and union with him; thus believers are called Christians from Christ; or referring to Salem, the place of her birth and residence, as the woman of Shunem is called the Shunamite. Heaven is the Salem whence the saints have their birth, and where they have their citizenship; those that belong to Christ, and are bound for heaven, shall be called Shulamites.

(2.) She is invited to return, and the invitation most earnestly pressed; Return, return; and again, "Return, return; recover the peace thou hast lost and forfeited; come back to thy former compos edness and cheerfulness of spirit." Note, Good Christians, after they have had their comfort disturbed, are sometimes hard to be pacified, and need to be earnestly persuaded to return again to their rest. As revolting sinners have need to be called to again and again, (Gal. 4. 25.) so disquieted saints have need to be called to again and again, Turn ye, turn ye, why will ye droop? why art thou cast down, O my soul?

(3.) Being returned, she is desired to show her face, That we may look upon thee. Go not longer with thy face covered like a mourner. Let these that have made their peace with God, lift up their faces without spot; (Job xxii. 56.) let them come bold, as an eminent believer, (2. Cor. 4. 18.) pleased with the cheerfulness and humble confidence of his people, and would have them look pleasant. Let us look upon thee, not I only, but the holy angels, who rejoice in the consolation of saints, as well as in the conversion of sinners: not I only, but all the daughters." Christ and believers are pleased with the beauty of the church.

(4.) A short account is given of what is to be seen in her. The question is asked, What will ye see in the Shulamite? And it is answered, as it were the company of two armies. [1.] Some think she gives this account of herself; she is shy of appearing, unwilling to be looked upon, having, in her own account, no form or comeliness. Alas! says she, What will you see in the Shulamite? Nothing that is worth your looking upon; nothing but as it were the company of two armies actually engaged, where nothing is to be seen but blood and slaughter. The watchmen had smitten her, and wounded her, and she carried in her face the marks of those wounds, which as it were had been fighting. She had said, (ch. i. 6.) Look not upon me, because I am black; here she says, "Look not upon me, because I am bloody." Or, it may denote the constant struggle that is between grace and corruption in the souls of believers; they are in them as two armies continually skirmishing, which makes her ashamed to show her face.

[2.] Others think her Beloved gives this account of her. "I will tell you what you shall see in the Shulamite; as she was in the army of two, two armies, or two parts of the same army, drawn out in rank and file; not only as an army with banners, but as two armies, with a majesty double to what was before spoken: she is as Mahanaim, as the two hosts which Jacob saw, (Gen. xxxii. 1, 2.) a host of saints, and a host of angels ministering to them; the church militant, the church triumphant." Behold two armies; in both the church appears beautiful.

CHAP. VII.

In this chapter, I. Christ, the royal Bridegroom, goes on to describe the beauties of his spouse, the church, in many instances, and to express his love to her, and the delight he has in her conversation, v. 1—9. II. The spouse, the church, expresses her great delight in him, and the desire that she had of communion and fellowship with him, v. 10—13. Such mutual esteem and endearment are there between Christ and believers! And what is heaven but an everlasting interchange of loves between the holy God and holy souls!

1. How beautiful are thy feet with shoes, O prince's daughter! the joints of thy thighs are like jewels, the work of the hands of a cunning workman: 2. Thy navel is like a round goblet which wanteth not liquor; thy belly is like a heap of wheat set about with lilies: 3. Thy two breasts are like two young roes that are twins: 4. Thy neck is as a tower of ivory; thine eyes like the fish-pools in Heshbon, by the gate of Bathrabbin; thy nose is as the tower of Lebanon, which looketh toward Damascus: 5. Thy head upon thee is like Carmel, and the hair upon thy head like purple: the King is held in the galleries. 6. How fair and how pleasant art thou, O love, for delights! 7. This thy stature is like to a palm-tree, and thy breasts to clusters of grapes. 8. I said, I will go up to the palm-tree, I will take hold of the boughis thereof; now also thy breasts shall be as clusters of the vine, and the smell of thy nose like apples: 9. And the roof of thy mouth like the best wine for my beloved, that goeth down sweetly, causing the lips of those that are asleep to speak.

The title which Jesus Christ here gives to the church is new, O prince's daughter, agreeing with Ps. xlv. 13. where she is called the king's daughter. She is in respect her daughter, born from above, begotten of God, and his workmanship, bearing the image of the King of kings, and guided by his Spirit. She is so by marriage; Christ, by bestowing her to himself, though he found her mean and despicable, has made her a prince's daughter; she has a princely disposition, something in her truly noble and generous; she is daughter and heir to the Prince of the kings of the earth; if children, then heirs. Not here we have,

I. A large description of the beauty of the spouse, which, some think, is given by the virgins her companions, and that those were they who called upon her to return; it seems rather to be given by Christ himself, and that it is designed to express his love to her, and delight in her, as before, ch. iv. 1, &c. and ch. vi. 5, 6. The similitudes are here different from what they were before, to show that the beauty of holiness is such as nothing in nature can reach; you may still say more of it, and yet come short of it. That which our love, ch. 4. was immediately upon the espressus; (ch. iii. 11.) this, upon her return from a by-path; (ch. vi. 13.) yet this exceeds that, to show the constancy of Christ's love to his people; he loves them to the end, since he made them precious in his sight, and honourable. The spouse had described the beauty of her Beloved in ten particulars; (ch. v. 11, &c.) and now she describes her in as many, for he will not be behindhand with her in respects and endearments. These that honour Christ he will certainly honour, and make honourable. As the prophet, in describing the corruptions of degenerate Israel, reckons from the sole of the feet even unto the head, (Isa. i. 6.) so here the beauties of the church are reckoned from foot to head, that, as the apostle speaks, when he is comparing the church, as here, to the natural body, (1 Cor. xii. 23.) more abundant honour might be bestowed on those parts of the body, which we think to be less honourable, and which you shall see as noble and exalted. The text says,

1. Her feet are here praised; the feet of Christ's ministers are beautiful in the eyes of the church, (Isa. l. 7.) and her feet are here said to be beautiful in the eyes of Christ; How beautiful are thy feet with shoes! When believers, being made free from the captivity of sin, (Acts xii. 8.) stand fast in the liberty with which they are made free, preserve the tokens of their enfranchisement, have their feet shod with the preparatio of the gospel of peace, and walk steadily according to the rule of the gospel, then their feet are beautiful with shoes, they tread firm, being well armed against the troubles they meet with in their way. When we rest not in good affections, but they are accompanied with sincere endeavours and resolutions, then our feet are beautiful with shoes. See Ezek. xvi. 10.

2. The joints of the thighs are here said to be like jewels, and these curiously wrought by a cunning workman. This is explained by Eph. v. 28, and Col. ii. 19, where the mystical body of Christ is said to be held together by joints and bonds, as the hips and knees (both which are the joints of the thighs) serve the natural body in its strength and motion. The church is then conformed in Christ's eyes, when those joints are kept firm by holy love and unity, and the communion of saints. When believers act in religion from good principles, and are steady and regular in their whole conversation, and turn themselves easily to every duty in its time and place, then the joints are like jewels.
3. The navel is here compared to a round cup or goblet, that wants not any of the agreeable liquor that one would wish to find in it, such as David's cup that ran over, (Ps. xxiii. 5.) well-shaped, and not as that miserable infant whose navel was not cut. Ezek. xvi. 4. The fear of the Lord said to be health to the navel. See Prov. iii. 8. When the soul wants not that fear, then the navel wants not liquor.

4. The belly is like a heap of wheat in the store-chamber, which perhaps was sometimes, to make show, adorned with flowers. The wheat is useful, the lilies beautiful; there is every thing in the church, which may be to the members, the body of Christ, of use and ornament. All the body is nourished from the belly; it denotes the spiritual prosperity of a believer, and the healthful constitution of the soul, all in good plight.

5. The breasts are like two young roes that are twins, v. 3. By the breasts of the church’s consolations those are nourished who are born from its belly, (Isa. xlvi. 3.) and by the navel received nourishment in the womb. This comparison we had before.

6. The neck, which before was compared to the tower of David, (ch. iv. 4.) is here compared to a tower of ivory, so white, so precious; such is the faith of the saints, by which they are joined to Christ their Head. The name of the Lord, improved by faith, is to the saints a strong and impregnable tower.

7. The eyes are likened to the fish-foods in Heshbon, or the artificial fish-ponds, by a gate, either Jerusalem, or of Heshbon, which is called Bath-rabbim, the daughter of a multitude, because a great thoroughfare. The understanding, the intentions of a believer, are clean and clear as these ponds. The eyes, weeping for sin, are as fountains, (Jer. ix. 1.) and comely with Christ.

8. The nose like the tower of Lebanon, the forehead or face set like a flint, (Isa. l. 7.) unshut as that tower was impregnable. So it denotes the magnanimity and holy bravery of the church, or, as others, a spiritual sagacity to discern things that differ, as animals strangely distinguished by the smell. This tower looks toward Damascus, the head city of Syria, denoting the boldness of the church, in facing its enemies, and not fearing them.

9. The head like Carmel, a very high hill near the sea, v. 5. The head of a believer is lifted up above his enemies, (Ps. xxvii. 6.) above the storms of the lower region, as the top of Carmel was, pointing heaven-ward. The more we get above this world, and the nearer to heaven, and the more secure and serene we become by that means, the more amiable we are in the eyes of the Lord Jesus.

10. The hair of the head is said to be like purple. This denotes the universal amiableness of a believer in the eyes of Christ, even to the hair, or, as some understand it, the pins with which the hair is dressed. Some by the head and the hair understand the governors of the church, or, as others, that they do so carefully to do their work well much to her comeliness. The head like crimson, (so some read it,) and the hair like purple, the two colours worn by great men.

11. The complacency which Christ takes in his church thus beautified and adorned; she is lovely indeed, if she be so in his eyes; as he puts the cosmetics upon her, so it is his love that makes this come-ness truly valuable; for he is an unex-"} rest for ever, here will I dwell; and Ps. cxlvii. 11. The Lord takes pleasure in those that fear him. And if Christ has such delight in the galleries of communion with his people, much more reason have the to dwell in them, and to reckon a day there better than a thousand.

2. He was even struck with admiration at the beauty of his church; (v. 6.) How fair and how pleasant art thou, O love! How art thou made fair! So the word is; ‘not born so, but made so with the comeliness which I have put upon thee. Holiness is a beauty beyond expression; the Lord Jesus is wonderfully pleased with it: the outward aspect of it is fair, the heart of it is pleasant and highly agreeable, and the complacency he has in it is inexpressible; O my dearest for delights; so some read it.

3. He determined to keep up communion with his church.

(1.) To take hold of her as of the boughs of a palm-tree. He compares her stature to a palm-tree; (v. 7.) so straight, so strong, does she appear, when she is looked upon in her full proportion. The palm-tree is observed to flourish most when it is loaded; so the church, the more it has been afflicted, the more it has multiplied, and the branches of it are emblems of victory. Christ says, “I will go up to the palm-tree, to entertain myself with the shadow of it, (v. 8.) and I will take hold of its boughs, and observe the beauty of them.” What Christ has said, he will do, in favour to his people; we may be sure he will do it, for his kind purposes are never suffered to go unfulfilled on the ground; and if he take hold of the boughs of his church, take early hold of her branches, when they are young and tender, he will keep his hold, and not let them go.

(2.) To refresh himself with her fruits. He compares her breasts (her pious affections toward him) to clusters of grapes, a most pleasant fruit; (v. 7.) and he repeats it; (v. 8.) They shall be, they shall be to me, as clusters of the vine, which make glad the heart. “Now that I come up to the palm-tree, now thy graces shall be exerted and excited.” Christ’s presence with his people kindles the holy heavenly fire in their souls, and then their breasts shall be as clusters of the vine, a cordial to themselves, and acceptable to him. And since God, at first, breathed into men’s nostrils the breath of life, and breathes the breath of the new life still, the smell of their nostrils is like the smell of apphies, or oranges, which is pleasing and reviving. The Lord exercised a sweet power on Noah’s soul when he said Gen. viii. 21. And, lastly, the roof of her mouth is like the best wine; (v. 9.) her spiritual taste and relish, or the words she speaks to God and man, which come not from the teeth outward, but from the roof of the mouth, these are pleasing to God; the flavour of the upright is his delight. And when those that fear the Lord speak one to another as becomes them, the Lord hearkens and hears with pleasure, Mal. iii. 16. It is like that wine which is, [1.] Very palatable and grateful to the taste; it goes down sweetly, it goes straightforwardly; so the margin reads it; it moves itself a right, Prov. xxi. 31. The pleasures of sense seem right to the carnal appetite, and go down smoothly, but they are often wrong, and, compared with the pleasure of communion with God, they are harsh and rough; nothing goes down so sweetly with a gracious soul, as the wine of God’s consolations. [2.] It is a grace typically represented by his Spirit with his people shall be reviving and refreshing to them, as that strong wine which makes the lips even of those that are asleep, (that are ready to faint away in a deliquium,) to speak. Unconverted sinners are asleep, saints are often drowsy, and listless, and half asleep; but the word and Spirit of Christ will put life and vigour into the soul, and out of the abundance of the heart that is thus filled, the mouth will speak. When the apostles were filled with the Spirit, they spake with tongues the wonderful works of God (Acts ii. 10, 12.) and they who, in opposition to being drunk with wine, wherein excess, and filled with the Holy Ghost, spake in tongues in psalms and hymns, Eph. v. 18, 19. When Christ is thus commending the sweetness of his spouse's love, excited by the manifestation of his, she seems to put in that word, for my Beloved, as in a parenthesis. "Is there anything in me that is pleasant or valuable? As it is from, so it is for my Beloved." Then he delights in our good affections and services, when they are all for him, and devoted to his glory.

10. I am my beloved's, and his desire is toward me. 11. Come, my beloved, let us go forth into the field; let us lodge in the villages. 12. Let us get up early to the vineyards; let us see if the vine flourish, whether the tender grape appear, and the pomegranates bud forth: there will I give thee my loves. 13. The mandrakes give a smell, and at our gates are all manner of pleasant fruits, new and old, which I have laid up for thee, O my beloved.

These are the words of the spouse, the church, the believing soul, in answer to the kind expressions of Christ's love in the foregoing verses.

I. She here triumphs in her relation to Christ, and her interest in him, and in his name will she bow all the day long. With what a transport of joy and holy exultation does she say, (v. 10.) "I am my Beloved's, not my own, but entirely devoted to him, and owned by him." If we can truly say that Christ is our Beloved, we may be confident that we are his, and he will save us, Ps. cxix. 94. The gracious discoveries of Christ's love to us should engage us greatly to rejoice in the hold he has of us, his sovereignty over us, and propriety in us; which is far less a flag of comfort than a bond of duty. Intimacy of communion with Christ should help to clear up our interest in him.

Glorying in this, that she is his, to serve him, and reckoning that her honour, she comforts herself with this, that his desire is toward her, that is, he is her Husband; it is a periphrasis of the conjugal relation, Gen. iii. 16. Christ's desire was strongly toward his chosen remnant, when he came from heaven to earth to seek and save them; and when, in pursuance of his undertaking, he was even straitened till the baptism of blood he was to pass through for them was accomplished, Luke xii. 30. He desired Zion for a habitation; this is a comfort to believers, that, whosoever slights them, Christ has a desire toward them, such a desire as will again bring him from heaven to earth, to receive them to himself; for he longs to have them all with him, John xvii. 24. -xiv. 3.

II. She nobly and earnestly desires communion with him; (v. 11, 12.) "Come, my Beloved, let us take a walk together, that I may receive counsel, instruction, and comfort, from thee, and may make known my wants and grievances to thee, with freedom, and without interruption." Thus Christ walked with the two disciples that were going to the village called Emmaus, and talked with them, till he made their hearts burn within them. Observe here, 1. Having received fresh tokens of his love, and full assurances of her interest in him, she presses forward toward further acquaintance with him; as blessed Paul, who desired yet more and more of the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus, Phil.
be in act and exercise, whether we be fruitful in the fruits of righteousness, and whether our fruit abound. And especially let us inquire whether the tender grapes appear, and whether the pomegranates bud forth, what good motions and dispositions there are in us, that are yet young and tender, that they may be protected and cherished with a prudent care, that they may not be broken or blasted, or rubbed off, but cultivated, that they may bring forth fruit unto perfection. In this inquiry into our own spiritual state, it will be good to take Christ along with us; because his presence will make the vine flourish, and the tender grape appear, as the returning sun revives the gardens; and because to him we are concerned to approve ourselves; if he sees the vine flourish, and the tender grape appear; if we can appeal to him, Thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I love thee; if his Spirit witness with our spirit, that our souls prosper, it is enough. And if we would be acquainted with ourselves, we must beg of him to search and try us, to help us in the search, and discover us to ourselves.

4. She promises to her Beloved the best entertainment she can give him at her country-seat; for he will come to us, and sup with us, Rev. iii. 20. [1.] She gives him her best of all, and whatever else she had for him, it would utterly be condemned, if her heart were not entire for him; "There therefore will I give thee my loves; I will repeat the professions of it, honour thee with the tokens of it; and the outgoings of my soul toward thee, in admissions and desires, shall be quickened and enlarged, and my heart offered up to thee in a hot flame." [2.] She promises him her best provision, v. 13.

There we shall find pleasant odours, for the man-drares give a smell; the love-flowers or lovely ones, so the word signifies, or the love fruits; it was something that was in all respects very grateful, so valuable, that Rachel and Leah had like to have fallen out about it, Gen. xxx. 14. We shall also find that which is good for food, as well as pleasant to the eye, all the rarities that the country affords; And all states are full manner of pleasant fruits. Note, [1.] The fruit of all true exercise is pleasant to the Lord Jesus. Note, [2.] These must be carefully laid up for him, devoted to his service and honour, must be always ready to us when we have occasion for them, as that is which is laid up at our gates, that, by our bringing forth much fruit, he may be glorified, John xv. 18. Note, [3.] There is a great variety of these pleasant fruits, with which our souls should be well stocked; we must have all sorts of them, grace for all occasions, new and old, as the good householder has in his treasury; not only the products of this year, but remains of the last, Matt. xiii. 52. We must not only have that ready to us, for the service of Christ, which we have heard, and learned, and experienced, lately, but must retain that which we have formerly gathered; nor must we content ourselves only with what we have laid up in store, in the days of old, but, as long as we have the power to bring them forth, must keep them; that our stock may increase, and we may be thoroughly furnished for every good work. Note, [4.] Those that truly love Christ will think all they have, even their most pleasant fruits, and what they have treasured up most carefully, too little to be bestowed upon him, and he is welcome to it all; if it were more and better, it should be at his service. It is all from him, and therefore it is fit it should be all for him.

CHAP. VIII.

The affections between Christ and his spouse are as strong and lively here, in this closing chapter of the song, as ever, and rather more so. 1. The spouse converses her importunity for a more intimate communion and fellowship with him, v. 1. 3. II. She charges the daughters of Jerusalem not to interrupt her communion with her Beloved; (v. 4.) and they, thereupon, admire her dependence on him, v. 5. She repeats her former proposal, and when she raises up by her prayers, (v. 5.) that he would by his grace confirm that blessed union with him, to which she was admitted, v. 6. 7. IV. She makes intercession for others with all the affection she has to herself, (v. 8, 9.) and pleases herself with the thoughts of her own interest in Christ, and his affection to her, v. 10. V. She owns herself his tenant for a vineyard she held of him at Baal-hamon, v. 11, 12. VI. The song concludes with an interchange of parting requests, and Christ charges his spouse that she should often let him hear from her; (v. 13.) and she begs of him that he would hasten his return to her, v. 14.

1. THAT thou wert as my brother, that sucked the breasts of my mother! when I should find thee without, I would kiss thee; yea, I should not be despaired. 2. I would lead thee, and bring thee into my mother's house, who would instruct me: I would cause thee to drink of spiced wine of the juice of my pomegranate; 3. His left hand should be under my head, and his right hand should embrace me. 4. I charge you, O daughters of Jerusalem, that ye stir not up, nor awake my love, until he please.

Here, 1. The spouse wishes for a constant intimacy and freedom with the Lord Jesus. She was already betrothed to him, but, the nuptials being not yet solemnized and published, (the bride, the Lamb's wife, will not be completely ready till his second coming,) she was obliged to be shy, and keep at some distance; she therefore wishes she may be taken for his sister, he having called her so, (ch. v. 1.) and that she might have the same chaste and innocent familiarity with him that a sister has with a brother, an own brother, that sucked the breasts of the same mother with her, who would therefore be exceeding tender of her, as Joseph was of his brother Benjamin. Some make this to be the prayer of the Old Testament church, that the church of Christ's incarnation, that the church might be the better acquainted with him, when, forasmuch as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he should also himself likewise take part of the same, and not be ashamed to call them brethren. It is rather the wish of all believers for a more intimate communion with him, that they might receive the Spirit of sanctification, and so Christ might be as their Brother, that they might be as his brethren, which then they are, when by grace they are made partakers of a divine nature, and he that sanctifies, and they that are sanctified, are both of one, Heb. ii. 11, &c. It becomes brethren and sisters, the children of the same parents, that have been nursed at the same breast, to be very loving to, and tender of, one another; such a love the spouse desires might be between her and her Beloved, that she might call him brother.

2. She promises herself then the satisfaction of making a more open profession of her relation to him, than at present she could make; "When I should find thee without, any where, even before company, I would kiss thee, as a sister does her own brother, especially her little brother that is now sucking the breast of her mother;" for so some understand it; "I would use all the decent freedom with thee that could be, and should not be despaired for, as doing any thing unbecoming the modesty of my sex." The church, since Christ's
3. She promises to improve the opportunity she should then have for cultivating an acquaintance with him: (v. 2.) "I would lead thee, as my brother, by the arm, and hang upon thee; I would show thee all the house of my precious things, would bring thee into my mother's house, into the church, into the solemn assemblies, (ch. iii. 4.) into my clearest jewels, into the sanctuary and communion with Christ;" and "there thou wouldst instruct me;" (so some read it;) as brethren inform their sister of what they desire to be instructed in. Those that know Christ, shall be taught of him; and therefore we should desire communion with Christ, that we may receive instruction from him. He is come, that he might give us an understanding; or, "My mother would instruct me, when I have thee with me." It is the presence of Christ, in and with his church, that makes the word and ordinances instructive to his children, which shall all be taught of God.

4. She promises him to bid him welcome to the best she had; she would cause him to drink of her spiced wine, and the juice of her pomegranate, and bid him welcome to it, wishing it better, for his sake. The exercise of grace and the performance of duty are spiced wine to the Lord Jesus, very acceptable to him, as expressive of a grateful sense of his favours. Those that are pleased with Christ must study to be pleasing to him; and they will not find him hard to be pleased. He reckons hearty welcome his best entertainment; and if we have that, he will bring his entertainment along with him.

5. She doubts not but to experience his tender care of her, and affection to her; (v. 3.) that she should be supported by his power, and kept from fainting in the hardest services and sufferings; His left hand shall be under my head; and then I shall be comforted with his love; His right hand shall embrace me. Thus Christ laid his right hand upon John, when he was ready to die away, Rev. i. 17. See also Dan. x. 18. 18. It may be read as it is, ch. ii. 6. His left hand is under my head; for the words are the same in the original, and so it speaks an immediate answer to her prayer; she was answered with strength in his soul, Ps. cxix. 8. While she is following hard after Christ, his right hand sustains us; (Ps. lxxiii. 8.) underlayment are the everlasting arms.

6. She charges those about her to take heed of doing anything to interrupt the pleasing communion she now had with her Beloved, (v. 4.) as she had done before, when he thus strengthened and comforted her with his presence: (ch. ii. 7.) Let me charge you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, and regard not Zion, when thou goest up, or weep should you awake, my Love, until he waken? The church, our common mother, charges all her children, that they never do any thing to provoke Christ to withdraw, which we are very prone to do. Why should you put such an affront upon him? Why should you be such enemies to yourselves? We should thus reason with ourselves when we are tempted to do that which will grieve the Spirit.

5. Who is this that cometh up from the wilderness, leaning upon her beloved? I raised thee up under the apple-tree: there thy mother brought thee forth; there she brought thee forth that bare thee. 6. Set me as a seal upon thy heart, as a seal upon thine arm; for love is strong as death; jealousy is cruel as the grave: the coals thereof are coals of fire, which hath a most vehement flame. 7. Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it: if a man would give all the substance of his house for love, it would utterly be contemned.

Here,

I. The spouse is very much admired by those about her. It comes in a parenthesis, but in it gospel-grace lies as plain, and as much above ground, as any where in this mystical song: Who is this that cometh up from the wilderness, leaning upon her beloved? Some make those the words of the Bridegroom, expressing himself well pleased with her reliance on him, and resignation of herself to his guidance. They are rather the words of the daughters of Jerusalem, to whom she spake; (v. 4.) they see her, and bless her; the angels in heaven, and all her friends on earth, are the joyful spectators of her bliss. The Jewish church came up from the wilderness, supported by the divine power and favour, Deut. xxxiii. 10, 11. The Christian church was raised up from a low and desolate condition by the grace of Christ relied on, Gal. iv. 27. Particular believers are then amiable, nay, admirable, and divine grace is to be admired in them, when by the power of divine grace they are brought up from the wilderness, leaning with a holy confidence and complacency upon Jesus Christ their Beloved. This bespeaks the beauty of a soul, and the wonders of divine grace: 1. In the conversion of sinners. A sinful state is a wilderness, remote from communion with God, barren and dry, and in which there is no true comfort, it is a wandering wasting state; out of this wilderness we are concerned to come up, by true repentance, in the strength of the grace of Christ, supported by our Beloved, and carried in his arms. 2. In the consolation of saints. A soul convinced of sin, and truly humbled for it, is in a wilderness, quite at a loss; and there is no coming out of this wilderness, but leaning on Christ as our Beloved, by faith, and not leaning to our own reason, nor trusting to our righteousness or strength of our own as sufficient for us, but going forth, and going on, in the strength of the Lord God, and making mention of his righteousness, even his own, who is the Lord our Righteousness. 3. In the salvation of those that belong to Christ. We must go up from the wilderness of this world, having our conversation in heaven; and, at death, we must remove thither, leaning upon Christ; must live and die by faith in him; To me to live is Christ; and it is he that is Gideon in death.

II. She addresses herself to her Beloved.

1. She puts him in mind of the former experience which she and others had had of comfort and success in applying to him. (1.) For her own part; "I raised thee up under the apple-tree, I have many

a time wrestled with thee by prayer, and have prevailed. When I was alone in the acts of devotion, retired in the orchard, under the apple-tree, (which Christ himself was compared to, (ch. ii. 3.) as Nathaniel under the fig-tree (John i. 48.) meditating and praying, then I raised thee up, to help me, and comfort me, as the disciples raised him up in the storm, saying, Master, carost thou not that we perish? (Mark iv. 38.) and the church, (Ps. xlv. 22.) "I will not leave thee, nor forsake thee." Not without experience have we had of Christ's readiness to yield to the importunities of our faith and prayer, should encourage us to continue instant in our addresses to him, to strive more earnestly, and not to faint; I sought the Lord, and he heard me, Ps. xxxiv. 4. (2.) Others also had had like experience of comfort in Christ, as it follows there, (Ps. xxxiv. 5.) They looked unto him, as well as I, and were enlightened. There thy father, saith the Lord, the forth, the uncircumcised, or believing souls, in whom Christ was formed, Gal. v. 15. They were in pain for the comfort of an interest in thee, and travailed in pain with great sorrow; so the word here signifies; but they brought thee forth, the pangs did not continue always, they that had travailed in convictions, at last brought forth in consumations, and the pain was forgotten for joy of the Saviour's birth; by this very similitude our Lord illustrates the joy which his disciples would have in his return to them, after a mournful separation for a time, John xvi. 21, 22. After the bitter pangs of repentance, many a one has had the blessed birth of comfort; why then may not I?

2. She begs of him that her union with him might be confirmed, and her communion with him continued, and made more intimate; (v. 6.) Set me as a seal upon thine heart, as a seal upon thine arm; (Isa. xxxvii. 3.) "Love in that, is this which all those desire above any thing, that know how much their happiness is bound up in the love of Christ. (2.) "Let me never lose the room I have in thy heart; let thy love to me be ensured, as that deed which is sealed not to be revoked, that cabinet which is sealed up, not to be robbed. Let nothing ever prevail either to separate me from thy love, or, by suspending the communion, to make me of no use to thee.

(3.) "Let me always be near and dear to thee, as the signet on thy right hand, not to be parted with, (Jer. xxxii. 24.) engraven upon the palms of thy hand, (Isa. xlix. 14.) loved with a peculiar love." (4.) "Be thou my High Priest; let my name be written on thy breast-plate, nearer thy heart, as the names of all the tribes were engraven like the engravings on a signet, in twelve precious stones on the breast-plate of Aaron, and also on two precious stones on the two shoulders or arms of the Ephod," Exod. xxxviii. 11, 12, 21. (5.) "Let thy power be engaged for me, is an evidence of thy love to me; let me be not only a seal upon thine heart, but a seal upon thine arm; let me be ever borne up in thine arms, and know it to my comfort." Some make these to be the words of Christ to his spouse, commending her to be ever mindful of him, and of his love to her; however, if we desire and expect that Christ should set us as a seal on his heart, surely he will set him as a seal on ours.

3. To enforce this petition, she pleads the power of love, or her love to him, which constrained her to be thus pressing for the tokens of his love to her.

(1.) Love is a violent vigorous passion. [1.] It is strong as death; the pains of a disappointed lover are like the pains of death; nay, the pains of death are nothing in comparison of the agonies of the beloved Object. Christ's love to us was strong as death; for it brake through death itself; he loved us, and gave himself for us. The love of true believers to Christ is strong as death, for it makes them dead to every thing else; it even parts between soul and body, while the soul, upon the wings of devout affections, soars up to heaven, and even forgets that it is yet clothed and clogged with flesh. Paul, in a rapture of this love, knew not whether he was in the body, or out of the body. By it a believer is crucified to the world. [2.] Jealousy is cruel as the grave, which swallows up and devours all; those who truly love Christ are jealous of every thing that would draw them from him, and especially jealous of themselves, lest they should do any thing to provoke him to withdraw from them, and rather than so do, would pull out a right eye and cut off a right hand, than which what can be more cruel? Weak and trembling saints, who conceive a jealousy of Christ, doubting of his love to them, that and that it is not necessary to them like the grave, never wastes the spirits more; but it is an evidence of the strength of their love to him. [3.] The coals thereof, its lamps, and flames, and beams, are very strong, and burn with incredible fury and irresistibl force, as the coals of fire that have a most vehement flame, a flame of the Lord, (so some read it,) a powerful piercing flame, as the lightning, Ps. xxxix. 7. Holy love is a fire that begets a vehement flame in the soul, and consumes the dross and chaff that are in it, melts it down like wax into a new form, and carries it upward as the sparks toward God and heaven.

(2.) Love is a valiant and victorious passion. Holy love is so; the reigning love of God in the soul is constant and firm, and will not be drawn off from him, either by fair means or foul, by life or death, Rom. viii. 38.

[6.] In death, and all its terrors, will not frighten a believer from loving Christ; Many waters, though they will quench fire, cannot quench this love, no, nor the floods drawn it; (v. 7.) the noise of these waters will strike no terror upon it let them do their worst, Christ shall still be the Best-beloved. The overflowing of these waters will strike no damp upon it, but it will enable a man to rejoice in tribulation; Though he slay me, I will love him, and trust in him. No waters could quench this love, nor any thing; it waded through the greatest difficulties, even seas of blood. Love sat king upon the floods; let nothing then abate our love to him.

[2.] Life, and all its comforts, will not entice a believer from loving Christ; If a man could hire him with all the substance of his house, to take his love off from Christ, and set it upon the world and the flesh again, he would reject the proposal with the utmost disdain; as Christ, when the kingdoms of this world, and the glory of them, were offered him, to buy him off from his undertaking, said, Get thee hence, Satan; it would utterly be condemned; offer those things to those that know no better. Love will enable us to repel, and triumph over, temptations from the smiles of the world, as much as from its frowns. Some give this sense of it; If a man would give all the substance of his house to Christ, as an equivalent instead of love, to excuse it, it

8. We have a little sister, and she hath no breasts: what shall we do for our sister, in the day when she shall be spoken for? 9. If she be a wall, we will build upon her a palace of silver: and if she be a door, we will inclose her with boards of cedar. 10. I am a wall, and my breasts like towers; then was I in his eyes as one that found favour. 11. Solomon had a vineyard at Baal-hamon: he let out the vineyard unto keepers: every one for the fruit thereof was to bring a thousand pieces of silver. 12. My vineyard, which is mine, is before me: thou, O Solomon, must have a thousand, and those that keep the fruit thereof two hundred.

Christ and his spouse having sufficiently confirmed their love to each other, and agreed it to be on both sides strong as death, and inviolable, they are here, in these verses, like a loving husband and his wife, consulting together about their affairs, and considering what they should do. Yoke-fellows, having laid their hearts together, to contrive about their relations, and about their estates; and, accordingly, this happy pair are here advising with one another about a sister, and a vineyard.

They shall be the keepers of their sister, their little sister, and the disposing of her. 1. The spouse proposes her case with a compassionate concern; (v. 8.) We have a little sister, and she has no breasts; she is not grown up to maturity; what shall we do for this little sister of ours in the day that she shall be spoken for, so as that we may do well for her? (1) This may be understood as spoken by the Jewish church concerning the Gentile world. God had been very merciful to the Jewish church; yet she was so weak, so poor, so sick, and so sickly, that she was not able to carry on her own business. God had endowed the church with the word of God, and with the ordinances of the Lord; and she was richly endowed, but what shall become of the poor Gentiles, the barren that has not borne, and the desolate? Isa. liv. 1. Their condition (say the pious Jews) is very deplorable and forlorn: they are sisters, children of the same fathers, God and Adam, but they are little, because not dignified with the knowledge of God; they have no breasts, no divine revelation, no scriptures, no ministers, no breasts of consolation drawn out to them, whereby they might grow in grace, so that they could minister to the names of the Gentiles, and draw out to them the covenants of promise; no breasts of instruction themselves to draw out to their children to nourish them, (1 Pet. ii. 2.) What shall we do for them? We can but pity them, and pray for them. Lord, what wilt thou do for them? The saints, in Solomon's time, might know, from David's psalms, that God had mercy in store for them, and they begged it might be hastened to them. Now the tables are turned, the Gentiles are betrothed to Christ, and ought to return the kindness by an equal concern for the bringing in of the Jews again, our eldest sister, that once had breasts, but now has none. If we take it in this sense, the unbelieving posterity of these pious Jews contradicted this prayer of their fathers; for when the day came that the Gentiles should be spoken for, and courted to Christ, instead of considering what to do for them, they plotted to do all they could against them, which filled up the measure of their iniquity; 1 Thess. ii. 16. Or, (2.) It may be applied to any other that belong to the election of grace, but are yet uncalled; they are remotely related to Christ and his church, and sisters to them both; other sheep that are not of this fold, John x. 15. Acts xviii. 10. They have no breasts, none yet fashioned, (Ezek. xvi. 7.) no affection to Christ, no principle of grace. The day will come when they shall be spoken for; when the chosen shall be called, shall be courted for Christ, by the ministers, the friends of the Bridegroom. A blessed day it will be, a day of visitation! What shall we do, in that day, to promote the match, to conquer their coryness, and persuade them to consent to Christ, and present themselves chaste virgins to him? Nete, Those that through grace are brought to Christ themselves, shall contrive what they can, or shall they do as others; they shall help others to him, to carry on the great design of this gospel, to open the door to espouse souls to Christ, and convert sinners to him from whom they have revolted.

2. Christ soon determines what to do in this case, and his spouse agrees with him in it; (v. 9.) If she be a wall, if the good work be once begun with the Gentiles, with the souls that are to be called in, if the little sister, when she shall be spoken for by the gospel, will but receive the word, and build herself a church, Christian foundation, and frame her dealings to turn to the Lord, as the wall is in order; I am the house, we will build upon her a palace of silver, or build her up into such a palace; we will carry on the good work that is begun, till the wall becomes a palace, the wall of stone a palace of silver; which goes beyond the boast of Augustus Caesar, that what he found brick he left marble. This little sister, when once she is joined to the Lord, shall be made to grow into a holy temple, a habitation of God through the Spirit, in whose temple we all are the temple.

If she be a door, when this palace comes to be finished, and the doors of this wall set up, which was the last thing done, (Neh. vii. 1.) then we will enclose her with boards of cedar, we will carefully and effectually protect her, that she shall receive no damage. We will do it; Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, all concur in contriving, carrying on, and crowning, the blessed work when the time comes. Whatever is wanting shall be set in order, and the work of faith shall be fulfilled. It is a difficult matter for the owen of a wall to build another, or for a wall to build another wall, or for my breasts to build another wall, or my breasts to build another wall of breasts, and my breasts like towers. This she speaks, not as upbraiding her little sister that had no breasts, but comforting herself concerning her, that he who had made her what she is, who had built her up upon herself, and made her to grow up to maturity, could, and would do the same kindness for those whose case she bore upon her heart; Then was I in his eyes as one that found favour. See, (1) What she values herself upon, her having found favour in the eyes of Jesus Christ; those are happy, truly happy, and for ever so, that have the favour of God, and are accepted of him. (2) How she ascribes the good work of God in her to the good will of God toward her; "He has made me a wall, and my breasts as towers, and then in that instance more than in any thing, I experienced his love to me. Hail, thou that art highly favoured, for in thee Christ is formed." (3) What he assumes of God takes in the work of his own hands. When we are made as a wall, as a brazen wall, (Jer. i. 18.—xv. 20.) that stands firm against the blast of the terrible ones, (Isa. xxv. 4.) then God takes delight in us to do good. (4) With what joy and triumph we ought to speak of God's grace towards us, and with what satisfaction we should look back upon the special times and seasons when we were in his eyes as those that find favour; these were days never to be forgotten.

II. They are here consulting about a vineyard.
they had in the country, the church of Christ on earth, considered under the notion of a vineyard; (v. 12.) Solomon had a vineyard at Baal-hamon, had a kingdom in the possession of a multitude, a numerous people. As he was a type of Christ, so his vineyard was a type of the church of Christ. Our Saviour has given us a key to these verses in the parable of the vineyard let out to un-thankful husbandmen, Matth. xxi. 33. The bargain was, that every one of the tenants having so much of the vineyard assigned to him, as would bear a twenty thousand, he was to pay the annual rent of a thousand pieces of silver; for we read, (Isa. vii.
25.) that in a fruitful soil there were a thousand vines at a thousand silverlings. Observe,
1. Christ's church is his vineyard, a pleasant and peculiar place, privileged with many honours; he delights to walk in it, as a man in his vineyard, and is pleased with its fruits.
2. He has intrusted each of us with this vineyard, as keepers of it; the privileges of the church are that good thing which he has committed to us, to be kept as a sacred trust; the service of the church is to be our business, according as our capacity is; Son, go work to-day in my vineyard. Adam, in innocency, was to dress the garden, and to keep it.
3. He expects rent from those that are employed in his vineyard, and intrusted with it. He comes, seeking fruit, and requires gospel-duty of all those who are his vineyard's keepers. Every one of what rank or degree soever, must bring glory and honour to Christ, and do some service to the interest of his kingdom in the world, in consideration of what benefit and advantage they enjoy by their share of the privileges of the vineyard.
4. Though Christ has let out his vineyard to keepers, yet still it is his, and he has his eye always upon it for good; for if he did not watch over it night and day (v. 11.) the vineyard, to whom he has let it out, would keep it but in vain, Ps.
cxxvii. 1. Some take these for Christ's words; (v 12.) My vineyard, which is mine, is before me; and they observe how he dwells upon his propriety in it; It is my vineyard, which is mine; so dear is his work to him, it is his own in the world, (John xvi. 1.) and therefore he will always have it under his protection; it is his own, and he will look after it.
5. He who enjoys the privileges of the vineyard, must have them always before her; the keeping of the vineyard requires constant care and diligence. They are rather the words of the spouse;
My vineyard, which is mine, is before me. She had adorned her fault and folly in not keeping her own vineyard, (ch. i. 6.) but now she resolves to 改革. Our hearts are our vineyards, which we must keep with all diligence; and therefore we must have a watchful jealous eye upon them at all times.
6. Our great care must be to pay our rent for what we hold of Christ's vineyard, and to see that we do not go behindhand, nor disappoint the messengers he sends to receive the fruits; (Matt. xxi.
34.) Thou, O Solomon, must have a thousand, and shall have. The main of the profits belong to Christ; and him and his praise all our fruits must be dedicated to.
7. If we be careful to give Christ the praise of our church-privileges, we may then take to our-ourselves the comfort and benefit of them. If the Owner of the vineyard has had his due, the keepers of it shall be well paid for their care and pains; they shall have two hundred, which sum, no doubt, was looked upon as good profit. They that work for Christ are working for themselves, and shall be unspeakable gainers by it.

13. Thou that dwellest in the gardens, the companions hearken to thy voice: cause me to hear it. 14. Make haste, my beloved, and be thou like to a roe or to a young hart upon the mountains of spices.

Christ and his spouse are here parting for awhile;
they must stay below in the gardens on earth, where she has work to do for him, he must remove to the mountains of spices in heaven, where he has busitness to attend for her, as an Advocate with the Father. Now observe with what mutual endearments they part:
1. If he desires to hear often from her; she is ready at her pen, she must be sure to write to him, she knows how to direct it; (v. 13.) "Thou that, for the present, dwellest in the gardens, dressing and keeping them till thou remove from the garden below to the paradise above; thou, O believer, whenever thou art, that dwellest in the garden, of solemn ordinances, in the gardens of church-fellowship and communion, the companions are so happy as to hear thy voice, cause me to hear it too."

Observe, (1.) Christ's friends should keep a good correspondence one with another, and, as dear companions, speak often to one another, (Mal. iii. 16.)
and hearken to one another's voice; they should edify, encourage, and respect, one another. They are companions in the kingdom and patience of Christ, and therefore, as fellow-travellers, should keep up mutual freedom, and not be shy of, or strange to, one another. The communion of saints is an article of our covenant, as well as an article of our creed; to exhort one another daily, and be glad to be exhorted one by another. Hearken to the voice of the church, as far as it agrees with the voice of Christ; his companions will do so.

(2.) In the midst of our communion with one another, we must not neglect our communion with Christ, but let him see our countenance, and hear our voice; he here bespeaks it; "The companions that dwellest in the gardens, it is a pleasure to them; cause me to hear it. Thou makest thy complaints to them when any thing grieves thee; why dost thou not bring them to me, and let me hear them? Thou art free with them; be as free with me, pour out thy heart to me." Thus Christ, when he left his disciples, ordered them to send to him upon every occasion; Ask, and ye shall receive. Note, Christ not only accepts and answers, but even courts, his people's prayers, not reckoning them a trouble to him, but it is a comfort and sweet to him. He causes him to hear our prayers, when we not only pray, but wrestle and strive in prayer. He loves to be pressing importuned, which is not the manner of men. Some read it, "Cause me to be heard; thou hast often an opportunity of speaking to thy companions, and they hearken to what thou sayest; speak of me to them, let my name be heard among them, let me be the subject of thy discourse." (v 14.) One word with Christ; (which the reasoner and Usher used to say,) "before you part." No subject is more becoming, or should be more pleasing.

2. She desires his speedy return to her; (v. 14.)
Make haste my Beloved, to come again, and receive me to thyself; be thou like a roe, or a young hart, upon the mountains of spices; let no time be lost; it is pleasant dwelling here in the gardens, but to depart and be with thee is far better; that therefore it is to him, he has and wants. Even so, come, Lord Jesus, come quickly. Observe, (1.) Though Jesus Christ be now retired, he will return. The heavens, those high mountains of sweet spices must contain him, till the times of refreshing shall come; and those times will come, when every eye shall see him, in all the pomp and power of the upper and better world; the mystery of God being finished, and the mystical body completed.

Vol. III. 5 T
(2.) True believers, as they are looking for, so they are hastening to, the coming of that day of the Lord; not that they would have him make more haste than good speed, but that the intermediate counsels may all be fulfilled, and then that the end may come—the sooner the better. Not that they think him slack concerning his promise, as some men count slackness, but thus they express the strength of their affections to him, and the vastness of their expectations from him when he comes again.

(3.) Those only that can in sincerity call Christ their Beloved, their Best-beloved, can, upon good grounds, desire him to hasten his second coming. As for those whose hearts go a whoring after the world, and who set their affections on the things of the earth, they cannot love his appearing, but dread it rather, because then the earth, and all the things of it, which they have chosen for their portion, will be burnt up: but they that truly love Christ, long for his second coming, because it will be the crown both of his glory and their bliss.

(4.) The comfort and satisfaction which we sometimes have in communion with God in grace here, should make us breathe the more earnestly after the immediate vision, and complete fruition, of him in the kingdom of glory. The spouse, after an en-} dearing conference with her Beloved, finding it must break off, concludes with this affectionate request for the perfecting and perpetuating of this happiness in the future state. The clusters of grapes, that meet us in this wilderness, should make us long for the full vintage in Canaan. If a day in his courts be so sweet, what then will an eternity within the vail be! If this be heaven, O that I were there!

(5.) It is good to conclude our devotions with a joyful expectation of the glory to be revealed, and holy humble breathings towards it. We should not part but with the prospect of meeting again. It is good to conclude every sabbath with thoughts of the everlasting sabbath, which shall have no night at the end of it, nor any week-day to come after. It is good to conclude every sacrament with thoughts of the everlasting feast, when we shall sit down with Christ at his table in his kingdom, to rise no more, and drink of the wine new there; and to break-up every religious assembly, in hopes of the general assembly of the church of the first-born, when time and days shall be no more. Let the blessed Jesus hasten that blessed day. Why are his chariot wheels so long a coming? Why tarry the wheels of his chariots?
